THIS is not an argument against developing Middle Eastern oil; in a peaceful world there is a virtually unlimited market for additional energy sources. One set of vivid figures may show just how much more power the world could absorb. In 1946 the annual per capita demand for gasoline in the United States was 571 gallons as compared with 95 gallons in the Western Hemisphere outside the United States and 14 gallons in the Eastern Hemisphere. To millions of human beings now little better than beasts of burden, wider use of material energies would bring new life and emancipation. The purpose of this analysis is not to disparage the great contribution Arab oil resources may make to the world, and should make with attendant benefit to the peoples of the Middle East. Its purpose is to indicate (1) that Arab oil is not a life-and-death matter for the United States, (2) that the Palestine problem can be solved without reference to it, (3) that the whole question of Middle Eastern oil may be approached without panic or dog-in-the-manger frenzy. For without some such statesman-like and magnanimous approach as the proposal for an international Middle Eastern oil authority which was outlined to the United Nations last July by the International Cooperative Alliance, a purely unnecessary struggle for oil between the United States and Britain on one side and the U. S. S. R. on the other will make life miserable for both Jew and Arab in the Middle East and may set the world aflame.

The Land and the People

BY W. C. LOWDERMILK

CIVILIZATION is running a race with famine. The issue is still in doubt, and the challenge must be met by the statesmen and farmers of all nations. For hungry people do not keep treaties, or keep the peace; neither will they stay within their own borders. Food enough for all people is the first requisite for peace.

Palestine brings into bold relief the chief problem before the world today, which is to meet the food needs of rapidly growing populations by reclaiming damaged and neglected land areas. Palestine also suggests the solution. A Jordan Valley irrigation and power project such as I proposed some years ago, along the lines of the TVA, would be a demonstration of how the eroded and arid lands of the entire Middle East could be restored to fertility. The project has been worked out in detail by competent engineers and declared feasible. It should not cost more than $250,000,000, a sum which could be paid off in fifty years at 3 per cent interest. The scheme is financially sound, and it would enable Palestine to absorb several million more people—all the displaced persons who want to go there.

The findings of the world food survey made in 1946 by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations are startling. Even before the war, in 1939, more than half the people of the world were undernourished. Only a third enjoyed an adequate diet. Since the war the situation has become steadily worse. The phenomenal growth of the world's population in recent times—from 545,000,000 to 2,250,000,000 in the last three hundred years—makes it imperative to raise the productivity of the limited crop lands.

A study of land use in twenty-seven countries, including the so-called cradles of civilization in the Far and Middle East, showed me that where man has lived longest in organized societies, there, with a few notable exceptions, the land is in worst condition. Civilization is not yet a complete success. It tends to mine out the very basis of its existence. Moreover, the best lands are already under cultivation, and it appears that the cultivated area of the earth can be increased by only about 8 per cent. There are no more continents to discover, explore, and exploit. All we can do is develop what we have.

For this reason the Jewish agricultural-industrial settlements have a special meaning for a land-hungry and food-hungry world. The Jewish colonists in Palestine have done the finest work I have seen on four continents. In a country of feudalistic landlords and exploited peasantry they have accomplished the most successful colonization of modern times and demonstrated that the future offers even greater possibilities.

With faith and devotion born of long tradition the Jewish colonists have drained deadly malarial swamps and transformed them into fruitful fields and orchards. They have controlled soil erosion on 7 per cent of the land of Palestine, all they have been permitted to buy under the White Paper. They have repaired ancient terraces and built new ones to hold the soil on slopes. They have planted these to vineyards and olive groves as of old. They have practiced scientific farming. They have introduced many new varieties of fruits, vegetables, and dairy and poultry breeds to supplant or improve local varieties. Through scientific management of the bee industry they have obtained several million additional pounds of honey annually. After centuries of deterioration under Arab occupation and the rule of the Ottoman Empire, Palestine has been re-created as a "land flowing with milk and honey." Trees have been planted by the million on rocky and eroded hills; shifting sand dunes have been pinned down and turned into orchards or thriving poultry farms. Chemicals have been extracted from long unknown sources in the Dead Sea and sent to distant markets.

I studied many of the 318 Jewish agricultural colonies and found that they have worked out an adjustment of people to land that should interest the world at large. Without exhausting the land as we did so wastefully at first in this country and without exploiting cheap Arab or Jewish labor they are hammering out patterns for the development of industry and natural resources that make for a sound social order with plenty of room for individual initiative. Their introduction of decentralized industries into cooperative agricultural settlements shows how the subsistence agrarian economies of China, India, and the Balkans might be set on their feet. The man-power of local industries is available for the harvest rush, and during the slack season farm labor can be employed in small factories.

The present political approach, based on appeasement of the effendi who for centuries have ground down the masses, will never stabilize Palestine and the rest of the Middle East. Only a better way of life for the people will bring peace and democracy. A Jordan Valley Authority, providing abundance for all, would resolve the Palestine deadlock as force can never do.

SINCE I first proposed a Jordan Valley Authority in my little book "Palestine, Land of Promise," the Commission on Palestine Surveys has divided the necessary engineering projects into eight steps which can be carried out simultaneously or one at a time. John L. Savage, who designed and built Grand Coulee and Boulder, or Hoover Dam, spent several weeks in Palestine as consulting engineer and has given the plans his approval.

Palestine and Southern California are similar in topography, climate and rainfall, and crops. What has been done in California can be done, proportionately, in Palestine. Water for irrigation and power for industry are the two chief needs. The JVA would divert the sweet waters of the Jordan and other streams and carry them to dry, fertile areas for irrigation. Arabs and Jews together now irrigate about 100,000 acres; the JVA would bring water to more than 750,000 acres, reviving earth that has lain arid for centuries and making it produce two or three crops a year.

Hydroelectric power for industry would be created by the Mediterranean-Dead Sea project. The salt water of the Mediterranean would be brought through a twenty-eight-mile canal and tunnel from a point near Haifa to the rim of the depression and dropped through two great power-houses into the Dead Sea, which is 1,300 feet below sea level. The Dead Sea is a huge evaporating pan of some 240,000 acres in a desert area hot as a furnace. The water loss of between seven and seventeen feet a year has hitherto been made up by fresh-water streams. The JVA would replace the influx of sweet water with a stream of sea water from the Mediterranean flowing at the rate of 1,000 cubic feet a second. This sizable stream, falling nearly 1,300 feet, would produce, in conjunction with other power possibilities of the JVA, about one-fifth the power generated at Boulder Dam. Nearly one billion kilowatt-hours of cheap electric energy would be available.

How can such a project be financed? The Nazis confiscated eight billion dollars' worth of Jewish property. Of this, $250,000,000 might well be exacted as reparations from Germany and expended on the JVA.

Other valley authorities in the Middle East might be financed with oil royalties. Power and irrigation projects in the Tigris-Euphrates valley would enable the ancient Mesopotamia, now Iraq, to support twenty to thirty million people in decency instead of four million in dire poverty. And Iraq is the greatest undeveloped food basket in the world.

The deadlock in Palestine should show the United Nations that if they want peace in the Middle East they must increase the well-being of the Arab states. A first step would be to take over Palestine. Let the United Nations set up the Jordan Valley Authority as an example of what can be done. Let them in due time assist the Arabs similarly to develop their countries. Only through the full use and conservation of natural resources can a peaceful world be built.

Egypt's Bid for Power

BY MAURICE FERRO

THE end of Egypt's long fight for independence, first from Turkish rule and then from the dominant influence of the British, seems close at hand. The Egyptian delegation has brought before the General Assembly of the United Nations a demand that Britain be asked to remove its troops and military installations from the territory of Egypt and terminate its administration of the Sudan. At the same time Egypt is actively opposing the proposal of the United Nations Commission on Palestine to partition that country between Jews and Arabs.

Egypt's sovereignty is no longer in question, though its actual independence is still conditioned by the interests and strategic necessities of the great powers. But Egypt today is itself a power in the Middle East; it dominates the League of Arab States and occupies a favorable bargaining position in relation to Great Britain.

THE NATIONALIST MOVEMENT

It was not until after the defeat of Turkey in the First World War that Egyptian nationalism won its first major success. During the war, when Turkey came in on the side of Germany, Britain deposed Khedive Abbas Hilmi, proclaimed Egypt a British protectorate, and set up Hussein Kamil, son of Ismail, as Sultan. At this time the advocates of Egyptian independence were led by Saad Zaghlul Pasha, an enlightened patriot with moderate views. At the war's end, on November 13, 1918, he headed a delegation which visited the British High Commissioner to renew the demand for Egyptian freedom.

In February of 1922 Britain finally agreed to give up the protectorate. Egypt became independent, and Sultan Fuad, who had succeeded his brother, Hussein Kamil, in 1917, was named King. But Britain kept its right of condominium over the Sudan. And when on November 20, 1924, the British governor-general of the Sudan, Sir Lee Stack, was assassinated by a band of young Egyptian extremists, the British issued an ultimatum calling for the immediate withdrawal of all Egyptian troops from the territory. Within a month the Anglo-Egyptian condominium had ended and the British ruled alone.

Despite the agreement of 1922 Egyptian independence did not become a reality until 1937. A year earlier, in return for a formal promise to cooperate in abolishing the Mixed Tribunals and the Capitulations (which accorded foreigners fiscal and juridical immunity), the British obtained permission to keep troops on both banks of the Suez Canal for twenty years. The next year, at Montreux, Britain and Egypt agreed on the immediate abrogation of the Capitulations and the liquidation of the Mixed Tribunals in 1949. Thus Egypt achieved actual sovereignty, with the single limitation that it allow British units to be stationed in the canal zone. As for the Sudan, Article 11 of the August, 1936, treaty restored Anglo-Egyptian condominium.

The Wafd, Egypt's Nationalist Party, had accomplished its historical purpose: independence had been won. Now the leaders in Cairo had to devise methods to combat British predominance in the Arab world.

At the end of 1937 Farouk came of age. He promptly dismissed Nahas Pasha and chose Mohammed Mahmoud Pasha as prime minister. The young King was ambitious; he dreamed of becoming Commander of the Faithful, of unifying Islam. But there was faint hope of that: at Amman reigned the Emir Abdullah of Transjordan, who claimed to be descended from the Prophet; King Ibn Saud, the powerful ruler of Arabia, guarded the approaches to the Holy Land and seemed little inclined to yield his place to another; France held Beirut and Damascus; Great Britain, Jerusalem. King Farouk could do little more than affirm his Moslem piety by observing Friday devotions with a maximum of publicity in the mosques of Cairo and Alexandria; through thus saying his prayers with his people he gradually achieved a measure of popularity. But Egypt still had no effective foreign policy. It did no more in the Levant than proclaim its sympathy with the Arabs of Palestine.

FAROUK AND THE ARAB LEAGUE

Then came World War II. Under the influence of Nazi and Fascist propaganda the Arab world began to stir. At Cairo the government sequestered German and Italian property but took no pains to conceal its sympathy with the Axis. Force has always impressed the Arabs. Nazi-inspired dreams of "liberation" swept through Islam. As British troops moved out to meet Rommel, they were forced to maintain a strong rear guard, and British diplomats pleaded with Farouk to recall Nahas Pasha, the only Egyptian leader who had observed the letter of the 1936 treaty.

When the Axis troops were driven out of Africa and Hitler met defeat at Stalingrad, the danger to British supremacy in the Middle East disappeared. Now was the moment, Britain decided, to carry out the promise made by Mr. Eden to create an Arab League. From the first it was assumed that Egypt would play the principal role in such an organization, since it was the most populous and, thanks to foreign investments, the most prosperous of the Arab countries. For his leadership of the movement King Farouk counted on winning the gratitude of the Syrians, Lebanese, and Palestinians, and even of the peoples of Libya, Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco. Actually, of course, Egypt was planning something greater than a simple Arab League; it envisaged an empire stretching from the Tigris and the Persian Gulf to the Atlantic.

But while Farouk is ambitious, he is also realistic. He knows that Britain will not abandon the Middle East, key to its lines of communication and its oil supply, at a time when rival interests are penetrating deeper and deeper into that region. He knows, too, that Ibn Saud will never allow him to usurp the title and functions of Commander of the Faithful. The external obstacles to his ambitions plus the peculiar political situation in his own country impel him to tread very warily. The Egyptian students and workers and a certain section of the intelligentsia are demanding social and political reforms, the evacuation of British troops, and the unification of the Nile Valley. But Farouk is loath to see the British pull out completely from the Middle East. Like all the other Arab rulers, he is terrified lest communism take hold of the people and break the power of the feudal caste.

THE FALL OF JERUSALEM

ALMOST everywhere in the towns throughout the Roman Empire, and far beyond it in the East, Jewish communities traded and flourished, and were kept in touch through the Bible, and through a religious and educational organization. The main part of Jewry never was in Judea and had never come out of Judea.

Manifestly this intercommunicating series of Judaized communities had very great financial and political facilities. They could assemble resources, they could stir up, they could allay. They were neither so abundant nor so civilized as the still more widely diffused Greeks, but they had a tradition of greater solidarity. Greek was hostile to Greek; Jew stood by Jew. Wherever a Jew went, he found men of like mind and like tradition with himself. He could get shelter, food, loans, and legal help. And by reason of this solidarity rulers had everywhere to take account of this people as a help, as a source of loans, or as a source of trouble. . . .

We cannot tell here in any detail the history of that smaller part of Jewry that lived in Judea. These Jews had returned to their old position of danger; again they were seeking peace in, so to speak, the middle of a highway. Thrice Jerusalem was taken and twice the temple was destroyed. It was the support of the far more powerful Diaspora that prevented the little country from being wiped out altogether, until 70 A. D., when Titus, the adopted son and successor of the Emperor Vespasian, after a siege that ranks in bitterness and horror with that of Tyre and Carthage, took Jerusalem and destroyed city and temple together. He did this in an attempt to destroy Jewry, but indeed he made Jewry stronger by destroying its one sensitive and vulnerable point.

What matters most to Farouk is Egypt itself. His objectives are, first, Egypt's rapid political and social evolution, and, second, nominal union of Egypt and the Sudan. Because of the threat of communism he wants to resume negotiations with Britain and eventually to conclude an Anglo-Egyptian alliance. In King Farouk's mind a good solution of the Middle East problem is one which means tranquillity for Egypt. A good solution could not be guaranteed if the British quit this part of the world immediately. If an alliance were concluded, Egypt would assume responsibility for the upkeep of military installations guarding the Suez Canal and of aerodromes at Alexandria, Cairo, and el Fayed. This would enable the British to develop their naval base at Haifa and to strengthen their garrisons in Palestine, Transjordan, and Libya. Egypt would be completely free, yet protected against pressure from without.

Intelligent Egyptians consider the Arab League an elaborate façade without firm buttresses. But like their king they are flattered by their country's leading role in it and hope that it can serve Egypt's interests. Still, some Egyptians have told me that so far the league has been of use only to Syria and the Lebanon and to certain ambitious politicians. They believe the league should never have become involved in the Palestine problem. While they are outspokenly hostile to a "Zionist" state, which in their eyes would constitute a foreign body in the Arab world, they realize that such a state must inevitably come into existence. Partition, they think, is certain to bring bloodshed, provoked by the politicians and by the fanatical politico-religious Moslem Brotherhood. They bitterly deplore these troubles, which they look upon as artificially stimulated and sure to have repercussions in Egypt.

Does it follow, then, that the United Nations should abandon its efforts to solve the problems of Palestine and Egypt? Certainly not. But care must be exercised to insure that application of the General Assembly's recommendations do not bring bloody reprisals. A U. N. solution of the Anglo-British dispute or the Palestine issue should include safeguards against outbursts of terrorism by irresponsible elements. If the nations of the Middle East are to enjoy sovereign powers, some international machinery must be set up for the protection of minorities

Inside Arab Politics

BY J. L. TELLER

THREATS of armed resistance against any attempt to modify the White Paper restrictions on Jewish immigration and land purchases by Jews in Palestine have been issued frequently by Arab politicians, and relayed by correspondents and observers, ever since the Anglo-American Inquiry Committee, in the spring of 1946, recommended the admission of 100,000 Jewish D. P.'s into Palestine. The threats have increased in volume and vehemence since the publication of the majority report of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), recommending the partition of Palestine into two states—one Arab, one Jewish.

Although students of Palestine affairs do not rule out the possibility of Arab attempts to thwart partition by means of guerrilla warfare, they see more evidence of another kind of bloodshed in that country—a struggle between the Grand Mufti and his political opponents.

The Arabs of Palestine can hardly hope to succeed in an armed uprising against a trustee power authorized by the U. N. to implement partition. Such an operation would require aid from outside Palestine, and it is difficult to see where it could come from. Certainly not from the League of Arab States, whose secretary-general, Azam Pasha, shrewd, sensitive, and soft-spoken, has clearly indicated that the league's resistance to any solution short of an Arab state in the whole of Palestine would be political and carried out through the United Nations. Nor is Ibn Saud, absolute ruler of Saudi Arabia, likely to risk his multi-million-dollar deals with the United States by conspiring to frustrate a United Nations solution of the Palestine issue. Syria is preoccupied with its economic troubles and ever on the alert against annexation designs by Iraq and Transjordan; and one need hardly point out that Christian Lebanon is not eager to increase the number of Moslem states that hem it in. At least two Arab states, Transjordan and Iraq, are known to be involved in the Arab strife in Palestine.

DESIGNS OF TRANSJORDAN AND IRAQ

Ruled by the Hashemite royal house, Transjordan and Iraq have identical designs on Syria and the projected Palestine Arab state. They hope to annex them outright or merge them in a Greater Syria federation. The most formidable barrier to this scheme is the Mufti, Haj Amin Husseini, who maintains one-party rule over Palestine Arab affairs. It is the Mufti's ambition to impose his personal control over an all-Palestine Arab state as a first step toward realizing an even greater aim, that of reviving the caliphate and ruling a Greater Arabia encompassing all existing Arab states. Such a dream would be shattered by the creation of a Greater Syria dominated by the Hashemite family.

The conflicting ambitions of the Mufti and the Transjordan-Iraqi dynasty are the major but not the only elements in the political conflict developing in Arab Palestine. In a showdown with the Hashemite alliance the Mufti might at one time have hoped for assistance from King Ibn Saud, implacable foe of King Abdullah of Transjordan, and his grand-nephew, the ruler of Iraq. But the Mufti's larger aspirations have ended any chance of an entente with the old monarch of Arabia. To be caliph has long been Ibn Saud's ambition, too.

THE MUFTI'S OPPONENTS

While the Mufti's men staff the Arab Higher Committee, his opponents staff the Arab Offices in Jerusalem, London, and Washington. In Washington the chief of the Arab Office is Musa Alami, a brother-in-law of Jamal Hussein, the Mufti's cousin and lieutenant and acting chairman of the Arab Higher Committee. Musa Alami has repeatedly rejected the Mufti's demand that he place the Arab Offices under the control of the Arab Higher Committee. Although officially an instrument of the Arab League, these offices draw their financial support not from the league itself but from two of its member states, Transjordan and Iraq.

Prominent in the Palestine opposition to the Mufti is Achmed Shukeiri, a spruce lawyer from Acre who was once associated with Musa Alami as head of the Arab Office in Jerusalem and Washington. Shukeiri is about to launch an Arab People's Party which hopes to have its base in the cities, until now the Mufti's main source of revenue, and to break once and for all the control of Arab politics by the old ruling families. His associate is a highly influential urban Arab who can marshal considerable financial support, Dr. Yusuf Haikal, chairman of the Jaffa Municipal Council. They have already succeeded in alienating the Arab Workers' Society from the Mufti, a major coup. This society, founded and until recently controlled by the Mufti, has emerged in recent weeks as the Arab Labor Party, following a meeting of its executive committee to which Shukeiri and Dr. Haikal were invited.

The opposition's first international appearance was in Geneva during the sessions of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine. Defying the Arab Higher Committee's boycott, the opposition conferred with and submitted proposals to UNSCOP. Participating in the meetings and in the preparation of memoranda were Dr. Yusuf Haikal, Musa Alami, and Mohammed bey Barad'i, a retired Palestine judge who was recently decorated by King Abdullah; Nuri es Said Pasha, Prime Minister of Iraq; Sami Pasha Rifai, Prime Minister of Transjordan; and Camille bey Chamoun, former Lebanese ambassador to London and the Arab League's envoy to UNSCOP.

BOTH FACTIONS USING VIOLENCE

The Mufti has never countenanced opposition in Palestine and does not intend to do so now. The time-honored methods of political warfare in the Levant are bribery and violence. In past years the violence has been unilateral, with the Mufti's gangs striking down his opponents with impunity. Although he must direct affairs from his "exile" in Cairo, the Mufti has managed to resume his vendettas in recent months. At this moment three Mufti "Murder, Inc." cells are supposed to be operating in Haifa, Nablus, and Tul Karem. The Mufti's opponents, however, are determined this time to answer violence with violence. They have already managed to infiltrate the Mufti's own stronghold, the Arab Youth Organization, which is composed of two "armies," ostensibly centrally led but operating separately—Futuawah, sworn to the Mufti, and Najadah, whose men are outfitted and paid weekly allowances by the opposition and freely enlisted by the Arab Legion of Transjordan.

Frequent clashes between Futuwah and Najadah are not the only indications that civil war is brewing. The Mufti and the opposition are enlisting mercenaries from neighboring countries. Syrians are easy to recruit whenever drought strikes their land. Several thousand joined the Mufti's bands during the Palestine disturbances in 1936-39, which coincided with successive poor crops in the Hauran province in southern Syria. This year the Hauran has again been stricken by drought, and agents for both the Mufti and the opposition, exploiting the situation, are offering Hauranites a "glamorous warrior's career" with lodging, board, and "money to send home." The Damascus newspaper Al Nassar reported on September 4 that 10,500 Syrians had crossed into Palestine during the past year, which ended for the Moslems in midsummer. Hiring agents for the Arab Higher Committee and for King Abdullah have also been interviewing applicants in Beirut, Cairo, and Alexandria.

The most recent victim of this inter-Arab warfare was Sami Taha, chief of the Arab Workers' Society mentioned above. Sami Taha was shot down by the Mufti's hireling as he was walking toward his home in Haifa on Friday, September 12.

Until recently the conflicts in Palestine Arab politics were largely over theoretical power and the control of the funds of eleemosynary institutions, but now that partition and an Arab state are in the offing, the struggle between the Mufti and his opponents is over vastly more substantial matters.

Their Voyage Will End . . . IN PALESTINE

British piracy, tear gas, machine guns, rubber hoses, clubs and fists—none of these has broken the spirit of the refugees of the Haganah ship Exodus 1947. Nothing has weakened their will to go to Palestine.

Herded back into the concentration camps of Hamburg, in the German graveyard of the Jews, they dauntlessly proclaimed:

"We are determined to return to our homeland. Brutality won't deter us from our objective."

THAT IS THE SPIRIT OF THE DISPLACED JEWS OF EUROPE.

That is the mandate which moves the HAGANAH to continue its program of immigration and repatriation of the Jews of Europe to their rightful place in Palestine.

WHAT IS THE HAGANAH?

- The HAGANAH is the Jewish People's defense army of Palestine.
- The HAGANAH is the only organization that is actively engaged in sending immigration ships to Palestine.
- The HAGANAH brought the Exodus 1947 to Palestine and remained with the refugees throughout their historic ordeal.
- The HAGANAH sent 40 ships with over 40,000 immigrants—that the British are aware of—since the end of the war. Many other ships got through without the knowledge of the occupation forces.
- The HAGANAH ships will keep coming despite illegal British efforts to stop them. The Jews of Europe will win their fight for survival.

Del Vayo—Marshall Plan vs. Socialism

THE sixteen-nation conference on the Marshall plan finished its work with unexpected speed. Hunger does not permit delay. The conferees have slashed by almost a third their original request for $29 billion of American aid; even so, this country will have to send Europe between four and five billion dollars a year for the next four years. To sell this to Congress, the Truman Administration is already hinting in public and warning in private that the money must be spent if Europe is to be saved from communism.

From the beginning the plan had this appeal. When Molotov walked out on the Paris conference, he handed the anti-Soviet crowd their strongest talking point. For certain American liberals the plan offered an ideal way to help a starving Europe and at the same time force Russia into a general political retreat. In their enthusiasm for a stop-Russia policy they overlooked the danger that the Marshall plan might block European socialism more effectively than it would communism. In its final consequences this is an anti-Socialist plan, a part of a deliberate move to force Europe into the free-enterprise mold. In this effort capitalist aggression and American idealism make a perfect team.

I say this without irony. I am the first to admit that this country's intervention in Europe is not inspired solely by a desire for new markets or as a preventive of overproduction. It is an American article of faith that Europeans can best be saved by strong doses of the same brand of free enterprise that led the United States to prosperity. Writing recently in Le Monde, Bertrand de la Salle, a moderate French liberal just back from the United States, declared: "The psychological climate of America is favorable to an effort to restore capitalism as the world economic regime." It is not financial imperialism alone; evangelism also plays a part. For the moment a harmless heretic like Ramadier may be used—at least until a French De Gasperi can be found—but in a later stage only the representatives of pre-war industrial Europe will be trusted with the complex tasks of reconstruction.

On the Continent skepticism and suspicion of the Marshall plan have steadily increased in the past two months. Frederick Kuh, who followed the Paris conference with minute care, reported on September 14 in PM: "The United States method of preparing the Marshall plan is intensifying anti-American feeling in Europe." Criticism, he said, is not limited to Communist circles "but is emanating from all sectors of the European community." Intelligent Europeans are worried equally by the economic aspects of the plan and its political implications.

At first Secretary Marshall's proposal was warmly received. American help was desperately needed, and no party was prepared to risk losing votes by attacking it—least of all the Communists. On July 6, four days after Russia's refusal to take part in the Paris conference, Palmiro Togliatti declared that the Italian Communists were in favor of the plan provided it did not encourage the division of Europe into two blocs or subordinate Italy's economy to foreign capitalist interests. In France Maurice Thorez took much the same position, with the specific reservation that the Marshall plan must not be used to revive German industry at the expense of French security. Had the Communists believed that the American proposal would not be turned against Russia, they might have proved far less insistent than the Socialists that nationalization must be carried through. Dirigisme in France is a Socialist platform. The unshakable Ramadier might remain Prime Minister forever were it not for the directive of the Lyon congress that he either reinstate full controls or resign. Judging by the results of the by-elections in Liverpool and West Islington the British remain loyal to socialism despite intimations from Americans inside and outside the Administration that Washington would be more sympathetic if Britain would give up its nationalization program.

Europe's mood was clearly reflected in the excellent speech of Jan Masaryk to the U. N. General Assembly. The Continent has already gone to the left, he said, and will resist any attempt from the outside to switch it back.

But it looks more and more as if Congress would oppose the Marshall plan unless it carries with it a guaranty of European good behavior. What this means is indicated by the reactions of various Senators and Congressmen to the report of the Paris conference. Said Senator Ferguson: "We must curb the spread of socialism as well as communism, and stimulation of private enterprise is the only way to do it." The well-informed Mr. Krock told New York Times readers the other day: "It appears to be certain that the following ideas will be strongly urged in Congress, some with considerable support in the executive arm: (1) Nations whose basic economic recovery is to be assisted by the United States must, during that period, suspend political experimentation with systems proclaimed to be hostile to our own. . . ." Here, then, is the condition number one for American aid. Influential government officials, notably Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, are convinced that now is the time to put an end to Socialist "nonsense" in Europe.

But socialist planning is not an ideological caprice. It offers the only possible way to rebuild Europe and at the same time give political democracy a chance. In its present unstable condition, damage done in one place is felt all over the Continent. American rejection of Britain's nationalization policy in the Ruhr, for example, has weakened Socialist strength in France as well as in Germany. Should British Labor give up its program, all other European Socialist parties would suffer.

If American liberals in their all-out support of the Marshall plan help to defeat socialism in Europe, their own natural allies will be wiped out in the inevitable clash between the extreme right and the Communists. The recent statement of the Americans for Democratic Action unfortunately ignored this inescapable fact.

In the Wind

HOW did you find it down in Delray Beach?" asked the Candle.

"Palmy," replied the Wind. "By the way, do you happen to know who owns the world?"

"I know who's going to own the world, if that's what you mean," the Candle said. "The insurance companies are going to own the world. Of this, I have long been convinced. A few statistics released last month by the United Press only go to bear me out. What do you think is the richest corporation in America—for all I know, in the world?"

"If you mean," said the Wind, "the corporation with the greatest total assets, then it's the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Eight billion, forty-five million dollars and a few odd—very odd—housing projects. Since I also read the United Press, I know which corporations are third, seventh, eighth, sixteenth, and seventeenth on that list. They are the Prudential Insurance Company of America, the Equitable Life Assurance Society, the New York Life Insurance Company, the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, and the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company. If you were president of the last-named corporation, you could put your John Hancock to a check for $2,037,505,696, and still be $33,988,289 richer than Ben Fairless and his crowd."

"Oh," said the Candle. "Well, let's talk about the poor people. What is it that they say on the back of the paper match-books that they give out these days at Hamburg Heaven at Madison and Sixty-second?"

"That," said the Wind, "is a snap. They say, 'Catering to those who are aware.' Now I'll ask you one. What is the most redundantly christened Pullman car on all the New York Central's tracks?"

"Soft touch," the Candle said. "The car is named 'Imperial Empire.' Robert R. Young has it picked out for his personal expropriation, immediately after the Anschluss."

"You are doing very well," said the Wind. "Have you been West lately? How are things out there?"

"Things are blooming," replied the Candle. "May I quote from the San Francisco Chronicle? And the Examiner? California students, it reports, will be taught mathematics without social significance. The State Board of Education has accepted two math textbooks only after extensive revision. Seventh- and eighth-grade students will now get a 'true, propaganda-free' picture of present living conditions. The deleted passages often gave 'pathetic pictures of life in the United States.' For instance: the passage 'one-third of our people are poorly housed' has been deleted. So has reference to 'the horse-and-buggy days.' That, as we all know, was 'used as a term of reproach by President Roosevelt against the Republicans.' References to 'slums and slum clearance' have been eliminated. Our average annual income has been changed from $1,200 to $2,400. The price of a $975 new car has been readjusted to fit present trends. Shall I go on?"

"No," answered the Wind. "I see what you mean. Above all, let us avoid the pathetic picture."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Peace Without Victory

END OF A BERLIN DIARY, by William L. Shirer. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

IT WAS the compact intensity with which Mr. Shirer drew his pictures of day-to-day events in Hitler's capital that made "Berlin Diary" so impressive a book. "End of a Berlin Diary" does not and could not have the same vertebrate strength, for during Mr. Shirer's second term in Berlin, from October to December, 1945, the smoke of war was still drifting over the broken country and events had not settled into a dynamic pattern. Even so, "End of a Berlin Diary" is a powerful book, and a tragic one. There is no victory in it. Reason has not triumphed and the men who control and are controlled are merely blundering from day to day. The postscript, written a year later, is not more optimistic.

As Mr. Shirer reports the post-war German scene there is little vision in the conquerors and no salvation in the uprepentant Germans. At times the author himself appears to be caught in the general confusion. He is afraid of the future Germany, as well he might be, since he knows and reports the failure of the Anglo-American denazification "effort." Yet he knows that without a restored Germany Europe must remain crippled. Despite this he is critical of the British Labor Party for wanting to build up the Ruhr once more. In another place he declares that the reconstructed Ruhr must be placed under international control and at least some of its products distributed to Allied countries. The idea of control, of course, is not absent from the hazy and falteringly carried out plans of the British. And one hesitates to approve of the "tribute" idea, if that is what Mr. Shirer means.

But these criticisms tell little against the merits of a book that so vividly reports the facts upon which political schemes must rest. The real problem of Germany is not that its industry has been destroyed. Mr. Shirer declares that it has not been destroyed. At the height of the Allied bombing in 1944 German factories maintained a higher level of production than ever before in the history of that country. Indeed, American officials told him that German industry was virtually intact, and in his opinion an unhindered Germany could build a powerful military machine in five years. We may believe that the destruction of the ordinary tools of living is the main hindrance to the raising of production under the Allies. And we may believe, with the author, that the working class is the only one to offer hope. In that case, the moral dereliction and the political infantilism of the German people, their failure to recognize their responsibility for the tragedy, must be a check to hope. That is the state of mind which Mr. Shirer vividly describes.

Upon all this I would venture only one qualifying remark. It is vain, I think, to expect any country ever to recognize its guilt in explicit fashion. Even an individual whose behavior suggests that he is tormented by guilt rarely does that. In general it is unwise to frame post-war policies in the light of the political and emotional standards of the war itself, even when there has been no possible doubt of their rightness. Certainly, in the case of Germany there can be no way forward that does not entail huge risks. The risks, however, really derive from the state of the exterior world rather than from conditions within Germany. There can be no new Germany until the present conflict of nations is solved. As Mr. Shirer says, the danger is that the Nazis will profit by the political battle between the United States and the Soviet Union. That is the growing cloud which he sees in the place where the horizon should be.

During his second stay in Germany Mr. Shirer had access to the vast bulk of documents seized by the Western Allies. The study of them has compelled him to change his opinions on certain points. At one time he thought

THE LATE SUMMER

Everything still, oh, absolutely still.
Who would have thought Pomona was like this,
So almost like Medusa? But she is.
No breath whatever stirs
This warm domain of hers.
Under the drooping willows, whose festoons
Hang down like chains of green and heavy stones
Two lovers stand, holding each other close.
They neither move nor whisper; and their pose,
The taller one unbending for the kiss,
Is like the deaf, the rigid, like all those Most hopeless listeners,
Locked, shut, held fast in nothing.

By the cove

The great log, with the broken antler, lies
Heavy and huge and gray,
An old, old ram, or mountain sheep, who came
To drink, and failed, the water being steel.

Oh goddess, goddess, need it be this way?
Break, lift, the trance, the spell. Let the wind rise,
Let branches, in the bright September, move,
And garments flutter, as the singing girls
Take home the harvest, in the cool of love.

The Jewish Frontier since its inception has been regarded by leading liberal thinkers as an indispensable source of information on the worldwide "Jewish Problem" and on Palestine.

Its discussion of the basic political moral and intellectual problems of our time have kept it in the forefront of American Journals of opinion.

Dr. Stephen S. Wise says: "Jewish Frontier represents the best thought in Zionism."

Prof. Reinhold Niebuhr, of the Union Theological Seminary says: "The Jewish Frontier is brilliantly edited. There is no more able journal in this country. It has been a real triumph and I congratulate the editors on the sanity, brilliance and wisdom of their editorial viewpoint."

Lewis Mumford says: "The very highest standard in modern journalism . . . must appeal to Gentile no less than Jew."

that Hitler was bluffing at Munich. Now he is sure that he was not. Hitler would have gone to war in 1938, and in Mr. Shirer's belief it would have been wiser to have accepted battle then. One agrees. But even taking into account his evidence that a number of generals were plotting to overthrow Hitler, one cannot agree that the war would have been a short one. At that time the animating force of Hitler's "idea" was already as evident as the fact that the Europe of Daladier, Chamberlain, and Stalin was hopelessly divided. These three leaders were enfeebled by ambiguities in their doctrines or by other political and social factors. Hitler, a sick man who had warded off the graver symptoms of his disease by creating an absolving myth, had far greater possibilities of dynamic action than the West. His myth had already taken hold of a majority of his people and by turning their aggressiveness against others had given them a spurious and perverse health. That was the observed fact, dramatically reported in "Berlin Diary" and set down again in the Nürnberg section of this book. The most important facts concerning the war are not material but psychological facts.

It is as a psychological report that "End of a Berlin Diary" must be read. Its high point, surely, is the account of Hitler's end contained in the interrogation of the German air woman, Hannah Reitsch, here given in full. Physically cowering beneath the ruins of Berlin, his body trembling and consumed with fever, Hitler still raves out his malignant dreams. The myth has broken, and the sickness, no longer held in check, is like a possessing demon. He must die there, for the honor of Germany, yet others must escape to pour out his hysterical hatred upon the men who had betrayed him. He broods over maps, disposing his non-existent armies according to his overwhelming intuitions. He is obsessed with the notion of suicide, he will die to prove himself the sacrificed God of Germany. All of his huddled followers must kill themselves, so that his idea may live. Even in his will he seems to think that the victors will carry out his wishes and erect an art gallery in his heroic memory. Most terrible of all, perhaps, is that tiny detail of Hitler's marriage. The forms were observed. "The persons of 1 and 2 declare that they are of complete Aryan descent and have no hereditary disease to exclude the marriage. Signed by the competent official—Wagner." Amid catastrophe he will make that marriage which he had thought would destroy his power over German women, but still he must make it according to the squalid law of his vanished Reich. What happened after Götterdämmerung, when the flames had consumed Valhalla? The other Wagner did not say. There came about something like the vast, evil-haunted dereliction that Mr. Shirer describes in this powerful book.

RALPH BATES

Is America Unique?

THE SHAPING OF THE AMERICAN TRADITION. Text by Louis M. Hacker. Documents Edited by Louis M. Hacker and Helene E. Zahler. Two Volumes. Columbia University Press. $7.50.

THESE two handsome and moderately priced volumes are designed primarily for the high-school and college trade, but they will undoubtedly be welcomed on many adult shelves. They comprise a representative and well-edited collection of documents illustrating the development of American ideas and institutions from the first colonial times to the present day. Nine out of the eleven broadly chronological parts of the work are each divided into four sections: The American Scene, the American Mind, American Problems, and the United States and the World. The exceptions are Part I, which deals with the English background and the beginnings of American settlement, and Part VI—The Second American Revolution—which covers the Civil War and its aftermath. Each part begins with a long introduction by Dr. Hacker, and taken together these chapters provide a fairly comprehensive history text. In addition, every document is preceded by notes on its origin or authorship and the circumstances in which it was written.

A collection of this kind is bound to be criticized for sins both of commission and omission. But on the whole the choices in these volumes seem to me

These WISE MEN of the past were worried too ... let them help you find understanding

SUPPOSE that you had the chance to talk personally and to philosophize with the great thinkers of the past; that like a djinn you could call upon any one of them, whenever you felt like it, to help you clarify some question about life and the world to which you have never had a satisfying answer.

In effect, that is what happens when you have—alongside your reading chair or at your bedside—the new four-volume set of THE WORLD'S GREAT THINKERS.

When you choose, you can listen entranced to old Confucius, whose words of 2500 years ago still illuminate helpfully the simple eternal problems of everyday living.

You will hear Aristotle, who almost 300 years before the birth of Christ, taught Alexander the Great to think in large horizons, and you will see why the influence of his thought has extended down to this moment.

You will read avidly in Montaigne, whose trenchant Gallic wisdom is as cutting today as it was when it was enjoyed by Shakespeare.

Benedict Spinoza, the God-intoxicated lens-grinder—when you want him to—will expound his uplifting philosophy for you.

Jean-Jacques Rousseau will speak up for the principles of equality and justice, and Arthur Schopenhauer, the philosopher of disillusion, will demonstrate his penetrating sense of reality.

Charles Darwin, in his bare but exciting passages, will show how he revolutionized the whole attitude of man to the universe; and you will find Sigmund Freud doing the same in the world of the mind, with the widest repercussions in anthropology, art, literature, religion and politics.

These—and some forty other wise men of the past—you will meet in THE WORLD'S GREAT THINKERS. They too worried about life and the world, even as we in these confused times; and here in his own words is the essence of what each one of them thought, to help you formulate your own philosophy of life.

These are precious books for all thoughtful persons. They are to be read over a period of many months, even years. They are books to be dipped into only when you feel like it. There are hundreds of passages in them that you will want to read and re-read and ponder upon. They are to be read aloud sometimes, they are to be shared with those nearest to you. They are desert-isle books, which over the years will probably become prized more than anything in your library.

The Book-of-the-Month Club will give them to you—the whole set of four volumes—if you become a member at this time. It will do so to demonstrate, by this means, the extraordinary advantages of being a member of the Club and getting some of the books you buy in this economical way.

What membership in the BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB

means:

AMONG the books-of-the-month chosen by the Club's five judges, and the many alternates available to members (a total of sixty or so books a year), there are bound to be many you intend to buy. You may buy as few as four of these books during any twelve-month period, and receive all the advantages of membership.

The most obvious of these advantages is economy. Many of the books-of-the-month, because of the enormous editions made possible by the Club's large membership, are sold to members at less than the retail price. Even more important, for every two books-of-the-month (or specified alternates) you buy, you are entitled to one of the Club's book-dividends.

These are beautiful library volumes, sometimes classics and sometimes popular "best-sellers." Last year the retail value of the free books members received was over $16,000,000—books given to members, not sold! It seems just common-sense for any book-reading family to share in this distribution, by buying some of its books through the Club.

There is no yearly membership fee. You simply pay for each book as you get it—and, remember, you buy from the Club only those books you want, no others. Many members find it convenient to buy only certain books from the Club, and others (where there would be no saving in buying from the Club) from a favored bookseller. They are helped in doing this by concise monthly reports about all the important books.

Hundreds of thousands of book-reading families now use this sensible system. It keeps them from missing the particular new books they are anxious to read, and it makes the money they can afford for books go much farther.

extremely good. They begin with some pages from William Harrison's description of England in the reign of Elizabeth and end with an excerpt from Wendell Willkie's "One World." In between are selections from public papers, speeches, articles, books, and private letters, providing a catholic assortment of points of view.

Personally, I have but two complaints to offer. In contrasting European feudalism with American freedom—a main theme of the work—Dr. Hacker seems to me to have stacked the cards a little by playing down some of the darker aspects of the New World. In particular, his documentation tends to concentrate on developments in the North and West and to overemphasize the role of New England idealism. The South is comparatively neglected. Again, since Dr. Hacker stresses the vital part played in the rise of American civilization by private enterprise, he should surely have illustrated more fully the ideas and motivations of the entrepreneurs. I find here no cullings from the rich business literature of the golden twenties—a period in which our industrial leaders were very articulate about their hopes and beliefs. No doubt many of their pronouncements now seem uncommonly silly, but some study of them is essential for an understanding of the period.

Turning from the documents to the text, I find much debatable matter presented in an admirable manner. Dr. Hacker is an exceptionally clear and incisive writer and has a sharp eye for significant detail. But the point of view that inspires this work is likely to surprise and shock some readers who remember him as one of the most trenchant critics of capitalist society.

It is, indeed, difficult to believe that the Professor Hacker responsible for these volumes is the same Louis Hacker who in The Nation of July 26, 1933, so fervently attacked the famous "frontier" theory of the late Frederick Jackson Turner. Reviewing a posthumous collection of Turner's papers, he wrote:

The historical growth of the United States, in short, was not unique; merely in certain particulars and for a brief time it was different from the European pattern largely because of the processes of settlement. With settlement achieved—that is to say, the historic function of extensive agriculture performed, class (not sectional!) lines solidified, competitive capitalism converted into monopolistic capitalism under the guidance of the money power, and imperialism the ultimate destiny of the nation—the United States once again was returning to the main stream of European institutional development.

In the General Introduction to this new work Dr. Hacker totally repudiates the ideas expressed in the preceding passage and adopts Turner's view of the uniqueness of American civilization. True, he finds that the frontier "safety-valve" provides only a partial explanation of this fact. Of equal importance, he thinks, are the four "cornerstones" of the American tradition—freedom of religion, freedom of enterprise, the weak state, and equality of opportunity.

There is a startling contrast between this analysis and the Marxist interpretation of American history which Dr. Hacker gave us in his earlier works. Once he believed that the class struggle was developing in this country more slowly but no less surely than in Europe. Now he minimizes the importance of class conflicts, describes the American outlook as essentially middle-class, and suggests that the equality of opportunity which encouraged that outlook is still a potent factor in our society. Undoubtedly the facts support him up to a point, but like others who have seized on this idea he fails to qualify it sufficiently. It is true that class lines have been exceptionally fluid in this country and that a large section of the workers have always had a middle-class point of view. But it is also true that American middle-class predominance has received physical and moral support from the existence of depressed groups who could be depended upon to do the dirty work. There were always immigrants crowding into the Northern cities and mining districts, and in the South there were the Negroes.

Dr. Hacker's generalizations about "the weak state" also strike me as over-simplification. I certainly would not dispute his contention that the American Revolution was as much a revolt against the hindrances to free enterprise imposed by the centralized British state as it was a struggle for political freedom. But the objection of many of the Founding Fathers was not to a strong state as such but to a strong state not under their control. As soon as the revolution was won, they did their best to establish a strong state built on property rights. True, Hamilton was defeated and the Federalists kept in check for a long time, but after the civil war the rising industrialists and financiers captured the federal government and made it powerful to the extent that suited their interests. If the state was weak in repelling raids by the propertied class on the public purse, it was certainly strong in protecting that class from the demands of the workers.

This relation between economic and political power which was emphasized by the radical Louis Hacker of the thirties is played down by Professor Hacker today. The man who once, perhaps too crudely, believed that all capitalist societies followed the same laws of growth and decay now sees American capitalism as a peculiar and benevolent institution.

However, even so drastic a shift in viewpoint is not, in itself, cause for criticism. Freedom to change one's mind is, or ought to be, a fundamental human right. Nobody can blame Dr. Hacker for discarding his Marxian spectacles: they often seemed badly out of focus to me. But we are entitled to ask why he has seen fit to replace them with the rose-tinted glasses of Candide.

The Mexican Folk

A TREASURY OF MEXICAN FOLKWAYS. By Frances Toor. Crown Publishers. $5.

MEXICAN folklore is one of those large, rich, tangled areas into which many have ventured and which few have successfully penetrated. It has become a happy hunting ground for would-be writers in search of a subject, for in this largely uncharted field practically anything goes, and one man's guess is as good as another's. No comprehensive study has been made of the subject since the days of the Spanish Conquest, when certain priests and missionaries recorded, with perception and acumen, the folkways of the conquered. A few centuries later came Prescott,

Here is the book for that very special place on your library shelf. Its fascinating contents cover the most interesting highlights of Mr. Roosevelt's career and history . . . his biography by Robert G. Nixon and additional stories by Damon Runyon, William K. Hutchinson and Inez Robb.

There are 200 of his best pictures relating to his life and works — 49 quotations from his writings and speeches. A book you'll be proud to own, one you'll enjoy reading over and over, and it will make a wonderful gift!

whose magnificent book was mainly historical. And now there is the recently published "A Treasury of Mexican Folkways" by Frances Toor.

The "Treasury" is, indeed, the first and only reference book covering all aspects of current Mexican folkways. This is its chief virtue and claim to distinction. It is also the first major enterprise undertaken by Miss Toor since she ceased publication, a decade ago, of Mexican Folkways. This truly excellent magazine, founded and edited by Miss Toor, enlisted as contributors, experts in the field. In the "Treasury" Miss Toor has again done a good job of compilation. For the book consists, mainly, of material condensed from the findings of other investigators. Only a fraction of the data was gathered directly by the author herself. This limited first-hand knowledge of the field may partly account for the lack of definition and sharpness which generally derive from immediate contact with the subject or thing described. And a naturally dull literary style does not help overcome this initial difficulty.

It is true that in writing the "Treasury" Miss Toor undertook a vast assignment and one that certainly no one else in Mexico had the patience and tenacity to see through. For this all credit is due her. The book has over 500 pages of text and is illustrated with 170 excellent photographs and with 100 line drawings and 10 attractive color plates by Carlos Merida. The approach is non-technical and popular. Although there are a number of errors and misconceptions in the "Treasury" it will undoubtedly remain the standard reference work on Mexican folklore for many years to come, since there is no other. Moreover, some excellent material is contained in two of its sections, Legends, and Songs and Dance Music; here the flavor comes through straight, without benefit of comment or interpretation. Several representative tales are told simply and well. About seventy-five pages of songs and of dance music, with words and musical notation, are made available for the first time in a single volume. The selection covers a wide range, including primitive, religious, revolutionary, and dance songs, Christmas music, ballads, and serenades.

The major part of the book deals with family, community, and work relationships and institutions; with agriculture and religious practices; with birth, death, and marriage rites and beliefs; with regional arts and crafts, customs, ceremonies, attitudes, fiestas, and dances. But while there are many data, there is little insight into the complex culture patterns of the Mexican folk. And there is no attempt to classify and correlate the unwieldy mass of material. Instead, there are sporadic generalizations, fortunately infrequent, for they are rarely felicitous, as—"The people seldom sang after the Conquest because only those who are free and happy sing." And, in describing mariachi bands, "One occasionally finds a rustic Bach among them." With the confidence of a radio commentator, Miss Toor describes music never heard by living man—that is, the music of the Aztecs—as "vigorously rhythmic . . . the expression of a virile warrior race." And she asserts that European instruments played by the natives "have a primitive sound." Yet these instruments sound the same in Mexico as elsewhere—like brass, violins, and guitars. The word "primitive" can indeed be applied to them in some cases, but only to signify their crude manufacture.

It is surprising also to discover that all the ritual dances are still performed "with faith, ability, and grace, as before the Conquest." During twenty-five years in Mexico Miss Toor has miraculously managed never to see a listless, graceless, dull performances of even one of the ritual dances! Others have been less fortunate. The author cites three outstanding dances as pre-Hispanic or as having aboriginal characteristics, among them the Concheros. Yet this dance of the Soldiers of Christ is not pre-Hispanic, and its aboriginal characteristics, if any, are highly dubious, as the theme and treatment clearly show. Christ is commonly supposed to have been introduced into the New World by the Spaniards. But possibly Miss Toor has private sources of information. Only such very private sources could account for the remark that when the Soldiers of Christ, as the Concheros dancers are called, perform for the Virgin of Guadalupe, they remember the Aztec goddess, Tonantzin.

The book has other shortcomings. Frequently the amount of space allocated to various subjects appears to depend more on easy accessibility of source material than on intrinsic value. Thus only a page is devoted to the ritual dances of Yucatan, and those of Chiapas are covered in less than a page. There is the incorrect implication that the Acatlaxquis is restricted to one village only, whereas it is actually performed in a number of localities. According to Miss Toor's brief description of the Quezales, it consists of a few simple figures to different melodies. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Actually the Quetzales, one of the most interesting and possibly one of the oldest of the indigenous dances, has a rather complicated choreography. Its distinctive quality of movement is characterized by smooth, sweeping gestures, and by low bent knee movements and turns reminiscent of Javanese dancing.

These are only a few of the errors of fact and judgment in the "Treasury." The basic fallacy is the assumption that, with rare exceptions, everything in Mexico is beautiful. The adjective itself recurs with sledge-hammer insistence on page after page of the book, sometimes in paragraph after paragraph. But beyond the hackneyed writing, there is the fact that not only the good, the true, and the beautiful exist in Mexico, but also evil, falsehood, and ugliness. Yet they have been almost completely expurgated from the "Treasury," which paints Mexico in beautiful, beautiful, beautiful tourist colors.

This determination to avoid unpleasant facts is nowhere more strikingly expressed than in the naive, uncritical descriptions of local miracles. The discussion of both Catholic and pagan practices and beliefs reveals an almost wilful ignorance of the origins of both and, occasionally, even of the means by which Catholic faith and institutions were imposed on the Mexican folk. Thus no reference whatsoever is made to the documentary evidence disclosed in recent years of Indians who died of hunger and exhaustion while building the convent of Chalma. Instead, Miss Toor is content merely to repeat the pretty story about a humble shoemaker from Jalapa who became Padre Fray Bartolomé de Jesús María and who built the convent, cloisters, and cells of that famous convent.

And yet this rather superficial study of the life, ways, and culture patterns of the Mexican folk has been almost universally hailed as the outstanding work of an expert by other experts in newspapers and magazines throughout the country. Whether these reviewers have praised the "Treasury" through ignorance or simply in the spirit of auld lang syne does not matter. In so doing they have performed no service to the intelligent reading public or to Mexican folklore.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

THIS BOOK is intended for those adults who seek to live wholesome, happy and healthy sex lives, and who desire reliable information to enable them to do so.

SEX LIFE IN MARRIAGE

Hailed by many for its outstanding handling of married sex relations, this detailed work will be sent on a liberal trial offer which enables you to judge its value in your own life. Nothing essential is omitted or left in doubt. "Sex Life in Marriage" is working miracles for couples who have been married for many years. For those who are about to be married, or for the newly married, it is a priceless guide to a complete and mutually satisfactory sex relationship. The author's recent article on "Marriage" in the READER'S DIGEST drew an overwhelming response from readers in every walk of life.

"Art of Love"

"Valuable chapters . . . deal with the art of love and the techniques of the sexual relation."
—JOURNAL OF CONTRACEPTION

"Sexual Relations"

"Since sexual relations in marriage are a form of mental relaxation and enjoyment, they can be regarded as a kind of exalted play, which robs them of tension or strain and is helpful to those who experience emotional blocking. The book treats of the organs of sex, planning the honeymoon, overcoming sexual maladjustments."
—MENTAL HYGIENE

"A Full Description"

"Sensible and scientific advice about sexual relations with a full description of the physical relations . . . we recommend this book."
—HEALTH AND HYGIENE

"Frank and clear . . . deals almost exclusively with the physical and psychological side of sex in marriage."
—CHURCH MANAGEMENT

Clear Illustrations

"Adorned by drawings by that master of sexual anatomy, Dr. Robert L. Dickinson."
—HEALTH NEWS

"Sexual Attitudes"

"Sexual attitudes and emotions are considered, the honeymoon, sex-act, children, sexual maladjustments."
—EUGENICAL NEWS

CHARTS AND EXPLANATIONS
The text is illustrated by a number of splendid diagrams with detailed explanations.

Describes in Detail

"Dr. Butterfield has discussed a difficult subject in a beautiful way. Although he has gone much further than any writers of such books in the way of describing things in detail, he has used such beautiful English and has breathed such a fine spirit into it all that even the most prudish woman could hardly take offense. . . . It would be a wonderful thing if it could be handed in every couple who, because of sexual incompatability are contemplating divorce."
—AMERICAN JOURNAL OF DIGESTIVE DISEASES

"Overcoming Sexual Maladjustments"

"Engaged or married couples will find sensible answers to most questions they may wish to ask concerning sexual relations in married life. The chapter on overcoming sexual maladjustments is particularly good."
—PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING

No Matter How Long Married

"Physicians can safely and prudently recommend this book to any of their patients and friends who are newly married or about to be married, and even to many of the older couples whose sex life is not so satisfactory as it should be."

Transatlantic Kitsch

PROUD DESTINY. By Lion Feuchtwanger. Viking Press. $3.50.

AS A novel this account of Benjamin Franklin's visit to Louis XVI's court is tedious, cheap, and insufferably long. The only reason for any further comment is its considerable significance as a cultural symptom.

In recent years a number of Continental writers—Remarque, Asch, Feuchtwanger—have discovered the delights of American commerce. By artfully merging American best-seller slickness and vulgarity with the mindless torpor of the conventional European roman they have contrived a profitable formula which book-club members take for serious writing. Actually these writers turn out transatlantic kitsch, a product of the union of European middle-brow weariness and American low-brow commercialism.

The basic approach of this kind of novel, of which "Proud Destiny" is a perfect example, may be described as historical voyeurism. Subsuming history under his ego, the novelist revels in his unchecked manipulation of great events ("it was no accident that on the morning of June 6 . . .") and the gossipy intrigues which edge them. The reader's basic function is to submit to the novelist, who tells him where he may peek into the past. Hence the reader does not experience freely and on equal terms with the author the emotions and meanings suggested by the novel; they are fed to him strained, diluted, and formularized. Whereas genuine literature promotes a relationship of maturity and fellowship between reader and writer, this kind of historical novel results in a relationship as between tourist and guide: the former submits himself to the latter's direction in exchange for a glimpse of history's sights.

Ah, but such sights! We thrill to Marie Antoinette's bed-chamber ceremonies, at which thirty-six ladies dress her; we stare with members of the royal court as Marie suffers her accouchement; we envy Franklin's vantage point as he rests on the edge of a bathtub in which a French beauty soaps her limbs; and we snicker with his courtiers at Louis's fear of an operation which would permit him a normal sex life. (Here we also feel a bit superior; no red-blooded American would wait seven years to consummate a marriage with Marie Antoinette!) Feuchtwanger refrains from explicitly describing sexual activity, for he knows how much more suggestive are the sado-masochistic trimmings of sex within a royal court's authoritarian structure. Consequently "Proud Destiny" is a sustained literary tease.

Politically, Feuchtwanger also knows which way the winds blow. He throws a dry bone to PM readers by putting into Franklin's mouth a few phrases about "progressives" which suggest the happy thought that old Ben was the eighteenth-century Henry Wallace. But "progressivism" is subordinated to the novel's main theme—persistent flattery of all things American. At seventy-two Franklin is shown to be more virile than the French courtiers and the intellectual superior of the great minds of Europe. Feuchtwanger knows that though the American reader enjoys a glimpse of the fleshpots of Europe, he still requires reassurance of his superiority over the decadent Europeans. The extent to which Feuchtwanger is ready to offer this reassurance seems somehow remarkably related to the present domination of the European continent by the American dollar.

"Proud Destiny" suffers from literary elephantiasis, a disease, endemic to American publishing, which is dangerous to readers and fatal to reviewers. Like other best-sellers, the novel is outrageously padded; its author spins pages of trivia in that style of judicious imprecision which some people find so impressive. How one longs for a blue pencil!

Finally a word about the reviews this book has received. It would be absurd to become indignant with the publisher or author, for they are business men, but one cannot refrain from expressing astonishment and anger at the extravagant praise the newspaper reviewers have lavished on "Proud Destiny." After all, what is the point of reviewing books if one does not fulfil one's first obligation, which in this instance is simply to tell one's readers that the book is a piece of trash?

SOCIALISM, COMMUNISM, AND THE WEST

[We devote most of our letter columns this week to a representative selection of the many comments we have received on Margaret Marshall's article in the issue of September 13: British Socialism, Soviet Communism, and the West.]

Should Clear the Air

Dear Sirs: I was deeply impressed by Miss Marshall's article in the September 13 issue of The Nation entitled Socialism, Communism, and the West. I have long held her views on the meaning of the British experiment to American liberals, and on their curious blindness to its implications.

I warmly subscribe to the thesis that liberals and radicals should unite quickly "on a program of fighting for democratic socialism in Europe, beginning with democratic socialism in Britain." But various shibboleths are in the way, including the American liberal fixation about India and colonialism. Miss Marshall's article is capable of helping to clear the air for American liberals on this whole issue. BARRY BINGHAM

Clarifying

Dear Sirs: Please tell Margaret Marshall how much her article has done to clarify my own thinking and feeling and thereby to give me courage to face the black reaction ahead of us all.

HORACE B. ENGLISH

Satisfying Reading

Dear Sirs: Not in a long time has an article, in any publication, been as satisfying reading as Margaret Marshall's British Socialism, Soviet Communism, and the West, in The Nation of September 13. The historical perspective in the comparison between violent revolution, as in Russia, and "revolution by consent," as in Britain, is, I think, as excellent as the balance and maturity of such judgment are rare.

The wish to see the British type of social and economic change succeed is, I am sure, shared by very many people here and abroad, and it is to be hoped that the Administration and particularly Congress will show enough understanding of the issues involved to act effectively to save Britain and Western civilization.

As for Britain itself and its problems, I wish a way could be found to convince its working men and women, and especially the coal miners, that the cause of the Labor government is their cause and that failure of that government would be their failure, probably for a long time to come. GEORGE MAURER

Penn's Grove, N. J., September 16

Too Much Civil Liberty

Dear Sirs: I would like to comment on Margaret Marshall's article, Socialism, Communism, and the West. To expect liberals and radicals to be inspired by the vacillating, insipid performance of the British Labor Party is asking too much. The leaders and policy are so similar to the Social Democrats of Germany after the First World War that I view the English "socialism" of Attlee and Bevin with apprehension. Their inaction can form a bridgehead for fascism, unwittingly, no doubt, but just as disastrously as if planned.

Margaret Marshall's smug assumption of the superiority of the West fills me with dismay. The patronizing tone used when referring to Eastern Europe could very well come from a Ham Fish or a Rankin; it is particularly shocking to find it in The Nation. I feel the Slavic East has much to offer mankind. Russia, although far from a Utopia, is still the only Socialist state in existence. If Western Europe can bring about true socialism without dictatorship or bloodshed and with unimpaired civil liberties, then it will be time for liberals and radicals "to throw their hats in the air."

Civil liberty in England proves to me that the "Socialist" government there has been so timid and apologetic in its reforms that reaction is secure and feels

The Tiger Beneath The Skin

IF YOU have ever wondered what it's like to be a Jew in a world of despots and maniacs... if you have never known what it is to be beaten or tortured or butchered... or to be passingly pitied by indifferent Christianity, read this book.

Zvi Kolitz tells the powerful stories of Jewry's struggle for life itself in Europe and Palestine during the years of death. He records the mystical pride of the tortured; the touching familial love of those about to die; their new-found intimacy with God; and the Jew's absolute confidence in their own ultimate indestructibility. A strange, moving book which, once read, can never be forgotten.

no necessity of starting trouble. If fundamental reforms occurred, the government would find that saboteurs and fascists would have to be incarcerated or "all hell would break loose."

After reading the "cold war" articles in the New Republic of September 15 by Leland Stowe, Constantine Poulos, and others, Margaret Marshall's sorry article reads like an unfortunate "wish piece" for Christian Scientists.

Challenge to the Race

Dear Sirs: Miss Marshall's article in The Nation of September 13 is the most clear picture of what is going on in the Western world that I have read since reading Toynbee.

Indeed, it is a challenge not only to American liberals but to the human race, or at least to that section of it that we call the West.

L. COLIN SUMMER

Maplewood, N. J., September 12

Hits the Nail

Dear Sirs: I was so glad to read Margaret Marshall's article, Socialism, Communism, and the West. I am just back from three months in Europe meeting with leaders and studying conditions there. It seems to me that Miss Marshall has hit the nail right on the head.

It has become the habit for many liberals to decry the Social Democrats of Europe, not seeing that in so doing they were repudiating the democratic method. Miss Marshall has done a splendid job in focusing attention on the importance of the British experiment.

I welcomed the article also for the inferential approach that it gives to the support by progressives of the Marshall plan. Many liberals are opposing the Marshall plan, or refusing to support it until they know every detail. To take such a position in this hour of crisis in Western Europe is to help defeat support for Western socialism. Progressives must be in there pitching for the Marshall plan and seeing that it is used in the most constructive manner.

HOWARD Y. WILLIAMS

St. Paul, Minn., September 17

Nothing to Shout About

Dear Sirs: Margaret Marshall is unduly astonished at the failure of liberals and intellectuals in America to throw their hats in the air and shout themselves hoarse at the triumph of socialism in Great Britain. It is true that there was premature shouting and celebrating when the Soviet revolution put in an appearance. It is precisely because our liberals and intellectuals have since discovered that their shouting was premature, because they find themselves now compelled to shout in a different tone, that they are a bit more careful in their applause of the English "revolution."

We have seen that merely taking on the label of socialism does not usher in the millennium. When tyranny of the worst order is being practiced in the name of socialism in one country, there is nothing to be jubilant about when another group of Socialists makes its appearance on the stage in a different country. Our liberals and intellectuals can be depended upon to do their share of applauding twenty or thirty years hence if the British brand of socialism ushers in a better way of life than their people had under capitalism or the Russian people have been "blessed" with under the Russian brand of socialism.

So far one feels that the old Russian adage, "May God help us if a mujik should become a lord," has proved to be correct. I doubt whether the worst Tory could have acted more heartlessly with the Jewish refugees than the so-called Socialist Bevin.

Exciting and Important

Dear Sirs: Miss Marshall's article on British Socialism, Soviet Communism, and the West is by far the finest political article I have read this year—most exciting and extremely important. I hope this is one thing that everyone will see. It should have a decisive influence on public opinion. VAN WYCK BROOKS
Chilmark, Mass., September 15

[Letters commending the article, in much the same terms as those above, were also received from Alan Willard Brown, Jule Brousseau, Michael M. Davis, Herman Eberling, Albert Guérard, T. Swann Harding, Charles A. Johnson, Ralph de Toledano, Lionel Trilling, and Robert A. Young.]

Ickes Did Something

Dear Sirs: Richard Neuberger performed a public service, in The Nation of August 30, in calling attention to the unconscionable exploitation of the native fishermen of Alaska by absentee corporations. It is a pity, however, that Mr. Neuberger has slipped up on a few facts which need to be understood if protests against "absentee ownership" are not to be misaddressed.

First, it is inaccurate to say that "although Harold Ickes as Secretary of the Interior was in charge of the Fish and Wildlife Service for more than a decade, he did nothing to return the salmon industry to Alaskans." During the six and one-half years—not "more than a decade"—from July 1, 1939, when the Bureau of Fisheries was transferred to the Department of the Interior, until February 15, 1946, when Secretary Ickes resigned, the following important steps were taken by him to return the salmon industry to Alaskans:

- 1. On February 13, 1942, Secretary Ickes approved an opinion of his solicitor, Judge Margold, declaring that salmon-trap sites on native beaches belonged to the natives.
- 2. On March 20, 1942, Secretary Ickes asked the Attorney General to pass upon a second solicitor's opinion holding that the absentee owners who now monopolize the Alaskan trap sites, and thereby control the world's salmon supply should be regulated, as other fishermen are regulated, by the imposition of maximum trap and catch limits. The Attorney General, on April 8, 1942, concurred in Solicitor Margold's anti-monopoly opinion.

3. On July 15, 1944, Secretary Ickes ordered hearings on Indian claims to a number of trap sites occupied by absentee owners.

4. On July 27, 1945, Secretary Ickes decided, after extensive hearings and investigations, that eleven of these trap sites included shore lands belonging to natives, and this decision was reaffirmed on January 11, 1946.

3. On January 31, 1946, after an extensive study of the Alaska salmon monopoly, the Secretary promulgated regulations designed to break the monopoly's stranglehold by limiting each company, with its affiliates and subsidiaries, to twenty traps, with notice that the maximum would be reduced over a five-year period to ten traps, and by throwing open all the surplus trap sites to newcomers, with preference to local communities and local cooperatives.

6. In the midst of hearings on the anti-monopoly regulations, and while the Indian communities were preparing to take over the trap sites to which they were entitled under the Ickes decisions, a new Secretary of the Interior arrived on the scene who has steadfastly refused to carry out the Ickes decisions in favor of Indian ownership of trap sites—and timber—and has refused with equal steadfastness to put any limit on the monopolists' power to hog as many of Alaska's trap sites, the most valuable areas left of our public domain, as they can hold by force, violence, and the sort of corruption that Mr. Neuberger describes.

But that is another story. Perhaps Mr. Neuberger will tell it. When he tells that story he should not forget to mention that Governor Gruening and Delegate Bartlett both protested vigorously against Secretary Ickes's anti-monopoly regulations. Governor Gruening at a public hearing on February 25, 1946, characterized the Ickes proposals to reestablish free enterprise as "drastic and revolutionary" and likely to create "confusion" (breaking up monopolies is always denounced as leading to "confusion"), and Delegate Bartlett attacked them as "disruptive."

Tuna Is Better

Dear Sirs: Neuberger's Fish and Politics makes a good point (in your issue of August 30). On nutrition, however, Neuberger skates on thin ice. To say that salmon "has a greater nutritional value than almost any other food" is dubious enough. To give as evidence the testimony of one policeman is more so. The Department of Agriculture's Misc. Pub. 572, Tables of Food Composition, shows that tuna is better than salmon in calories, protein, fat, iron, and thiamine; and that canned corn beef and canned chicken are better in all those food elements but thiamine.

The Shape of Things

BEFORE THIS ISSUE IS READ, WE MAY BEGIN to see the shape of things to come in Palestine. It is not a good omen that both the United States and Russia ducked the issue until further stalling was impossible. But one thing became clear as the days passed. If Secretary Marshall and President Truman had been swung by the Arab threats toward an anti-Zionist position, they gave evidence of swinging back again under heavy bombardment of facts from the other side. The facts were not only political ones, cogently presented by Messrs. Flynn and Sullivan and others whose eyes are already fixed on next November. They were also strategic facts. While the State Department's attitude has largely complemented the attitude of the British Foreign and Colonial offices, it is by no means a foregone conclusion, even in Washington, that American security requires Arab rule in Palestine or appeasement of the Arab League and the Grand Mufti. A Jewish state in Palestine would mean the beginning of progress toward Westernization and decent social conditions in the Middle East—and these are the prerequisites of international stability. Primitive countries, strategically located and rich in essential raw materials, offer the best possible breeding places for the maneuvers of power politicians. It is this more enlightened view of American interests that the President and Mr. Marshall are supposed to have held. Assuming that they have not been threatened or argued out of it, the American position is a clear one. We will back the UNSCOP report and offer our cooperation in setting up the necessary international interim regime to enforce the majority recommendations. If the British should pull out—as Mr. Creech-Jones's statement implied they might—the task of implementation will be that much more complicated. But it will have to be undertaken with or without Britain, and the United States will be faced with the obligation to join other nations—Russia obviously included—in maintaining peace and preparing the way for the two new states in Palestine.

THE FACTS ON WHICH A DECENT AMERICAN policy would be based were laid before the Assembly in a memorandum, submitted last Thursday, October 2, by the Nation Associates. The document, entitled "Could the Arabs Stage an Armed Revolt Against the United Nations?" says even more than its name implies. It provides the essential material on the development and conditions of life of the Arab countries without which no sensible answer to the question can be made. The Arab states, in spite of nationalist activity—largely vocal and political—are socially stagnant. Their armed strength exists only where it has been built up and maintained (as in Transjordan) by Western powers. Their capacity and will to work—or fight—as a body have never been demonstrated, and the political divisions among them argue against such a possibility. The document offers evidence, on the other hand, that the Jewish army in Palestine, the Haganah, is strong enough to maintain order in the country without foreign help. If the attitude of the United States has been conditioned by fear of a vast, organized Arab uprising, the facts presented in the Nation Associates' memorandum show the folly of such a notion.

AFTER FIGHTING HARD TO PREVENT IT, the United States finally agreed to a proposal made by France and Belgium that the findings of guilt against Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Albania in the Balkan dispute be dropped. The American decision, announced by Herschel V. Johnson in the Political and Security Committee of the General Assembly, astonished the delegates. They had assumed that the United States was determined to stick to its own resolution, introduced at the start of the session, bluntly accusing the Balkan states of violating the Charter by helping the Greek guerrillas. Such phrasing would obviously have forced the accused nations and their backers to defy a decision against them. Then the United States was expected to propose a plan for action under the now famous Article 51 permitting collective or individual defense against armed attack. Mr. Johnson's strategic retreat indicates that such a scheme was viewed with disfavor by the nations on whose support we depend; the strong pleas of France and Belgium undoubtedly helped bring about our sudden shift in strategy. The question is: Has the move come too late to soften the resistance of the Balkan states? No new formulation can wipe out the fact that the United States has publicly charged them with violation of the Charter; and Mr. Johnson made it clear that his offer to withdraw the charge was conditioned on an advance agreement by them to accept a new United Nations border watch. If they refused, the guilt charges would snap right back. This is not, we think, the way "to contribute toward the maintenance of genuine peace and tranquility," as Mr. Johnson phrased our government's objective in Eastern Europe. If the American delegation really wanted to end the deadlock, they would adopt the French-Belgium formula without strings or qualifications.

GREAT BRITAIN NEEDS NO LESSONS FROM the United States in curbing the abuse of civil liberties. We did none too well with our Christian Frontiers before the war, and the Ku Klux Klan has been a tolerated curse for some seventy years. But we have never had quite the brazen self-avowed fascist movement that appears to be growing in the industrial centers of Britain, and the government's seemingly tolerant view of it is painfully reminiscent of the Social Democrats' attitude in pre-Hitler Germany. Drew Middleton, reporting to the New York Times, writes that "Sir Oswald Mosley and the British League of Ex-Servicemen and Women are arousing considerable anxiety." Street meetings, at which black-shirted men hail Hitler and Mosley and urge violence against the Jews, have become weekly features of the London scene; the slogan "Perish Judah" is scrawled on the walls of London's East End buildings; and the Horst Wessel song is chanted in the streets. Yet J. Chuter Ede, the Home Secretary, has refused to ban fascist meetings even in the Jewish sections of London, where they are bound to be incendiary. And although several fascists have been arrested, he continues to allow the police to demand the names of hecklers in order to turn them over to the fascist chairmen under a regulation that clearly calls for reinterpretation or repeal. Just as our own slightly disguised fascists reached the peak of their daring in the depths of the depression, so England's political scum rises to the top in a period of severe strain and frustration. In the long run, a restoration of economic health is what will save the country, but meanwhile it should be obvious to its leaders that self-destruction in the name of civil liberty is not one of the obligations of a democracy.

THE FOLLY OF GIVING AID TO BRITAIN SO long as a Labor government persists in its "Socialist experiments" is a favorite theme for some of our tory politicians and publicists. Our proper policy, they hint, would be to withhold all further financial assistance until the half-starved British voters holler for the return of Churchill. We shall be interested to learn the reaction of this school of thought to the "Industrial Charter" just indorsed by the annual conference of the British Conservative Party. Here is no ringing defense of free enterprise, no blast at centralized planning, no wholesale denunciation of public ownership. On the contrary, the charter calmly accepts the necessity for large measures of government control, particularly during the present crisis. "We will not remove the control from any necessity of life," it declares, "until we are certain that it is within the reach of every family in the land." The charter proposes to restore private dealings in cotton, and partially to denationalize road transport and civil aviation, but it states definitely that the coal industry, the railroads, and the Bank of England will continue to be publicly owned. When the charter was first published last May, it aroused the right-wingers to bitter opposition. But that opposition has melted away under the heat of continued Labor by-election victories. At the Conservative Party conference last week, the vote in its favor was practically unanimous, with the only criticism coming from that unalloyed diehard Sir Waldron Smithers, who growled, "Milk-and-water socialism." That is an apt description, but big-business supporters of the Tories will probably take heart from some of the less publicized sections of the charter, which suggest that the state, while settling the broad outlines of the national economic plan, will "delegate" very important powers to private industrial organizations. This would mean increased authority for the "trade associations" which have long restricted competition in most British industries—a very nice arrangement from the monopolists' point of view.

THE CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE HAS GIVEN way a little in its stand against increased margins on future grain contracts. While rejecting the Secretary of Agriculture's request for a minimum 33 1/3 per cent margin, it has introduced a sliding-scale arrangement which will increase initial margin requirements by 5 cents for every 10-cent rise in quotations. On the day this new plan became effective, both wheat and barley rose 10 cents, thus automatically raising margin rates for these grains from 45 to 50 cents a bushel. But with December wheat close to $3, speculators can still buy contracts to the value of nearly six times their cash deposit. It is, perhaps, not surprising that there has been little sign of reduced speculation since the change in rules, or that although grain prices have been rather erratic in the past week, the trend is still upward.

IT IS A FUNDAMENTAL AMERICAN CONCEPT that a man is innocent until proved guilty by due process of law. Yet in Tampa, Florida, the old concept is being reversed for the special benefit of the American Legion. That organization appears to be worried about the growing strength and effectiveness in Florida of the American Veterans Committee, which helped defeat a white primary bill in that state. In partial revenge, Legion officials in Tampa recently blocked the efforts of the Tampa University A. V. C. chapter to obtain a donation of county-owned land for its clubhouse. Then they apparently told Dr. E. C. Nance, president of the university, that the A. V. C.—the whole A. V. C.—is a "Communist-front" organization. Dr. Nance's response was surprising, since he is reputed to be a liberal, and has, in the past, been friendly toward the A. V. C. His decision was to ban the veterans' organization from his campus until its members "have proved that the charges brought against them by the American Legion are not true." A hearing, at which such proofs might be offered, was scheduled for early this week, and we do not know the results as we go to press. Whatever they are, the hearing ought never to have been called and a liberal college president ought never to have succumbed to the prejudices of Legionnaires.

Political Justice in Eastern Europe

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

AGAINST fantastic obstacles, the peoples of the Balkan and Danube countries are fighting through a social revolution. The process is one The Nation has followed, and reported, with absorbed interest. During the short period since the war ended, old class relationships in Eastern Europe have been turned upside down, old ruling groups thrown out of power, old systems of ownership swept away. In some countries, the change is taking place by relatively slow and orderly stages; in others, through violent seizures of property and control and the forcible elimination of former owners. The degree of violence depends partly on the social and political background of the country, partly on the impact of the war. Where a country was devastated by invading armies and Nazi terror, where collaboration flourished and civil war raged, the revolution has taken a grimmer form. But only American diplomats in Eastern Europe, nostalgically consorting with the dispossessed relics of pre-war power and privilege, would demand of those countries a smooth, orderly transition to the new society—or, much better, a return to the old system of feudal elegance and comfortable corruption. These diplomats and their superiors in Washington succeeded long ago in convincing the Eastern European peoples of America's implacable hostility to the changes they have made; better a thousand Tsaldarises than one Tito. Is it surprising that the State Department's protests against electoral frauds in Hungary or political convictions in Belgrade or Sofia should be roughly rejected?

By its fixed reactionary policy, this country has forfeited any influence it might have exercised toward moderating the rigors of revolutionary change. Worse, it has encouraged some democrats in Eastern Europe to bet their political futures—even their lives—on the hope of Western approval and help. It was a British diplomat who said ironically and privately, a few months ago: "Poor Petkov! He's been living all this time with his head out the window watching for the American planes to come roaring over." The Englishman did not imply a "conspiracy" with the United States for a projected invasion of Bulgaria; he implied a feverish hope that the non-Communist Agrarian forces Petkov represented would win tangible American backing. The contrary is, of course, the fact. American intervention has been limited to manifestation of displeasure—to protests, denunciations, and a refusal to give credits to the governments of Eastern Europe or relief to their peoples. As a consequence, when the State Department denounced Petkov's conviction, his death was probably assured.

THESE facts make it the more obligatory for Americans who have steadily opposed the Administration's policy and behavior in the Balkans to express openly their opposition to the mounting attacks on non-Communist leftists in those countries. Their words cannot be misconstrued. The Nation has wasted no sympathy on fascists and collaborationists; we only wish that none was left in a position of authority in any European state. We believe the press turmoil over the imprisonment of Archbishop Stepinak in Yugoslavia was whipped up by clerical and anti-left propaganda in order to cover the complicity of the church with Hitler's agents in Croatia. The State Department's charge that the forced resignation of Premier Nagy in Hungary was no more than a Communist coup ignored, purposely we believe, the deep left-right split in the Smallholders Party and the conspiracy against the regime, established by solid clerical evidence, among the Horthyists and disgruntled ex-landowners who had permeated the party's right wing. Unlike our policy-makers in Washington, we accept as valid therapy the purge of those men who would, if they could, undo the revolution and make of their countries another Greece—or Spain.

But recent political arrests and convictions seem to have gone beyond the limits of legitimate political épuration. Men have been put on trial and convicted, usually on charges of treason, against whom no convincing evidence has been presented or at least published. Furlan, a Yugoslav liberal leader who supported Tito long before his government was formed, was lately condemned to death in Belgrade, although afterward his sentence was commuted. It is said that Furlan was a "British agent" working for the overthrow of Tito's regime, but if this is true the facts were not made public, as they should have been. In any case, the Yugoslav government showed wisdom and restraint in sparing Furlan's life.

We hope it will be at least as wise in the case of Dragolub Yovanovich, the Serbian Agrarian leader, on trial for treason. Yovanovich believed in cooperating with the Communists; he emerged from a German prison camp after the war to join the government of Marshal Tito. But he opposed Communist methods and policies and was rash enough to rise in Parliament and say: "The Communists are wonderful. They liberated us from the King and the church; it only remains for them to liberate us from the Communist Party." Yovanovich now stands accused of working for the British and of directing illegal propaganda against the government. But his record speaks in his defense and challenges the accusation.

So did the record of the Bulgarian leader, Nikola Petkov, hung for treason the other day in Sofia. Petkov's entire life had been spent in fighting tyranny. He had opposed the Bulgarian czars and, throughout the German occupation, waged a courageous struggle against the Nazis. His father and brother had been murdered on the streets of Sofia by collaborationists. With the end of the war, Petkov entered the Fatherland Front, but soon found himself in opposition to Communist policies and methods. He was ousted from the government, arrested, and charged with conspiring to overthrow the regime. Petkov admitted only that he had "wanted to rouse the people to fight the Fatherland Front at the ballot box." If a more serious offense was committed, no proof was offered that would have stood up in any Western court.

When Petkov was condemned, democratic newspapers in every country urged a commutation: several recalled the ironic fact that Petkov had rushed to the defense of Dimitrov when the Bulgarian Communist was on trial for his life in the Reichstag-fire case. (Dimitrov kept silent while Petkov hanged.)

NO ONE has even suggested that Petkov and Yovanovich were fascists or collaborationists. They were not involved, to anyone's knowledge, with Eckhardt or Nagy or Machek or the other disappointed politicians who, from their secure retreat in Washington, pretend to represent the interests of the peasants of Eastern Europe. The prosecution's attempt to implicate Yovanovich in their maneuvers, by accusing him of having "received a letter" from Machek, backfired badly when Yovanovich told the court first, that he was not responsible for people who wrote to him, second, that he had burned the letter, and, third, that the prosecution had framed the whole episode (otherwise why would it have had a photostat of the letter alleged to have been sent by Machek?)

Did these peasant leaders conspire against the governments they helped form or only oppose certain policies and tactics with which they disagreed? A coalition regime presumes differences of opinion and attempts to reconcile them. Socialists and left Agrarians are working with Communists in all the "front" governments of Eastern Europe, and Communists strongly advocate "unity" among the left forces there and throughout Europe. If men like Petkov and Yovanovich are traitors and conspirators, the evidence should be freely published. Not only are justice and the fate of individuals at stake, but the integrity of the left movement as a whole.

Lethargy and Panic

EUROPEANS who suffer through what is likely to be the Continent's bitterest winter in history should take comfort in the thought that they too are playing a part in the titanic squabble between Republicans and Democrats. If we had not elected a Republican Congress in 1946, President Truman would not have to be so circumspect about calling a special session to provide emergency aid, and if there were no election scheduled for 1948, the Republicans would not be so hesitant about calling it themselves.

It might seem, on first thought, that the dire need of millions of people for food and fuel would take precedence over all other considerations and that nobody but a stage villain would even dispute such a course. On second thought, it might seem still more natural for us to rush to the rescue of a starving, freezing Europe inasmuch as our failure to do so will tremendously improve the chances of the Communists in Italy and France and strengthen the influence of Soviet Russia throughout the Continent—a prospect that Republicans, in particular, would be expected to view with some alarm.

Yet all the President of the United States can do in this historic emergency is to suggest to Congressional leaders that they meet soon to decide whether or not to call a special session in order to offer Western Europe, at the last desperate moment, a sum just large enough to provide a bare existence for a few weeks. Of the people of the United States, he asks only that they pass up every fifth slice of bread and be careful what they throw into the garbage can. And in keeping with this mild and leisurely approach to disaster, the leaders of Congress agree to call their committees into session by the middle of November, with the possibility of holding a special session in December that may provide the minimal funds by the first of the year. By the President's own estimate, the situation will become critical in December, and it does not take more than a week for mass starvation to develop. There is no assurance, moreover, that Congress will adhere to schedule. In spite of the most urgent demands from the White House—whether justified or not—it took four months to vote the requested funds for the Greek-Turkish program.

In justice to the President, it should be said that in an immediate sense he has plausible arguments for his policy of gradualism. He must do an educational job on a public that has been shamelessly bombarded with the falsehood that high prices are caused by our present relief shipments to Europe. Second, there is no way of limiting a special session to emergency legislation, and there are Congressmen who would see in the very urgency of a foreign-relief bill a chance to exact a quid pro quo like Knudsen's measure for reducing the burden of high-bracket taxpayers. And third, the President fears that a political-minded Congress, feeling itself under pressure from the Executive, might refuse to budge, in which case not only would the emergency bill be lost, but the entire long-range plan of aid to Europe would be endangered—with shattering psychological effect abroad.

With due regard for these arguments, and even for the unofficial reports that Mr. Truman is prepared to call a special session himself in December if Republican leaders fail to do so, we still feel that the President is seriously at fault for having allowed the situation to deteriorate to its present appalling level. He must have known last July, when Congress was still in session, what every casual observer knew: that Western Europe's resources were tragically inadequate to meet the needs of the coming winter and that its dollar supply was swiftly approaching the vanishing-point. Yet several times during the summer he indicated that no special session would be necessary. As recently as September, he idled back from Rio de Janeiro on a three weeks' cruise instead of flying back to dramatize the emergency. He has done little to rouse the country to the true state of affairs, and even now, while he speaks gravely of urgency, he gives his blessing to the journey of Senator Bridges, whose vital Appropriations Committee cannot meet until he returns, in the middle of November, from a personal-inspection tour of Europe.

The cold mechanics of politics, hard to transcend in any case, are certainly not to be overcome by alternating currents of lethargy and panic. The Constitution lays down the duties of the President, but no document can prescribe those human qualities that make the difference between office-holding and leadership. In the matter of European reconstruction, as in other matters, we believe the President to be well intentioned, but he will have to show a lot more boldness than he has so far displayed if Western Europe is to be saved from chaos. As for dilatory Congressmen, we call to their attention Marquis Child's interesting report from Rome that the Soviets, with a wheat surplus on hand, are waiting for the psychological moment. When the Italians reach the starvation level and find themselves unable to live on words from Capitol Hill, the Russians will send in the precious grain—and the battle for Italy will be over.

Palestine and Other Disputes

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, October 6

WHEN it was rumored that the session of the Palestine Committee had been called off last Saturday afternoon so that delegates could get out to Ebbett's Field for the fifth game of the World Series, most denizens of the press gallery hailed the news as a sign of awakening good sense. For the play at Flushing and Lake Success last week had been dreary and uninspired. No Lavagetto by any other name had bounced a double off the back wall. No Gionfriddo had plucked defeat out of the blue. And contempt for umpires' decisions—investigation-committee reports they are called out here—was at an all-time high. The battle of peace, last week, was a murky affair.

The rhetoric and recriminations which have come to be regarded as a necessary part of the plenary sessions have been carried over into the committees. And what is doubly exasperating, those who have been making the most use of their parliamentary right of debate have shown the greatest reluctance to accept the will of the majority—another quaint democratic tradition. On Wednesday we heard the acting head of the Arab League threaten to drench the Holy Land in blood if the majority report of the Palestine investigating committee was adopted by the Assembly. And all the week, in the sessions of the Political Committee, the Slavic group—eloquent in their denunciations of Greek fascism and American and British imperialism—refused to admit the validity of a General Assembly committee as one means of helping settle the Balkan dispute. This is not merely an archaic reiteration that absolute national sovereignty must be considered the inviolable bastion of peace. It is also a flat refusal to accept any justice in the claims of a dissenter; it is insistence that all right is on one side; it is branding the opposition as the enemy, the blackguard, the warmonger. If the United Nations is a school of international democracy, quite a few members are still in the kindergarten.

PROBABLY the best and strongest speech this week was made on Friday by Paul-Henri Spaak of Belgium, the president of last year's General Assembly. It was pretty plain that he did not have much use for the present Greek government. It was also evident that he thought the Slav states were drawing a long bow when they laid all the blame for the Balkan trouble on the imperialist shenanigans of England and the United States. But chiefly he drove home the point that hours and days of mutual recrimination were getting nobody anywhere. "The important thing," he said, "is to settle the Balkan problem; let us get out of the deadlock where we have been left by the Security Council and let us show the world that the Assembly is capable of doing something practical and reasonable in order to put an end to the conflict which even today shows it may become grave in the future." Mr. Spaak's words, which were listened to with an attention given to few speeches in that committee, may have had something to do with Herschel Johnson's surprise statement on Saturday that the United States was prepared to leave the guilt paragraph out of the American resolution.

BUT Mr. Spaak was emphasizing a truth that went far beyond the Greek issue to the very heart of the United Nations' present difficulties. There must, of course, be freedom of discussion—and in the world as now constituted that means freedom to give ideological dissertations, accusatory harangues, and partial expositions of history past and present. But at some point in the debate the supremacy of the world parliament, the supremacy of the Assembly, must be asserted. It is possible for the legalists to point out the limitations of the Assembly as written into the Charter. It is possible for the mechanics to suggest ways in which administrative defects can be repaired. (There is a thoroughly useful report on procedural reforms which this Assembly will discuss before the end of the session. There is more than a spark of a good idea in the American plan for a "Little Assembly," which of course will not pass in its present form.) But no legalistic dialectic and no mechanical tinkering can be taken as a substitute for the will of the majority to make the Assembly work as the instrument for world peace.

It is perfectly clear that the authority of the Assembly has not yet been established. And one basic reason is that maintaining the balance of power is still the major concern—particularly among the great powers. Take the stupid business of the third seat on the Security Council. It was proper that Canada should replace Australia. Granting the new solidarity of the Latin American bloc, it was proper—or inevitable—that Argentina should replace Brazil. Why was it, then, not proper that the Ukraine should replace Poland? The Anglo-American argument ran that the Ukraine was actually an integral part of the Soviet Union—as it probably is—and that some more independent state like Czechoslovakia should go on. But Czechoslovakia did not choose to run, and why should Britain and the United States decide which of the Eastern group should get on the Council? Isn't the Ukraine a member in good standing of the United Nations? And are the Ukraine and Manuiski much harder to swallow than Greece and Tsaldaris or Argentina and Perón? It is true that India has a valid claim in its own right for a post on the Council, a claim which Mrs. Pandit stated clearly. Probably on the basis of size and geographic significance it should be a permanent member. But in the immediate situation this is beside the point. What we have seen has been a misguided effort to upset an existing arrangement for the Security Council, and it should not have been allowed to develop. Probably by the time this article is in print the Ukraine will have been elected and some—but not all—of the damage will be repaired.

But if the mishandling of the Security Council issue showed shortsightedness, at this moment there seems grave danger that the prestige of the Assembly is going to be dealt an even greater blow by the shrewd maneuverings of the powers on Palestine. Were it not for the underlying preoccupation with the balance of power, the Palestine problem could unquestionably be settled along the lines of the majority report. The Arabs have not improved their case by their testimony in this Assembly. The threats of Jamal Hussein irritate rather than impress. On the other hand, the moderation, firmness, and reason of Rabbi Silver reinforced the conclusion most delegates have reached that the majority report should be accepted and implemented. But no effective action could be taken unless backed solidly by the United States. And at the end of the week the United States was still silent. Probably narrow considerations of Middle East strategy are making it hesitate. Next week may show whether the United States has the imagination to seize world leadership in an issue where the way of justice is clearly marked.

Interested readers may purchase copies of the Nation Associates' new memorandum to the General Assembly, "Could the Arabs Stage an Armed Revolt Against the United Nations?" by writing to 20 Vesey Street, Room 1010. The price is 50 cents.

What Keeps Them Apart?

BY JOSEPH E. JOHNSON

IT USED to be thought—and apparently still is by some people—that foreign affairs and foreign policy should and could be separated from domestic affairs and domestic politics. In a limited sense and with respect to limited issues, that is true. Under the wise leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull the United Nations organization was successfully established on a non-partisan basis. Partisan politics were likewise set aside in the negotiation of the peace treaties with Italy, Finland, and the Axis satellites in the Balkans.

Nevertheless, in general it is impossible to separate foreign affairs from domestic, and it becomes increasingly so as the issues in foreign affairs involve economic considerations. Attempts to treat them as separate are sometimes fantastic: one recalls, for instance, the recent nearly successful effort to place a higher tariff on wool just when United States officials were trying to negotiate trade agreements in Geneva.

Not only can foreign and domestic issues not be separated, but in the opinion of many persons both here and abroad the most important question to which makers of foreign policy in all countries need an answer is primarily an American domestic problem: Are we going to have a depression? Foreign statesmen, notably those in the Kremlin, are already basing their policies on their guesses as to the answer. On whether or not a depression is in the offing, and on how we deal with it if it comes, hangs not only the success of the Marshall proposal but so much more besides as to stagger the imagination.

So indissolubly linked are foreign and domestic policy as to call into question the validity of the old maxim that "politics should stop at the water's edge." It is doubtful, in fact, whether politics can stop at the water's edge: witness the present debate over whether to hold a special session of Congress to deal with the European economic crisis.

The role of the United States in foreign affairs may become before long an acute domestic political issue.

JOSEPH E. JOHNSON lately returned to the faculty of Williams College after nearly five years in the State Department. Most recently a member of the department's new Policy Planning staff, headed by George F. Kennan, he was for the previous two and a half years chief of the Division of International Security Affairs, and in this capacity attended a number of United Nations meetings involving dealings with the Soviet Union. This article is based on a commencement address Mr. Johnson made at Williams on September 26.

There is a real question whether the effective fulfilment of our responsibilities does not demand radical improvements in our machinery of government—perhaps even to the point of amending the Constitution—to bring about a more efficient relationship between all those responsible for the various decisions necessary to the adoption and implementation of foreign policy. The difficulties and even dangers of such measures are many. Yet it is appropriate to recall that it was the inability of the Confederation government to deal successfully with foreign relations which led to the Convention of 1787.

The international scene bears little resemblance to that of 1939. And in many respects it is quite unlike that which in 1945 we hoped would confront us two years after the end of the war. The novelty of its present aspects should be stressed because that novelty is itself one of the most significant factors in international relations today and will continue to be important for some years. Our thinking is inevitably conditioned by the past. Time is vital, and the greater the novelty of a situation the greater the difficulty which statesmen and people have in adopting, in sufficient time, policies adequate to deal with it.

THE most conspicuous feature of the world that emerged from the war is that there are now only two great powers, two veritable super-powers, the Soviet Union and the United States. Eight years ago there were seven. Moreover, the relative stature of these two powers has apparently grown since 1945, as events have revealed that the United Kingdom, China, and France will for some time at least be even less capable of playing decisive roles than was expected only two years ago.

It would be difficult enough under any circumstances for the world to adjust itself to a two-power system: it must revise its concepts of the balance of power, of the relationships between small states and large. But the problem is rendered infinitely more complicated by two related facts. For one thing, neither the Soviet Union nor the United States is adequately prepared for its new role. Compared to some states, both had little experience on the pre-war international stage. Both must learn the hard way to play leading roles.

This lack of maturity is far less significant than the fact that the two great powers are the protagonists of totally different ways of life. This is not the occasion to analyze in detail all the differences—in economic and political concepts, in systems of ethics, in modes of thinking, in techniques of foreign policy. As for the question, "Can the Soviet system and the American continue to exist together on the same planet or must there inevitably be war?" the student of history must answer that war is never inevitable. It is only too manifest, however, that a conflict—what some call a "cold war"—has already begun. So the question becomes: "Will the 'cold war' degenerate into a 'hot war'?" The answer again is, "Not necessarily." In my opinion the American people by their decisions in the next few years will determine the answer to that question.

Two factors influencing Soviet-American relations do not always receive the attention they deserve. One is that the concept of friendly relations among nations which is basic to ordinary diplomatic procedure is apparently entirely lacking in Soviet thought and action. The experts say, and experience substantiates their claim, that for the Soviet leaders relations with all states except those directly under their control are always at best "non-friendly." As General Deane, chief of the United States Military Mission in Moscow during the war, phrased it, "There is no such thing as banking good-will in Russia." The other factor is the extreme difficulty which the Soviet Union and the United States have in even understanding each other. This arises not only from the differences in the two systems but also from the fact that barriers set up by the U. S. S. R. deny both peoples the information necessary to an understanding.

In the last few years a large number of Americans who had had no previous experience with the Soviet Union or Soviet diplomats have been initiated into the mysteries of dealing with the U. S. S. R. I have been through the mill in a mild way and have witnessed the initiation of a number of others. Almost without exception the methods and attitudes of the Soviet representatives have induced in the American negotiators a cycle of, first bewilderment, then frustration, and finally anger. In most cases, fortunately, understanding has come eventually.

The American press and people, too, are left confused and angry by such polemics as Mr. Vishinsky's recent speech in the United Nations General Assembly. Such feelings may be natural, but they are unnecessary and dangerous. Vishinsky said nothing the least bit surprising. He said nothing the controlled Soviet press and the Moscow radio and Soviet officials have not been saying for months. He used no new techniques. He merely took advantage of the occasion to put all the earlier outbursts together in one gigantic eruption before the whole world. The sooner we learn to take such performances in our stride, the better it will be for us and all concerned, including the Russians.

But if we find difficulty in understanding the Soviet mind, a single example will illustrate Soviet inability to understand us. Repeatedly, prominent Soviet personages have revealed a complete failure to grasp the American concept of freedom of the press. Vishinsky did it in his speech on September 19 and again in his press conference.

While the fact of two colossal powers facing each other, immature and mutually uncomprehending, is of first importance, the role of the "middle" states should not be underestimated. This is particularly true of those countries which are "middle" not only in size or geographical location but in social philosophy. Too often policies have been suggested which appear to disregard the nations with which we are most closely linked by heritage and community of interest. It is one of the great merits of Secretary Marshall's proposal for European rehabilitation that it was based on a recognition of the importance of the middle powers. If an effective plan is developed and carried out, Mr. Marshall might well paraphrase George Canning and say, with an accuracy lacking in the British Foreign Secretary's famous remark, that he "brought the Old World back to life to redress the balance of the New."

TO MANY the emergence of two super-states will seem less significant for humanity than the release of atomic power, and certainly the most novel and terrifying feature of international life today is that the atomic weapon is loose in the world. Yet in its international aspects the release of atomic energy is at present essentially an element in power relationships, particularly in United States-Soviet relationships, and therefore comes second in a catalogue of the dominant features of the international scene.

The phrase "loose in the world" is not intended to suggest that Soviet or any other scientists and technicians have developed an atomic bomb or are even close to doing so. I do not know whether they are or not. The only information I have on that point is based upon the confusing and conflicting public estimates made by General Groves and numerous nuclear physicists. The phrase is meant merely to underline the harsh truth that today, more than two years after Hiroshima, the world is apparently no closer to effective international control of atomic energy than it was in January, 1946, when the U. N. General Assembly passed the resolution setting up the Atomic Energy Commission.

Many statements might be made about the international aspects of atomic energy—political, economic, strategic; I want to make just two. The first is my personal conviction, based upon close association with the subject for many months, that the proposal of the majority of the U. N. Atomic Energy Commission represents the only viable approach to effective international control of atomic energy. The second is that, in view of the deadlock that has developed, it would be dangerous self-delusion to ignore the possibility that the Soviet Union may have atomic weapons before international control is effected. As Professor Wolfers of Yale has said, if and when that happens, "a truly revolutionary change will have occurred in the military position of this country. . . . With every day that passes we are moving gradually from a position of unusual safety to a kind of earthquake zone which will be rendered livable for our urban population only by the hope and confidence that the outbreak of another war will be prevented."

Another principal component of the current international complex is the United Nations itself. Two significant aspects of the world organization seem particularly worth emphasizing. One is that the U. N. and its related agencies constitute a truly remarkable extension of the multilateral approach to the handling of international problems. The other is that its meetings are conducted in a glare of publicity. Despite Woodrow Wilson and the League, private bilateral diplomatic negotiations have until very recently been the traditional media of international dealings. While still important, they no longer enjoy their former primacy.

One consequence of these new factors is that statesmen now have an additional and different tool for the conduct of international relations. In Washington the question constantly arises, for instance, as to whether an issue should be brought before the U. N. or handled by diplomatic procedures. It is almost always a difficult question to answer, and the difficulty is enhanced by fear of criticism for "bypassing" the U. N. and by doubts as to whether the U. N. can bear the load. Another consequence is that new skills must be developed; negotiation in private with a foreign minister or an ambassador is a vastly different matter from negotiations with representatives of ten or fifty-four other nations while the world listens in. To present a proposal or argue a point not only to representatives of a number of sovereign states but to the press and public of one's own land, and of foreign countries as well, is a very sobering experience. Not many men, whatever their training and background, are adequately equipped for this sort of fish-bowl diplomacy.

On all sides one hears expressions of fear that the present tension in the General Assembly may be the prelude to the disruption of the United Nations. This alarmist point of view seems to me unjustified. One cannot disregard the tension, or the speeches which both reflect and contribute to it. But strong speeches have been made in the past; Molotov's address at the opening of the Assembly last autumn was not so greatly different from Vishinsky's last week, if differences in the personalities of the speakers be discounted. With all the sound and fury that has characterized the present session, neither of the giant powers is likely to risk the consequences of pulling out of the organization or forcing the other to withdraw. Each has too much to gain by remaining inside—if only to advance its own ideas of what is good for itself and for the rest of the world.

The High Cost of Innocence

BY BETTE W. PENZELL

Montreal, October 3

A LITTLE over a year ago a Canadian Royal Commission startled people in both Canada and the United States by issuing its famous "Blue Book" on alleged spy activities in Canada. Of the twenty-six people accused of subversive acts nine have now been completely exonerated, five were never brought to trial, two have vanished and are wanted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, seven have received sentences totaling thirty-seven years, and the cases of three are still before the courts.

The nine persons who were exonerated have attempted to return to their normal way of life but have met with discrimination and prejudice. Most of them have been unable to get their old jobs back and have found new employers reluctant to hire them. Though they were declared not guilty in a court of law, their reputations have been damaged. Moreover, each of them spent about $4,000 for his defense, and since they were persons of average income, their savings in most cases have been wiped out and they are in debt.

Of those acquitted Fred Poland, a newspaperman, has been one of the more fortunate. Poland entered the service in 1942 and became an intelligence officer in the Canadian air force. On February 15, 1946, he was taken from his home by the Mounted Police and charged with breach of the Official Secrets Act. A year later he was acquitted. Before the war he had worked for the Montreal Star, and he now has returned to his job, receiving the same treatment as any other veteran.

Because his defense had been so costly and his arrest, he believed, a mistake, Poland wrote a letter to James L. Ilsley, Minister of Justice, asking the government to reimburse him. Ilsley replied as follows:

My information is that . . . the Royal Commission found [the evidence] indicated that you had committed an offense against the Official Secrets Act. . . . This evidence was submitted to counsel for the Crown, who also were of the opinion that the evidence indicated that you were guilty. The magistrate was apparently of the same opinion, as he committed you for trial. I am therefore obliged to conclude that there was some evidence against you upon which you might have been convicted. . . . I am therefore not disposed to give favorable consideration to the request contained in your letter.

Agatha Chapman, another of the acquitted, was formerly an economist for the Bank of Canada and is now in England doing research work at Cambridge University. Before she left for England she gave a statement about her case to the press. In the fall of 1944, she said, the Bank of Canada lent her to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to work on national-income accounts. In late 1945 the bureau decided to create the job of chief of the National Income Unit. Miss Chapman was offered the post and permanent status in the bureau. In July, 1946, when the report of the Royal Commission was made public, she was told not to report to work, and the Bank of Canada put her on leave with pay pending outcome of the charges. In November, 1946, the charges against her were dismissed, without it being necessary for her to offer any defense.

Thereupon she reported back to the Bank of Canada, which suggested that she take a month's leave before returning to the Bureau of Statistics. In January, 1947, an oral examination was held for the National Income Unit post. Miss Chapman took it, but one of the other applicants was chosen. When she returned to her job in the Bank of Canada, the bank forced her resignation by not offering her proper reinstatement.

Matt S. Nightingale was discharged from the army a year before the commission's report was issued, went back to the Bell Telephone Company, where he had worked before the war, and received a promotion. After his trial and acquittal he was told, "It is not in the best interests of the company to rehire you." Though an electrical engineer with twenty years' experience in communications companies, he had great difficulty in getting another job and finally took one at a much lower salary than he had been earning.

Eric G. Adams, economist and industrial engineer, at the time of the Royal Commission's report was employed by the government's Industrial Development Bank. On his acquittal he went back to the bank. On December 31, 1946, he resigned, having always planned to set up his own practice. He says, "You can't categorically say that I am being discriminated against. On the other hand, every now and then a job will come up that I don't get and there's no other explanation for it."

Adams asked his lawyers whether he could hope to recover from the government any of the $4,000 which his defense cost him, and they said no. Since a suit against the government could be brought only with the government's permission, his chances would be slim, to say the least.

Dr. Israel Halperin at the time of his arrest was on leave of absence from Queen's University in Kingston, preparing to attend the Institute for Advanced Learning at Princeton. After his acquittal he returned to his teaching at Queen's, but he had lost his opportunity to attend the institute and spent $6,000 on his defense.

Dr. David Shugar had a temporary appointment as a physicist in the Department of National Health and Welfare. He returned to the department after being acquitted on the first conspiracy charge. Three months later, when he was to be tried again, he was dismissed. After a second acquittal he sought to get his job back but failed. His defense cost him $3,000, some of which he has regained through out-of-court settlements with Time and True Magazine for libel.

The three men tried for infringement of the passport laws—W. M. Pappin, Dr. John Soboloff, and Dr. Henry Harris—were all acquitted and have returned to their former work.

H. S. Gerson and J. S. Benning were both acquitted on appeal but have another charge to answer. There is a strong possibility that the Crown will not press its second charge against Benning. He was released without bail and is looking for a job. Gerson is ill and almost destitute. He was released on bail and cannot seek employment. The other case still to be decided is that of Professor Raymond Boyer, whose first appearance before the court this spring ended in a mistrial. His case will come up again in November.

With only seven convictions the government so far has a score of 30 per cent. The damage to human lives seems out of proportion to the accomplishment.

India's Brown-Shirt Brigades

PANDIT NEHRU, Mahatma Gandhi, enlightened members of the Indian government, and foreign observers are concerned about the emergence of a number of fanatical communal groups in the wake of the recent Hindu-Moslem clashes. Some of them openly call for the elimination of Nehru and other tolerant, modern-minded members of the government, the conversion of India into a 100 per cent Hindu state, and a declaration of war upon Pakistan. Pandit Nehru has described them as the "Brown-Shirt Brigades," and indeed they bear a strong resemblance to the Hitler storm troops. Like the storm troops they are largely recruited from the frustrated lower middle class and use the technique of the "big lie." No false statement about the Moslems, or even their non-Moslem opponents, is too foul for them if it serves to inflame the passions of the Hindu community and foster the war mentality.

The best-known of these groups is the Hindu Mahasabha, or Hindu Conference, which has a member in the present government. Another is the Hindu Student Federation. But perhaps the most dangerous is the Rashtriya Sevak Sangh, or National Service Organization, a body somewhat like the Hitler Youth but as secret and ritualistic as the Ku Klux Klan; the real name of its leader is not generally known. Many observers discount these groups as a lunatic fringe which has come to the fore because of the tense situation, but in Germany in the twenties Hitler and his accomplices were also discounted, as were the young army officers who helped convert Japan into a dangerous war machine.

Not one of these organizations is strong numerically or politically. The Hindu Mahasabha, which is the oldest and most closely knit, took a bad beating in the last elections. But it is capable of exercising considerable pressure on Congress through its many orthodox Hindu supporters. Some of the wealthy Hindu industrialists, including one of the Birla brothers, are reported to be supplying substantial funds.

A number of newspapers are under the influence of these groups. Some, like New Delhi's Hindu Outlook,

India's Brown-Shirt Brigades

BY ANDREW ROTH

New Delhi, September 20

PANDIT NEHRU, Mahatma Gandhi, enlightened members of the Indian government, and foreign observers are concerned about the emergence of a number of fanatical communal groups in the wake of the recent Hindu-Moslem clashes. Some of them openly call for the elimination of Nehru and other tolerant, modern-minded members of the government, the conversion of India into a 100 per cent Hindu state, and a declaration of war upon Pakistan. Pandit Nehru has described them as the "Brown-Shirt Brigades," and indeed they bear a strong resemblance to the Hitler storm troops. Like the storm troops they are largely recruited from the frustrated lower middle class and use the technique of the "big lie." No false statement about the Moslems, or even their non-Moslem opponents, is too foul for them if it serves to inflame the passions of the Hindu community and foster the war mentality.

The best-known of these groups is the Hindu Mahasabha, or Hindu Conference, which has a member in the present government. Another is the Hindu Student Federation. But perhaps the most dangerous is the Rashtriya Sevak Sangh, or National Service Organization, a body somewhat like the Hitler Youth but as secret and ritualistic as the Ku Klux Klan; the real name of its leader is not generally known. Many observers discount these groups as a lunatic fringe which has come to the fore because of the tense situation, but in Germany in the twenties Hitler and his accomplices were also discounted, as were the young army officers who helped convert Japan into a dangerous war machine.

Not one of these organizations is strong numerically or politically. The Hindu Mahasabha, which is the oldest and most closely knit, took a bad beating in the last elections. But it is capable of exercising considerable pressure on Congress through its many orthodox Hindu supporters. Some of the wealthy Hindu industrialists, including one of the Birla brothers, are reported to be supplying substantial funds.

A number of newspapers are under the influence of these groups. Some, like New Delhi's Hindu Outlook, ANDREW ROTH, roving reporter for The Nation, has spent the past year and a half in North Africa, the Middle East, and Central Asia.

are rabidly against the government. Others are nominally Congress supporters but emphasize an intensely communal outlook and distort the news to suit their purposes. Most Indian newspapers are no more impartial about Moslems and Pakistan than the Hearst papers in America are about Communists and Russia.

The attitude of the Brown-Shirt Brigades toward Mahatma Gandhi shows how fanatical they are. The Mahatma, as everyone knows, has long opposed certain aspects of Hinduism, especially "untouchability," and like every Indian with any humanity he has been deeply shocked by the recent riots. The Hindu Outlook says of him, "Complete annihilation of everything that is Hindu is the underlying theme of all his utterances and actions." He has also been accused of implying that "the Hindus were the aggressors in East Punjab and hence should not complain of the Moslem atrocities in West Punjab." His Calcutta fast is ridiculed: "No one attaches any serious importance to Gandhi's fasts because everyone knows that they have only stunt value!" All this because he tried to keep Calcutta Hindus and Moslems from flying at each other's throats.

Gandhi is even criticized for advocating the use of Hindustani as a lingua franca for all India. Hindustani is a combination of Urdu, which has a Moslem base, and Hindi, which has a Hindu base. The extremists want Hindi to be the sole language of India.

IF THE communal fanatics dislike Gandhi and refer to him as a "freak of nature," they loathe Pandit Nehru and call him the "evil genius" of India. Some of the Sikhs in East Punjab, who are linked with the extremist Hindu groups by their hatred of Moslems and of those who want to live in peace with Moslems, even talk of "doing an Aung Sang to Nehru," that is, getting him out of the way by assassination as Aung Sang was got rid of in Burma.

Nehru is, of course, very much more vulnerable to attacks by orthodox Hindus than is Gandhi. A Socialist and agnostic, he was obviously embarrassed during the Independence Day celebrations on August 15 by some of the Hindu ceremonies performed over him. Furthermore, Pandit Nehru, one of the acknowledged masters of the English language, is much more at home in Urdu than in Hindi, as is plain from his radio talks.

The fierceness of the campaign against Nehru is due to the fact that he is the least communal-minded of the Indian government leaders and has not considered religion in making his appointments. He would solve India's problems by economic and social advances rather than by a retreat to communalism. He hoped that after India became a dominion he could turn his attention to agrarian reforms and other aspects of modernization. Instead, he has been occupied with trying to prevent further murderous outbursts and with caring for the victims. On one occasion, in Connaught Circus, the very center of New Delhi, he personally rescued two Moslem girls from a band of Sikhs. Naturally he is anathema to the extremists. An editorial in the September issue of the Hindu Outlook began, "We impeach the Nehru government for betraying the confidence of the innocent millions of Hindustan." Nehru is also blamed for supporting Indonesia, which will be a 90 per cent Moslem state.

Nehru is not only attacked directly but also through his sister, Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, now ambassador to Moscow and delegate to the United Nations. The most recent issue of the Hindu Outlook accuses her of being responsible for Pakistan. One must read the actual words of the newspaper to appreciate the tortuous logic and the scurrilous implications of this lying charge:

British statesmen wanted India to be a united and a strong country which would be useful to fight the Russian menace. For this purpose they transferred the complete power to the Congress on September 2, 1946.

Certain incidents in America have changed the whole situation, and the British had to accept partition of India. In the U. N. Conference Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit advocated the cause of Indians in South Africa with great ability and ultimately India won the point against General Smuts.

The personal charms of Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit were mainly responsible for converting Molotov, the Russian Foreign Minister, to [the] Indian side, and that was the deciding factor in favor of India. Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit's friendship with Vishinsky is well known in international circles. But it was not friendship and charming manners alone that won Russian sympathy for India. Mrs. Pandit on behalf of India promised to form an Asiatic bloc under the leadership of Russia in return for this help. . . .

When the Anglo-American allies were convinced that the transference of power to Congress meant India joining Russia and thus strengthening it, they changed their original plan and decided to befriend Mr. Jinnah and the Moslem League. When Mr. Jinnah went to London through Mr. Churchill this friendship was cemented, and a plan to carve out a Pakistan state on the border of Russia was finalized.

For the doubtful advantages of winning the case of Indians in South Africa, India has lost its integrity.

Long live the charms of Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit and the international fame of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru.

The Brown-Shirt Brigades have also been campaigning to eliminate all Moslems from the Indian government, including some who are supporters of Nehru. For example, they accuse Asaf Ali, now ambassador to the United States, of having acted as a spy for the British, corresponded secretly with Mr. Jinnah, and diverted arms machinery from India to Pakistan. Similarly baseless charges have been brought against other Moslems, such as Maulana Azad, who have remained loyal to the Indian National Congress. All these are vilified as "aliens" and "potential fifth columnists."

Instead of a government headed by Nehru the extremists want a government led by "strong Hindus and competent administrators." Many political observers believe that these elements would be happy if Premier Nehru were replaced by Deputy Premier Vallabhai Patel, who is a much more orthodox Hindu and much more communal-minded than either Gandhi or Nehru. Patel, for example, was willing to preside at the opening of a swimming pool in Bombay restricted to Hindus—one can hardly conceive of Nehru doing such a thing. This does not mean of course that the Hindu "Brown Shirts" completely indorse Mr. Patel, or that he shares their ideas. A recent Hindu Outlook says, "Not only Pandit Nehru but even Sardar Vallabhai Patel is in a fool's paradise. The Sardar still thinks that it is feasible to build a non-communal state composed of Hindus, Moslems, and other minorities. . . . Hindus have still not realized that a new enemy nation has come into existence as our neighbor."

AS YET the Hindu extremists have obtained only one post in the Cabinet—the Ministry of Industries and Supplies, which has gone to the Mahasabhaist, Dr. S. P. Mukerji. If they succeed in eliminating Nehru and installing a premier and ministers to their liking, they will try to convert India into a "completely Hindu state." In this state all the Hindu religious beliefs, including the sacredness of the cow and the untouchability regulations, would become state doctrines, and professing Islam would be an unlawful act. The Brown Shirts want this Hindu state "to put itself on a war footing immediately." They have already advised the government to "prepare the country for war with Pakistan" and demanded that it "impose conscription and recruit all young Hindus to the army." One contributor to a recent issue of Hindu Outlook, after repeating a number of typical fabrications and exaggerations, wrote, "I beseech you to consider the above facts and start preparations to meet the danger by immediately organizing the Hindus for jehad [religious war]."

Although few believe that the Rashtriya Sevak Sangh or other extremist organizations are likely to come into power in the near future, police reports indicate that they may cause further strife in Indian cities. A careful study of the riots which have disfigured India so horribly during the past fifteen months shows that the initiative was frequently taken by the Brown-Shirt Brigades. For example, in the Bihar killings, in which 15,000 or more Moslems lost their lives, the Hindu Mahasabha element within and outside the Bihar government spearheaded the attack. The riots at Garmukhteswar in the United Provinces last fall were incited by the R. S. S., which sent men to the fair being held there to deliver inflammatory speeches and shout provocative slogans.

In Delhi R. S. S. men, wearing white bands round their foreheads to identify them, cooperated with Sikh firebrands to kill or drive out the very substantial Moslem minority. Apparently they had made long and careful preparations. The attackers had lists of Moslem residences in the various districts and divided their forces to "take care of them." In a few days they had killed an estimated 3,000 Moslems, burned and looted many sections of the city, and driven scores of thousands to Pakistan or into miserable refugee camps. After this performance their propaganda squads went into action and said that this had been simply a "preventive measure," that the Delhi Moslems had been preparing an uprising. As proof they pointed to the unlicensed arms collected by the army and police from Moslem houses. However, there is no evidence of any such Moslem plot in Delhi. Undoubtedly the Moslems possessed unlicensed arms, but so did the Hindus and Sikhs.

At this writing the fighting in Delhi has finally ceased, but communal feeling still runs high, largely as a result of the influx of refugees with tales of their terrible experiences. Responsible leaders like Gandhi and Nehru are trying to relax the tension by aiding the refugees and insisting that all the crimes have not been committed by the Moslems. The R. S. S. and other Hindu extremists, however, take the stories of the refugees, exaggerate them, spread them to all corners of the Hindu community, and attempt to organize revenge. Their activities offer a grave menace to the Nehru government.

Del Vayo—Prosperity Is Indivisible

IN MY last article I discussed the Marshall plan in relation to Western European socialism. This week I want to examine it in the light of Eastern socialism. Two recent speeches at the United Nations—the first by Jan Masaryk of Czechoslovakia and the other by Oscar Lange of Poland—provide an excellent point of departure, for they sum up most cogently the feelings of the non-Communist left in Central and Eastern Europe.

Officially Jan Masaryk belongs to no party, but I do not think it arbitrary to class him among those progressive Europeans who accept the fact that the future pattern of their countries includes a larger measure of Socialist planning. In Masaryk a flair for epigrams and a curious blend of Slavic wit and Latin charm at times create the impression that he takes a rather light approach to world problems. But when he spoke at the General Assembly, he was in deadly earnest.

Oscar Lange is a long-standing member of the Polish Socialist Party and a distinguished economist. His address was one of the most penetrating analyses of Europe's economic tragedy the U. N. delegates have heard; it even won qualified praise from Willard L. Thorp, American representative on the Economic Commission. It will be said, of course, that Lange, like Masaryk, speaks for the Kremlin. But I am convinced that were he still a professor of economics at the University of Chicago, totally divorced from politics, he would have said exactly the same things.

Masaryk and Lange agreed that Europe is already firmly committed in the direction of socialism and will resist any attempt to force it back into the pre-war mold. With polite but ironic regret that his words might send shivers up the spines of certain countries which have flourished under rugged individualism, Masaryk declared that "nationalization of important parts of industry has become the irretrievable program of Europe today."

Lange built a remarkable case for socialist planning by comparing the achievements of his own country since the war's end with the proposals of the Paris conference. Taking the first recommendation of the sixteen-nation report, on the production effort, he pointed out that the index of Polish industrial production in the first six months of this year was 95 per cent of the pre-war monthly average. Moreover, Poland's increased coal output is contributing greatly to general European recovery. In regard to the recommendations on internal financial stability, he indicated that Poland has already attained the goals set by the Paris conference: prices have been stabilized and the Polish treasury shows a surplus for this year. As for economic cooperation among the participating countries, he revealed that although Polish trade with the Soviet Union is higher than ever before, it represents only 43 per cent of total exports, 57 per cent going to other countries. With hard facts and figures he demolished the arguments of the Western bloc-builders. Lange's speech should be reprinted in full and distributed among all those who prefer peace without a number to World War III. Paraphrasing Litvinov's historic sentence about the indivisibility of peace, the Polish spokesman warned his listeners that "prosperity, too, is indivisible."

A survey of what has happened since the Marshall plan was first proposed shows that Lange was not simply talking for effect. Negotiations to revive trade between East and West have been going on as steadily as if the famous "iron" curtain were really made of paper. Nor is it only the small countries which are seeking such trade; since August one of the major partners in the democratic crusade, Great Britain, has been carefully reexamining its commercial ties with other nations in the hope of securing an export market in the Balkans. Britain is desperately anxious to obtain from Eastern Europe raw materials, poultry, cheese, and other dairy products which it has been forced until now to import from distant colonies and dominions. And despite all the verbal warfare at Flushing Meadow, the Labor government is at this moment preparing to reopen negotiations for a trade agreement with Russia. This was Sir Stafford Cripps's first act as Britain's new "economic czar."

European recovery would have made far more rapid progress by now had the economic problem not been treated as a football in a contest between opposing power blocs. It ought rightly, Lange said, to have been the task of the United Nations from the start. He paid special homage to the work of the Economic and Social Council. Most of the talk in the U. N. corridors these days revolves about the failures of the world organization, and it was a refreshing change to listen to the Polish delegate's constructive examination of the work that has been accomplished. The press and radio have continuously played up the clash and bluster of the Security Council meetings and paid little attention to the problems handled by the Economic and Social Council in the past twelve months. It has, for example, prepared a scrupulously detailed report on economic conditions in Europe, including proposals for meeting the most urgent needs. The U. N., through the work of its specialized agencies, might become the fulcrum of the reconstruction effort. But the Economic Council and all its allied agencies were deliberately bypassed in the Marshall plan. Assurances that Secretary General Lie would be kept informed of decisions reached at the Paris conference did nothing to change the unilateral character of the American proposal.

Leaving aside its political implications, Lange believes that from the strict viewpoint of effective aid the report of the Paris conference has many pitfalls. Most of the foreign capital investments will be concentrated in Western Europe, among sixteen nations which constitute no economic entity. Only a United Europe will ever know peace, reconstruction, and prosperity. The present form and intention of the Marshall plan cannot satisfy any genuine Socialist whether he lives in the East or the West.

Second-Class Children

BY GILBERT LAUE

IN THE United States, in the bread-basket of the world, there are children who can never have a second helping of food; children who never had a whole apple or a whole orange; babies who can't have the cod-liver oil the clinics prescribe; little girls who never wore a dress that wasn't second hand. These are the children whose fathers have died or deserted them, or whose parents were not married, or whose homes were broken up by divorce or the father's physical or mental incapacitation. These are the recipients of "aid to dependent children," as provided by the Social Security Act.

So that these boys and girls can have food, shelter, and clothing, and so that they can go to school, the federal government will match state-aid payments up to a combined maximum of $24 a month for one child and $15 a month for each additional child. Twelve states actually meet only the former federal maximum payments of $18 and $12. Some states add money to federally matched funds, up to specified limits. A few set no artificial ceiling on the cost of growing up, but in some of these aid is only rendered in "approved" cases. If the health and welfare of all of our future citizens is important, if we are unwilling that some of them should be given a second-class opportunity from the start, then every state must remove the ceilings on aid to dependent children and the strings attached to that aid. Average monthly assistance per family (not per child), as this year started, ranged from $26.32 in Mississippi—Texas awards just 20 cents more—to $107.77 in the state of Washington.

In Indiana the limit is set at $35 a month for a mother and one child. The Lake County Department of Public Welfare in that state, generally recognized as one of the best local departments in the country, decided to look into the results of this arbitrary maximum. Here are some of the conditions it uncovered:

A family living in a basement which is flooded after every rain; a mother and six children crowded into two basement rooms; three families sharing one broken toilet on the back porch; a mother who has put off a needed operation for ten years; five growing children dividing a quart of milk a day; three brothers who stayed out of school for two weeks because they had no shoes; a family whose aid-to-dependent-children grant lasts just eighteen days—the rest of the month the family borrows from the neighbors, or lives on beans and potato soup.

The department found one mother who had been able to see just two movies in sixteen years; another whose recreation was "going to town to get medicine"; children who are excluded from school because they are unkempt; children who eat at noontime only the extra sandwiches brought especially for that purpose by their compassionate classmates.

In many homes from three to ten people were jammed into one room. Family after family filled themselves with starchy foods, never able to purchase the "basic seven" the children are told about at school. Frequently no recreation could be afforded. Games, movies, newspapers, and radios cost money, and some sort of standard in dress is required for going to church, belonging to the Scouts, or taking part in school activities. And, finally, the department found excessive tuberculosis rates, much nervousness, slowness in school, postponed operations, slow starvation, and one death from malnutrition.

This is how dependent children are aided in the great Calumet industrial region, home of "the world's largest steel mills" and "the world's largest oil refinery."

Because anything is better than seeing their children hungry, many mothers go to work. The children may be left alone all day—but they will eat. Often a mother waits on table from six to midnight, and hopes against hope that the reports of her eldest daughter's sex delinquency aren't true. Other mothers move in with relatives although they know they aren't welcome, although their sons and daughters are told every day that they are a burden and a nuisance.

Anything is better than having no roof over your children's heads. So if a man offers to pay the rent, can a mother say no? If she takes it, she can stretch the government check to cover other necessities—until she gets caught and the government aid is cut off.

But the Lake County Department of Public Welfare found not only poverty, sickness, misery, and fear; it found courage and even hopefulness among these mothers. It found them confident that "things will be better some day." They say: "Maybe, I can get a good job next month. . . . Maybe, my daughter will get a raise. . . . Maybe, my son can stay in school. . . . My health may be better next month. . . . Maybe, we can get an apartment of our own. . . . Maybe, I can move away where people won't know my baby is illegitimate . . . next month or next year . . . or the next.

GILBERT LAUE is a public-relations consultant for health and welfare agencies, and a former editor of Public Welfare.

Things will really get better only when Americans face the fact that many children in this well-fed country are hungry most of the time, when the general public recognizes the disgraceful inadequacy of the aid-to-dependent-children stipend, and when state legislators and national Congressmen no longer have the face to tell their constituents that $24 a month is luxury.

Is adequate aid to dependent children too expensive? In Indiana, an average state in terms of income, it would cost less than 85 cents per capita per year to give dependent children a diet including the "seven basic" foods and to provide decent housing and decent clothes to wear. It would tax each Indiana citizen less than the price of a haircut. To offset part of the handicap imposed on a child for being dependent in a low-income state, the Social Security Act can and should be amended to provide for greater federal aid to poorer states.

It goes without saying that the princely maximums of $24 and $15 for federal matching should be done away with altogether. The cost of raising a fatherless child is too often illogically balanced against taxes. It can really be balanced only against the cost of having failed our future citizens, the greatest resource of our democracy.

Can Private Capital Go Abroad?

BY S. BERACHA

[The memorandum which follows answers a question thousands of Americans have been asking: In these days of huge government loans and other plans for the resuscitation of broken European economies what are the chances for private investment in Western Europe? M. Beracha, who is Economic Adviser to the French government, sent this explanation to Sylvia Porter, financial editor of the New York Post, who quoted a few sentences from it in a recent column. We are indebted to Miss Porter and her paper for permission to publish M. Beracha's full statement.]

THERE has been a great deal of discussion recently about the desirability of foreign private investments in France and other European countries as opposed to foreign government loans.

It is quite evident that France, with its controlled economy and with the majority of its key industries nationalized, prefers government loans to private investments. This is not, however, always in the interest of the lending nation; not only for reasons of profit—although, theoretically at least, an investment brings in more than a loan—but also because public loans always present budgetary problems which are avoided by private investment.

On the other hand, private foreign investors will encounter great technical difficulties in France and other countries as a result of those countries' over-all plans for reconstruction and the nationalization of many industries. As the economic systems in the Old World are today far removed from what is called free enterprise, its countries cannot provide the traditional securities of the capitalist system. The following are some of the problems which will confront foreign investors:

France, for instance, insists on the necessity of exercising ample control over any private capital which is to be invested in the country, in order to be able to determine the amount which should go into one or another industry. It cannot encourage the development of any enterprise outside the framework of the Monnet Plan for the Reequipment and Modernization of France. Moreover, it must limit foreign shares in certain industries in order to assure the industry's and the country's independence. Since French private investments are themselves controlled and directed, foreign capital would not suffer any discrimination in being subjected to controlled diversion toward essential industries such as textiles or paper. This would eliminate the possibility of its being used for the production of, let us say, Coca-Cola. In accordance with the decision of the International Trade Conference in Geneva, any foreign private investment would be subject to "pre-authorization" by the government of the country where it is to be made.

Another problem will be whether foreign investors will have the right to take their profits or even their capital out of the country without restrictions, once they have decided to liquidate their investment. This would be an extremely ticklish question, if it arose. Destitute countries, such as France, which have to resort to foreign credits just because of their trade deficit, cannot permit free movement of capital out of the country, at least for some time to come. On the other hand, France cannot possibly prevent investors from collecting their interest, since this would discourage all foreign investment.

France is therefore willing to find a temporary solution, one which would be in accordance with the principle of free disposition of profits or even capital. It would entail some restrictions in its application, restrictions which would be determined by changing conditions, essentially those involving the balance of trade. If, for example, outgoing foreign capital were balanced by incoming foreign capital, there would be no reason to prevent foreign investors from taking foreign currency out of the country. In spite of such difficulties, agreements can be reached between countries making investments (such as the United States) and those needing foreign capital (such as France) on the basis of the existing economic facts and within the framework of the International Trade Charter.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

European Customs Union—I

FROM the moment that the Marshall plan first burst on the world there has been much discussion of the possibility of a European customs union. To many people both in this country and in Europe the project appeared to be a natural, if not essential, corollary of the mutual self-help program which was to be a condition of further American aid. Nevertheless, it was at a fairly late stage in its deliberations that the Committee of European Cooperation turned its attention to the question. Indeed, it might have been omitted from the agenda altogether but for the prodding of the State Department and the insistence of the French and Italian governments, which seem to have reached some very realistic conclusions about the obsolescence of economic nationalism.

The British government has not been very enthusiastic about the proposal. On the one hand, if a customs union were organized in Western Europe, Britain could not afford to hold aloof; on the other, membership in such a union might prove irreconcilable with the existing empire-preference system. Conscious of this dilemma, the Foreign Office has been inclined to take the line that obstacles to such a project are too formidable and prospects of overcoming them too slight to make discussion worth while. Nevertheless, before the end of the Paris conference the British delegation did agree to join with thirteen of the sixteen nations represented on the committee in creating a study group "for the purpose of examining the problems involved, and the steps to be taken, in the formation of a customs union or customs unions."

Meanwhile, the report of the committee admits that Europe would benefit from the elimination of internal trade barriers. "The formation of a larger free-trade area in Europe," it declares, "could be expected to lead to greater efficiency in many sectors of production, and this would not only increase the wealth of the countries concerned but would also be of assistance in solving the fundamental problem of the European balance of payments." The report hastens to add that solution of this problem requires in addition cooperation with the rest of the world—an incontestable point, since even an economically unified Europe would be far from self-sufficient. Nor can one quarrel with the committee's insistence that formation of a customs union, involving as it must the most complex adjustments in the economies of the participating countries, cannot be achieved "by a stroke of the pen."

Despite the inconclusiveness of the report, it does represent a considerable advance, for never before has so definite an approach to the subject been made officially by so large a group of nations. Moreover, the meeting in Paris provided an opportunity for preliminary discussion of several regional customs unions of the kind already organized by Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg (Benelux). The committee notes that in the course of the conference France and Italy arranged for a joint investigation of the conditions under which a French-Italian customs union might be achieved. Similarly, the four Scandinavian countries are to examine the possibilities of eliminating their mutual tariff frontiers, and Greece and Turkey are to explore the question of a regional customs union. It is therefore fair to say that the idea of breaking down internal European barriers to trade is no longer the exclusive property of theorists but is definitely on the political map.

Considered from the purely economic point of view, the case for creating as large a free-trade area as possible in Europe is overwhelming. The Continent has great resources, human and material, which should provide for higher average standards of living than its people have hitherto enjoyed. But economic progress has been checked by a network of boundaries restricting the free movement of goods, capital, and labor. Before the war the sixteen nations represented on the Paris committee had a population of 206,000,000. That was an average of 12,250,000 per country—far too small to allow for efficient operation of modern industries which require mass markets to support mass production. Some half-dozen of these countries, for instance, have automobile industries, but between them they do not turn out nearly as many cars as General Motors does in an average year. The result is that despite low labor costs European cars cannot compete with American, while motoring is an unattainable convenience and pleasure for the European masses.

The present is in many ways an ideal time to lay the foundations for a free-trade Europe. In many countries industries have been shattered by the war; nearly everywhere they need retooling. Labor and capital alike could be saved if they were reorganized and located to serve Continental rather than national markets. Before the war severe unemployment in most Western European countries was so big a factor that advocates of free trade could not get a hearing; the whole trend was toward "protecting" jobs. Today most of the same countries are plagued by man-power shortages and are at their wits' end to find ways of increasing production. Free trade could make it possible to get increased production at reduced labor cost by enabling each region of the Continent to specialize in the industrial or agricultural activities for which it is most fitted by reason of climate, raw materials, location in relation to markets, and availability of experienced man-power. It is ridiculous, for instance, for Britain to grow peaches and grapes in hothouses at great cost instead of importing these fruits from France; the French, for their part would not, if Europe were rationally organized, duplicate British facilities for producing certain kinds of machinery.

Yet if the arguments for European economic union are strong, it must be admitted that the obstacles to be overcome are very great. They cannot be surmounted by any sudden rush but will yield only to the most patient demolition workers. It would be a mistake, therefore, for the United States to demand agreement on a customs union as a prerequisite to Marshall-plan aid. Yet we can legitimately press the point that gradual elimination of intracontinental trade barriers is essential to the kind of economic integration on which European recovery depends and still more to the future improvement of living standards.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Books and Bookkeeping in America

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

THE problems of publishing since the war boom faded and inflation began have been much discussed. Bennett Cerf presented the publishers' side of the case in the Saturday Review of Literature some weeks ago. May a few remarks be permitted a non-publisher who has written and read books for many years, on two continents, and under the most varied economic conditions, personal and general? The accepted explanation of the book crisis seems to be that the increase in costs of production and the fact that the price of the finished book cannot be increased in anything like the same proportion have created a situation in which only best-sellers with fat subsidiary rights can keep the publisher in business. It is said that a publisher today must sell at least 10,000 copies of a book in order to break even, and that the first 100,000 sales of a current best-seller netted its publishers only $700.

This is indeed a serious situation. Assuming that no sane publisher would dare to publish books which were not sure to sell at least 10,000 copies or have a good chance of being taken by a book club or sold to the movies, it is a situation that could actually endanger the development of American literature. For the development of any national literature is mainly dependent upon books which sell less than 10,000 and are not even looked at by movie scouts. Moreover, the absence of flourishing "experimental" literature would eventually affect the supply of best-sellers.

When I came to this country in 1936, I tried to find out why there were no cheap books, books selling for twenty-five and fifty cents. Everybody explained to me that booksellers would not order them and readers would not buy them. Shortly afterward the million-dollar market in pocket books developed.

To the newcomer other features of the American book trade were equally puzzling. There are certainly not enough bookstores, and the magic bookshop run by the scholarly book-lover which becomes a refuge and a haven for young and old fellow book-lovers is practically non-existent. It is my impression that the average American bookseller does not like books—and is therefore predestined for bad business, like a doctor who does not like people. He is in many instances uninformed and uneducated, and usually seems interested only in getting rid of his staple best-sellers. He is unable and unwilling to serve as an expert adviser to the more discriminating reader. The stock of the average bookshop is ridiculously limited if not small. The life span of a book is as short as that of a blue baby. To acquire an early title of even the most famous living writers it is necessary to search as for the alchemist's stone.

Why is it that Americans do not have and do not buy more books? In Europe an educated person, such as a physician or a teacher or a cultivated business man or working man, will most likely have a library of 500 to 1,000 books. Here, I often see no more than 50 to 100 books in the apartments of intelligent and cultured people—and I remember one outstanding publisher who had no books at all in his luxurious penthouse! There isn't a self-respecting family in Europe which does not own sets of classical writers and the collected works of outstanding contemporary authors. Before the war there was hardly a German family that did not have the collected works of Gerhart Hauptmann and Thomas Mann, or a French family without a complete Zola and Maupassant. Four different German editions of the complete works of Stendhal were available at the time. How many families in this country own the collected works of Hawthorne, Melville, Whitman, Mark Twain, Poe, not to mention Hemingway? Do not mention the standard European authors? As Margaret Marshall recently pointed out, one reason, and a scandalous one, why Americans in general are not familiar with the works of Henry James is that no inexpensive complete edition of America's most accomplished novelist has been issued in this country.

Of course, there is not much room for books in this country. The bookseller says that he cannot stock more books because rents are too high. The city apartment dweller cannot buy more books because he has no place to put them—the average book-club subscriber has reached the maximum capacity of his bookcases in about ten years. But in most apartments, nevertheless, there is room for more bookcases—and to me one of the curious things about this standardized country is the lack of standardized, inexpensive, and well-built bookcases.

This is a problem which the publisher might help to solve. It would certainly be to his interest to do so. Couldn't publishers do something to help booksellers get more space—and better-trained and more enthusiastic salesmen? Couldn't they encourage the manufacture of inexpensive bookcases and also the architectural integration of book shelves in apartments and homes? Couldn't they encourage book-collecting? There is no reason why the collecting of books—not by twos and threes, or even dozens, but by hundreds—should not be as widespread as the collecting of stamps. Today in America it is a hobby for the happy few.

As for the books themselves, is there no way of reducing the cost of production? It seems to me there might be more differentiation in format and price between books to be collected and reread and books to be read and thrown away. Why should a thriller be produced and marketed in the same manner as a first-rate work of literature?

On the other hand it might be a good idea if all books were printed first in a cheap edition, and those worth keeping then issued in a more durable and beautiful form. The French have always printed cheap paper-bound copies of a given book for the casual reader and special editions of the same book on exquisite paper for the collector. Publishers, if they followed this custom, could charge less for the ordinary edition, and thereby expand their market, and charge much more than they do now for the special edition. They would be performing a service to American literature by stimulating and developing a love for beautiful books.

As for cheap editions of good books, these would perform a service of another kind. Dickens's novels were first successfully published in cheap serialized issues like magazines. Why not try this again? A German publisher is now printing Shakespeare and Homer on a rotary press in the form of newspapers. It does not sound appealing, but it is at least a way of distributing literature inexpensively.

One way not recommended for improving the sale of books is an increase in sensational mass advertising, which apparently devours a great deal of the publisher's profit. Surely a book does not require and should not have the same kind of promotion as an automobile or a toothpaste. The money might better be spent on improving distribution, on improving quality of design, on developing better bookstores, on inculcating the bookstore habit, on furthering good literary criticism, and on increasing the dignity, the charm, the value, and the availability of books.

DEMOCRACY AND EMPIRE IN THE CARIBBEAN. By Paul Blanchard. The Macmillan Company. $5.

IF YOU could take a magic plane equipped with a glass floor and wing your way out over the islands of the Caribbean, they would appear, so our author assures us, like "tiny discs of serenity in a blue-green sea." But step ashore on any of them from commercial plane or steamer and you soon discover that their apparent serenity is deceptive. As a matter of fact, the islands are a boiling caldron of misery and mass discontent. And to show the reasons why is the purpose of Mr. Blanchard's remarkable synthesis of history and descriptive sociology, succinctly packed into the 379 pages of this book.

Throughout the Caribbean islands the primary problems are economic and imperialistic, but because the overwhelming majority of their colonial inhabitants are Negroes and Negroids these issues become entwined with those of race and color. Only Puerto Rico can boast a predominantly white population. Since

IN SEARCH OF BASIC ANSWERS OUR GROPING WORLD NEEDS THESE BOOKS

Here is thoughtful guidance, direction and substance for constructive thinking on the fundamental problems of life's meaning, of trends in civilization's progress, of the nature of society and of the self.

OUR EMERGENT CIVILIZATION

Edited by Ruth Nanda Anshen. Fourteen scholars of international distinction here trace the framework of a new unity of civilization and culture which is emerging beneath the apparent chaos of present-day ideas and ideals. The book makes clear both the need and the hope for a vigorous intellectual reorganization and affirmation of values for our time, showing how the breach between philosophical and social theory and practice may be overcome.

Main these typical chapters:

F. S. C. Northrop—Toward a Removal of the Ideological Causes of World Conflict
John M. Clark—Economic Principles of the New Civilization
Julian S. Huxley—The New Evolution
Wm. P. Montague—The Future of Theism
Jacques Maritain—A New Approach to God.

Norman Cousins, Editor, Saturday Review of Literature, says: "... a vital, well-balanced, seminal book of essays of urgent value to anyone concerned with ideas as means or ends." $4.50

SOCIETY, CULTURE AND

PERSONALITY—THEIR STRUCTURE & DYNAMICS

A System of General Sociology

By Pitirim A. Sorokin. "Historical or cultural destiny is primarily a poetic or religious conception. The arresting thing about Mr. Sorokin's books, including the latest which is a summary of them all, is that he seeks to make it a scientific one as well. Mr. Sorokin, who is Professor of Sociology at Harvard, marshals empirical evidence for his generalizations about the structure and destiny of social groups and cultural systems and relates them to the cluster of problems which he calls the crises of our age."—Sidney Hook, N. Y. Times Book Review. "Mr. Sorokin's contribution . . . may properly be set alongside the contributions of Toynbee, Spengler, Berdyaev, Brooks Adams, and first of them all, Vico. . . ."—Saturday Review of Literature. $7.50

APPROACHES TO GROUP UNDERSTANDING

Proceedings of the Sixth Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion

Edited by Lyman Bryson, Louis Finkelstein and Robert M. MacIver. "The most threatening obstacle to the attainment of our cherished goals . . . is the shocking failure of communication among men. . . . The 67 papers in this volume have been written by men and women who have devoted their careers to the building of bridges for cultural understanding, who have studied the gaps to be bridged and the nature of the spans required, who speak from the vantage point of a particular profession, culture, group or faith. And the editors feel that these papers, varied in approach and thesis, constitute a real contribution to the study of this central problem."—From the Preface. $5.00

PERSONALITY

A Biosocial Approach to Origins and Structure

By Gardner Murphy, Professor of Psychology, College of the City of New York. This volume surveys systematically the major facts and concepts which have emerged in the study of personality development. In a single, unified and coordinated approach the author interprets biological, psychological, anthropological, and historical data in the field of personality study, focusing upon the dynamics of growth and normal inter-action with the social environment rather than upon clinical applications. $7.50 they were acquired before the enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823, the fact that there are European colonies on our doorstep has provoked little concern in this country, even during those periods when we were exhibiting an unprecedented enthusiasm for democracy in other parts of the world. Of the groups of colonies in this region, three belong to European powers and one to the United States. In an area about the size of California live some six million people, without the bonds of a common tradition, race, language, or anything else. Even the British possessions, the largest single group, do not have a common currency. As a late comer in the imperialist game, we prefer to speak euphemistically of our colonies—Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands—as “unincorporated territories of the United States.” Perhaps this helps to explain our vacillating policies toward these dependencies as well as our exemplified generosity in money and material aid.

The three independent republics in the area—Cuba, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic, once a part of the mosaic of empire—are included in the author's review because they are within the American economic sphere and are influenced to a degree by the overpopulation and poverty of their neighbors.

Since history, with its numerous and diverse contributing circumstances, explains the present plight of the Caribbean colonies, Mr. Blanshard uses it as warp in weaving his background tapestry, his wool being the sociology of the area. The history of the islands, ever since their discovery by Columbus, has been violent. They have been under the rule of first one European power and then another. They have known African slavery and rebellion to the extent that the “odor of black burning flesh still hangs over the Caribbean, and no white ruling class will ever escape it.” Today the white man's rule is dying.

As agrarian appendages to their “mother countries” the islands suffer from one-crop and lopsided economies—most of them even have to import their food. Work in practically all of them is seasonal, and wages are unbelievably low, two to three dollars a week being the average cash farm wage, with urban industry paying not much more. In other words, the people are agonizingly poor in money and goods. Malnutrition and disease are almost endemic; illiteracy is widespread, since the few schools do not reach the masses.

Except in the American and French colonies, the people have little voice in their government. One result of the strikes and disturbances which swept the area in the late thirties, with their demand for economic and social reform, has been new political concessions, especially by the British. Jamaica has been granted an experimental constitution based upon universal adult suffrage and a two-chamber parliament; the income qualifications for exercise of the franchise in Barbados has been reduced and the number of voters increased. Although colonial governors continue in their habits and mode of life as proconsuls, they are by no means as reactionary as they used to be, despite the rather despicable recent arbitrary acts of a few of them.

Is there any immediate solution for these problems? Our author thinks not, for after admitting that the colonial system in the Caribbean is “undemocratic, antiquated, inefficient, selfish, cruel, and snobbish,” he has to recognize that the system is a going concern and will in all probability last for many years more.

As a State Department official stationed in the Caribbean from 1942 to 1946, Mr. Blanshard was in an excellent strategic position to study the problems of the Caribbean. And he made such brilliant use of his opportunities that his book is the best general study of the area to date.

California's Golden Youth

CALIFORNIA GOLD. By Rodman W. Paul. Harvard University Press. $4.50.

NEXT January 24 is the centenary of the discovery of gold at Sutter's Mill, and no doubt California will be celebrating the occasion with suitable pageantry. We may also expect a spate of books and articles recalling the more picturesque phases of the great rush to the Golden West. Mr. Paul's book, however, is not an advance section of the anniversary gravy train. It is a scholarly work, the fruit of long research, designed to dissipate the "thick haze of romantic legend and mythology" which settled over the mining country as a result of the literary efforts of Bret Harte and Mark Twain and, more particularly, their imitators.

This is not to suggest that Mr. Paul's book is worthy but dull. Unsentimental treatment does not detract from the fascination of the subject; moreover, the author has enlivened his pages by re-printing some miners' songs full of authentic folk melancholy and by reproducing some excellent contemporary prints.

Mr. Paul writes of the kind of people who went to the diggings. He tells how they got there; how they lived, worked, and acquired their skills; how they evolved a mining code; how the mining districts developed from frontier camps into fully organized communities. It all happened in the quarter-century from 1848 to 1873 which his book covers. First came the brief period of bonanza discoveries; then the years of gradual transition, during which the miners strove to compensate for declining yields by developing better techniques. The final stage saw a transformation to industrial maturity, with large-scale capitalist enterprises responsible for most of the output and the free and independent miner replaced by the "wage slave."

A point which the author might perhaps have stressed more strongly is that California provided the first example of democratic exploitation of the precious metal. Never before in history had a great goldfield been opened up on a free-for-all basis. There were no royalties to pay to either state or landowner, and in the early stages of the rush, when placers were worked with the crudest equipment, capital requirements were unimportant. Luck and energy were the only passports to fortune.

But the day of the independent craftsman proved short. By the end of 1851 the first flush of easy gold-getting was over and miners were forced to turn to techniques too elaborate for the individual or the small partnership. For a time the difficulty was overcome by the formation of cooperative associations of miners who pooled their claims and their labor. But the long-term trend was to capitalist enterprise. It began with the formation of corporations to build dams and flumes to supply the miners with the water they needed in ever-increasing volume. It was firmly established as the exhaustion of alluvial deposits turned attention to the quartz ore bodies, development of which required large amounts of capital.

Although the evolution of the California mines was so rapid, the gold rush, actually, was rather slow in getting under way owing to the lack of communications. The real stampede from the Eastern states and Europe did not begin until 1849. Meanwhile the early prospectors from the small American communities around San Francisco were handicapped by lack of technical knowledge. The Spanish Americans had a contribution to offer, but they were not made very welcome. As the rush progressed, however, it brought in men with experience gained in the now almost forgotten southern Appalachian goldfield as well as workers from the Old World mining districts of Cornwall and Saxony. The traditional skills of these emigrants were invaluable, especially in such work as tunneling and shaft-sinking. But it was not long before new problems and the increased necessity of saving labor inspired the development of new techniques and machines. Hydraulic mining—the use of powerful jets of water to break down whole hills of gravel—was, according to Mr. Paul, an original California invention.

The experience gained in California was a powerful factor in speeding mineral development throughout the West, for the state was the starting-point for numerous later rushes—to Nevada, Montana, Oregon, Washington, British Columbia, and even South America. The merest rumor of a new strike anywhere in the Rocky Mountain region was enough to speed hundreds of footloose prospectors on their way.

Gold launched California on its spectacular career and for a time completely dominated its economy. Whether the glittering metal added more to the state's wealth than it subtracted from it is a debatable point which Mr. Paul has sidestepped, perhaps wisely. Against whatever capital fund gold contributed to the development of more permanent resources must be balanced the vast damage to soil, forests, and water supplies caused by the mining methods used. On the other hand, here as in many another region before and since,

Although half a century has passed, the Dreyfus Affair still remains the most mysterious, the fishiest of all causes celebres. And here is the eternal plot: on one side the Big Brass, the ousted aristocracy and the subversive elements of the Church; on the other the intellectuals, the progressives and the people; in the middle, a defenseless dupe who conveniently happened to be Jewish.

In this keenly searching book, Herzog illumines the most beclouded details of the Affair, demonstrates and clarifies the ties between it and the entire French social, economic and political life since that time and offers a necessary tool for the understanding of France today. Obviously not a book for all comers, but a volume filled with rich rewards for readers who think.

G. B. S.

GENEVA, CYMBELINE REFINISHED, AND GOOD KING CHARLES. By Bernard Shaw. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

AT NINETY and more, not even a G. B. S. can be expected to add anything to his reputation, and it would be too much to say that the contents of the present volume—written between 1937 and 1945—will do anything of the sort. At best we get mostly repetition of familiar ideas; at worst something that sounds a bit like such a parody as Beerbohm might do of the real Shaw. But for all that, there is still an astonishing energy and a liveliness which would unmistakably identify any one of the more than two hundred pages. All the characters, including the Hitler and Mussolini of "Geneva," the Newton and Charles II of the other play, even the Imogen of the new attempt to improve Shakespeare, talk like Shaw rather than like themselves; but, in the old days, they define an intellectual position more sharply and clearly than their alleged prototypes could ever have done it and they take us again into that delightful Shavian world where everything is so inhumanly logical that one wonders how the world manages to keep in so much unnecessary trouble. The prefaces are short, for Shaw, but what other writer between nine and ninety could make what is probably nonsense sound so entertainingly obvious as the sentences which follow: "Plot has always been the curse of serious drama. . . . It is so out of place there that Shakespeare never could invent one. Unfortunately, instead of taking nature's hint and discarding plots, he borrowed them all over the place and got in trouble through having to unravel them in the last act."

The Opium War

FOREIGN MUD. Being an Account of the Opium Imbroglia at Canton in the 1830's and the Anglo-Chinese War That Followed. By Maurice Collis. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

MR. COLLIS'S previous books have not only shown him to be a gifted historian working in unfamiliar fields but established him as one of the ten best contemporary writers in English. Some, however, feared that his qualities were so much the product of his rare material that he would fail with a grosser theme. It is not so. "Foreign Mud" has for its subject matter an event which is recounted in any college textbook in Far Eastern relations, the Opium War between Britain and China. In itself the theme is a sordid one, and "Foreign Mud" might have been a raging and scornful tale, with consequent loss of moral authority and delight for the reader. Instead it is handled with restraint and objectivity; yet the moral facts are not in the least obscured. As Mr. Collis calmly describes it, British conduct might be summed up in two Chinese characters which Viceroy Lu officially prescribed as the name for Lord Napier, "Laboriously Vile."

Mr. Collis writes a lovely luminous prose, so that whether his material be of a Venetian voluptuousness or Rembrandtian gloom, his pictures have the formal clarity of a Canaletto and the softly glowing surface of a Vermeer. Nor is the style merely imposed upon the material. As if long years in the Far East had given the Anglo-Irishman an exquisite appreciation of good manners, there is in all he writes a delicate suggestion of ceremonial. The Western rhythm of his narrative is matched with a grave decorum, so that his humor has a rare piquancy and his unimpassioned censures an absolute authority.

The Opium War was not a strange byroad in history, "Foreign Mud," therefore, has less exotic charm than "The Land of the Great Image." And perhaps because the coastal ports of China have been often described, it contains less descriptive imagery than previous books. But the spareness suits the tale, and as compensation the volume is illustrated with plates that in themselves are a delight. I cannot praise the book too highly. It is a model for writers of history.

Fiction in Review

TIMOTHY PEMBER'S "The Needle's Eye" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $3) is a difficult book to write about because to praise it in proportion to its marked gifts of taste and grace is to praise it out of all proportion to its interest as a whole work, while to emphasize its insufficiencies is surely to deprive the author of an encouragement he very much warrants. Mr. Pember is an Englishman now resident here. His novel, set in England, is about the young grandson of an English aristocrat who falls in love with the young daughter of a radical journalist. Through Catherine Byrne and her father Harold Wick learns a new view of the structure of society; he becomes a factory worker and an active trade unionist. of Mr. Pember's sensibility. Indeed, its paucity of dramatic narrative is the major deficiency of "The Needle's Eye," a lack for which no amount of careful writing or delicate observation can compensate.

On the other hand, Mr. Pember's sensibility is not of the variety we usually find in plotless novels—and here is one of the chief signs of his grace. The author of "The Needle's Eye" is not himself over-subjective or primarily concerned, like most "sensitive" writers, with asserting his own emotional dominance over the common universe. Rather, he is over-concerned with the too tenuous states of feeling of his characters. This exaggerated interest in motive and response no doubt has its source in Mr. Pember's apprenticeship to Henry James. But the excesses which we forgive in the teacher because he has so much else to give us, unfortunately make for a good deal of tedium in the pupil.

Of course there is a pleasant anomaly in the mere fact that someone of Mr. Pember's leftist political leanings should have put himself to school to James. The choice must be recognized, I think, as an aspect of the generosity of spirit with which Mr. Pember approaches the entire business of writing. In these days, when it is supposed that one can become a novelist simply by self-proclamation, he brings a rare quality of respect to his craft.

Similarly, in this period when literature no less than politics is so busily engaged in dehumanizing the individual, it is remarkable indeed to find any novelist, but especially a "socially conscious" one, who has Mr. Pember's respect for people, who treats them as human beings, not as symbols. "The Needle's Eye" is a novel about economic inequality, but Mr. Pember, far from parceling out virtue in proportion to lack of privilege, and sin in proportion to social advantage, maintains an equal distance of insight and sympathy in relation to all the characters in his story, class heroes and class villains alike. Thus he is able to admit the weakness of Mr. Byrne, with whose politics he is clearly in agreement, and even to mock the extreme emotions of inferiority of an Indian fellow-student of Harold's at Oxford; and he is willing to acknowledge that Harold's squirearchical grandparents are people of large personal dignity and charm.

It is precisely because of these uncommon marks of merit that one wishes Mr. Pember could have conceived a larger narrative outline for his novel, that he had had more things happen, and that he had revealed his characters more through open dramatic conflict and less through reflection. That he is perfectly competent to handle a more open method is evidenced by the few scenes where he tries it—the scene, for example, where Catherine's father comes to say goodby to Harold at the home of his grandparents; or the scenes in the English nursing-home to which Catherine is committed when she has tuberculosis. How much more we learn about the character of Mr. Byrne from the one short passage in which he receives the brunt of upper-class inhospitality than from the endless pages of analysis through the eyes of his daughter; how much more we care about Catherine Byrne when she is permitted to lose her temper at a sadistic doctor than on the basis of her self-probings! It is in sudden moments of this kind that "The Needle's Eye" springs into full free life and that Mr. Pember gives us a glimpse of the direction in which he must work if he is to give us the compelling fiction for which he is, in fundamental attitude, so well equipped.

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE exhibition of fifty-eight paintings by thirteen contemporary British artists, organized by the Albright Art Gallery of Buffalo and now running at the Metropolitan (through October 31), is one of the saddest samples of recent transatlantic art that I have seen. The new French painters revealed at the Whitney late last winter were aesthetically corrupt in so far as they tried to make a show of vitality out of the patched-together debris of a great immediate past; but these British painters seem to function on a level of potency so low as to make the very faking of vitality, interest, or novelty altogether out of the question. They are sincere—which is not the same thing as honest—simply because they have not the energy to be anything else. Though the tendencies they embody are various, ranging from modified impressionism to the outrightly abstract, almost all the painters present are emphatically characterized by a lack of conviction that is most marked with respect to color but also affects structure, unity, surface, and everything else required of painting as an art. There is also an inclination, not surprising in the light of the past of English art, to weaken the influences of French painting in the direction of book illustration; uncertain surfaces, the false and meaningless diffidence with which paint is laid on, dull receding color make these pictures shrink to page size, and we forget that they hang on walls.

Henry Moore's tinted drawings are as tasteful and monotonous as ever. John Tunnard, whose abstract oil paintings used to show such remarkable quality in their drawing ten years ago, has declined into a kind of gimcrackery that plays with deep space in a way resembling Dali's; even so, Tunnard retains a bit of distinction. John Piper is an eclectic virtuoso of some skill but little importance. Stanley Spencer lacks that elemental subtlety without which painting cannot attain to the status of art. William Coldstream is represented by a single very sensitive landscape that, conventional as it is in its pre-Fauvist way, meets its own terms successfully; yet on this evidence he could hardly be called a serious modern painter. The most authentic work present, and that by far, is David Jones's singing water colors; however low their pressure and however derivative of Paris expressionism their means, these contribute a little something not seen before. Here the tentativeness is not misplaced, is not a result of the artist's difficulties with his medium, but a true and intended expression of his feeling. The other painters shown, of whom the less said the better, are Edward Bawden, Edward Burra, Robert Colquhoun, Frances Hodgkins, Vivian Pitchford, Eric Ravilious, and Graham Sutherland.

Bearing in mind Matthew Arnold's remark on "a tendency in Americans . . . to overrate and overpraise what is not really superior," it is with trepidation that I cite the more or less abstract student paintings of a few young Americans, none over thirty, as a demonstration of what begins to seem our superior literacy in the practice, if not consumption, of art. None of the ten artists presented—in a single picture each—at the "New Provincetown '47" exhibition at Jacques Seligmann's last month has yet achieved a personality, and there is still far too little assertion of individual temperament in their work: yet how high the level is on which most of them paint, how firmly they wield their medium, and with what awareness of the true direction of all that is serious in modern art. In this last respect at least three or four of them already paint more importantly than anyone at the British show; and at least seven of the ten embody a painterliness that none of the British except David Jones even surmises.

That "school" paintings could ever go this far in taste, sophistication, and competence in this country is something no one would have anticipated ten years ago. Think only of the crudeness we still see exhibited every year at the Whitney Annual by supposedly mature and actually accepted artists. Almost all of the exhibitors at Seligmann's have studied at one time or another with Hans Hofmann, and credit for the level of their work—in a country for whose art the question of level is the most crucial of all—belongs to him doubly. I doubt whether any other American group show this year will reach an equally high and consistent level.

By way of a postscript on the British show, let me say that I would hesitate to judge contemporary British painting on the basis of the evidence here. Museum directors had their hand in the selection of the pictures and painters for the show—and we should know by now what museum directors do with this sort of thing. Also, Matthew Smith, Victor Pasmore, and Ivor Hitchens are missing. (I have seen Pasmore's work only in reproduction, but I am sure that reproductions cannot lie beyond a certain point; and in this late impressionist the English may have one of the four or five best—or at least prettiest—minor painters of the new age.) I also suspect that, aside from the ineffable Burra, a better selection could have been made of the work of every one of the painters shown at the Metropolitan.

THE elementary beginning of true reason, that is, of reason which involves not merely the forebrain but the entire being, resides, I should think, in the ability to recognize oneself, and others, primarily as human beings, and to recognize the ultimate absoluteness of responsibility of each human being. (I can most briefly suggest what I mean by a genuine recognition of human beings as such by recommending that you see the Italian movie "Shoeshine" and that you compare it in this respect with almost any other movie you care to name.) I am none too sure of my vocabulary, but would suppose this can be called the humanistic attitude. It is still held, no doubt, by scattered individuals all over the world, is still nominally the germinal force of Western civilization, and must still sleep as a potential among almost unimaginably large numbers and varieties of people; but no attitude is more generally subject to disadvantage, dishonor, and misuse today, and no other is so nearly guaranteed extinction. Even among those who preserve a living devotion to it, moreover, few seem to have come by it naturally, as a physical and sensuous fact, as well as a philosophical one; and fewer still give any evidence of enjoying or applying it with any of the enormous primordial energy which, one would suppose, the living fact would inevitably liberate in a living being. I realize that I must be exaggerating when I think of it as hardly existing in a pure and vigorous form anywhere in contemporary art or living, but I doubt that I am exaggerating much: I know, in any case, that "Shoeshine," because it furnishes really abundant evidence of the vitality of this attitude, seems to stand almost alone in the world, and to be as restoring and jubilant a piece of news as if one had learned that a great hero whom one had thought to be murdered or exiled or corrupted still lives in all his valor.

This is one of the few fully alive, fully rational films ever made. And one of the beauties of it is that its best intelligence seems to have operated chiefly on an instinctual level, forcing the men who made the film, who are I gather no more than very sincere and quite talented, to do better than the best their talents alone might promise them and better, I imagine, than they planned or foresaw. I suspect that all they intended in this story of two street boys who are caught almost by accident into the corrective machinery of the state, and are destroyed, was an effective work of protest, a work of social art; and that it was more out of the aroused natural honesty of their souls, and their complete devotion to their subject, that they went so much deeper. "Shoeshine" is all that a work of social art ought to be, would have to be to have any worth whatever, and almost never is. It is remarkably perceptive and compassionate in its study of authority and of those who embody authority, serve it, and suffer in and under it. It is also the rarest thing in contemporary art—a true tragedy. This tragedy is cross-lighted by pathos, by the youthfulness and innocence of the heroes, and I suspect that the makers of the film were themselves confused by pathos, but it is stern, unmistakable tragedy as well. The heroes would presumably not have been destroyed unless they had been caught into an imposed predicament; but they are destroyed not by the predicament but by their inability under absolutely difficult circumstances to preserve faith and reason toward themselves and toward each other, and by their best traits and noblest needs as well as by their worst traits and ignoblest needs. Moreover, the film is in no sense a despairing or "defeatist" work, as some people feel it is. I have seldom seen the more ardent and virile of the rational and Christian values more firmly defended, or the effects of their absence or misuse more pitifully and terribly demonstrated.

The film is almost uniquely moving and heartening for still another reason. Almost every minute of it has a kind of rashness, magnanimity, and deep, wise emotional directness which, I am convinced, can hardly if at all exist in a piece of work unless those who make it are sure they are at one with a large, eager, realistic general audience: in other words, very large parts of a whole people must have been moved, for a while at least, by the particular kind of aliveness which gives this film its peculiar radiance. When that is the case, men of any talent whatever can hardly help surpassing themselves. But when most of a people are in apathy, or sufficient anxiety to stun the spirit, every talent or hope, no matter in what spirit or attitude it may operate, is reduced to a fraction of its potentiality.

Great works of art, and the best hopes of good living, could come out of this quality of spirit, as out of no other. This film is not a great or for that matter a wholly well-realized work of art. It has some very considerable virtues besides those already mentioned: one of the few poignant and maturely perceived "love stories" ever to reach the screen; beautifully directed playing by all the boys, who are all amateurs, and by several naturalistic and a few well-chosen florid professionals; and an illusion of spontaneity which, considering that the director, Vittorio da Sica, had to put his amateurs through as many as thirty-nine takes for one scene, is one of the pure miracles of fifty years of movies. And in spite of some near-stock characterizations and situations, everyone in the film bulges with a depth and complexity of realness that is immeasurably beyond the hope of mere naturalism; because everybody is perceived as a complete human being, one feels at every moment that almost anything could happen, and that the reasons why any given thing happens are exceedingly complex and constantly shifting their weight. In playwriting, however, and camera work, and cutting, and sound; though it is eloquent, supple, unaffected, and uninhibited, even the very fine best of the film is seldom sharply inventive; one is very frequently moved and pleased, very seldom convinced that anything has been done definitively. Such feeling for form as there is, is more literary than cinematic. But the quality and energy of spirit are so compelling, pervasive, and valiant that I never felt, and cannot feel now, the pain or anger that is almost inevitable in seeing a good thing fall short of its best possibilities.

I gather that this spirit is already fading in Italy; that audiences are wanting and movie people are preparing costume dramas and screen operas. I suppose that it seldom holds a people strongly in focus, for long; it is a terrible pity that no men of genius were able to take advantage of this moment. But a moment which has made it possible for good, less gifted men to make such films as "Open City," the still better "Shoeshine," and a few others which, by their reputation, I hope we shall see soon has been by no means completely lost.

A housing program desired by 60 million people is being stifled by hypocrisy, greed, politics and entrenched inefficiency.

Are you licked? Or is there still something you can do about a better place to live?

Here are the facts—and a program—by the country's foremost housing experts.

What's the Catholic Church up to?

IN MEDICINE?...IN SEX?...IN EDUCATION? THE ANSWER IS: "PLENTY." From official Catholic sources, published with the approval of an archbishop or cardinal, Paul Blanshard reveals policies of the hierarchy that will shock every American who values his "personal and intellectual freedom."

This is not a questioning of the Catholic faith. It is a documented report on the attempt of a sectarian group to force its social doctrines upon the rest of the country.

Isabelita's Trial

Dear Sirs: On August 7 last Margaret Richards, of the National Union of Students, with headquarters at 3 Endsleigh Street, London, flew to Spain as the only member of an international youth delegation of seven to be granted a visa by the Spanish authorities. Delegates from Sweden, Switzerland, Italy, and France were refused visas. The purpose of the visit was to investigate the case of the nine young Spaniards who had been held in prison for fifteen months for alleged anti-Franco activities. These nine young people, seven boys who were students and two girls, had been held without trial since April 30, 1946.

Possibly because of the many articles in the foreign press concerning the case (I wrote about it in The Nation of May 24) and the demonstrations in London and elsewhere in behalf of the nine young prisoners, they were actually brought to trial before Miss Richards reached Madrid. On July 28 they were tried before a court martial in Madrid, and the report was that the prosecution asked for five death sentences and four terms of thirty years. No confirmation of what the sentence was could be obtained in the days after the trial.

On reaching Madrid Miss Richards obtained aid from the British embassy in approaching the Spanish authorities. She requested permission to visit the nine young prisoners. On August 22, after many delays, she was informed that this permission had been granted her by the Director of Prisons, subject to confirmation by the Spanish Foreign Office. The British embassy again assisted Miss Richards in pressing for this confirmation, but on August 27 it was refused, with no reason offered.

In the meantime, working through unofficial channels, Miss Richards was able to uncover the full and detailed story of the case. The following is quoted from her report:

They [the nine prisoners] were charged with placing bombs outside food shops and restaurants on the night of April 26, 1946. No one had been killed, and the only two people, a night watchman and a little girl, to be injured, were not badly enough hurt to receive hospital attention. I visited the shops and the restaurant mentioned in the trial and found that in every case there was a political reason why that particular building had been chosen. Either it was a building run by the Falange, or it was a luxury shop, full of expensive things which the mass of the people could not buy. Moreover, I found that this incident was the third in a campaign planned as a protest against the regime. A few weeks earlier the students had pasted up posters displaying the Republican flag; next they had pushed under doors duplicated material copied from the clandestine press to draw attention to the crimes of the Franco government.

They were arrested on April 30. First, two of the students nearest to the explosion in the Reina Victoria Street were caught by the police and taken to Security Headquarters, where they were mercilessly beaten with whips and belts. Under this treatment they gave away the names of some of the others, who were arrested the next morning while most of them were still in bed. They were then held for twenty days at Security Headquarters, where they were badly beaten up, in such a manner that terrible scars were left on some of them. Not until twenty days after their arrest were they charged. It was never even alleged that all of them had actually placed the bombs; some had acted as guards in the street without knowing the details of what was going on, though all admitted that they had been involved in a common action.

The day after I was given permission by the Director of Prisons to see them, they were all removed to other prisons—the boys to Burgos, where prisoners are assembled before being deported, the two girls to Ventas, the women's prison in Madrid. There is no evidence that any of them have been maltreated in prison, but all of them are badly underfed.

At the trial, which took place fifteen months after the arrests, no witnesses were called, no previous notice was given to the press or the public, and the whole proceeding was conducted by court martial, with military officers as prosecuting and defending counsel. The Judge Advocate behaved particularly badly, shouting at the prisoners, sneering at them during their evidence, and indulging in political diatribes at their expense.

The prosecutor asked for death for five prisoners and thirty years for four. Defending counsel asked for six months for some, acquittal for others. The sentences, which were not announced, were twenty years for Isabelita Toralba, six years for the second girl, twelve years and one day for four of the prisoners, and fifteen years for the remaining three. (The point about the "one day" is that a sentence up to twelve years is affected by the "loophole laws," which entitle prisoners in certain younger age groups to qualify for remission of sentence and be released in a shorter time. Also, owing to the date of their trial, these nine young people will not qualify for consideration under the terms of the recent amnesty.)

In a recent letter to me Miss Richards has amplified as follows her earlier statement that the sentences "were not announced":

I meant by "the sentences were not announced" that they were not announced at the trial. Journalists found out by asking relatives afterward. The sentences were not announced in the press report which appeared, and which merely said that the court had adjourned to consider the verdict.

Miss Richards's report continues:

As I did not arrive in time for the trial and was not allowed to see the prisoners, I tried to build up a composite picture from many reports. I also attended three trials in the same barracks so as to be able to judge better what had happened to the nine. . . . The trials I saw were bargain-driving between prosecution and defense for the terms of the prisoners who pleaded not guilty. A significant thing was the way in which all the relatives and friends of the prisoners—who, like us, had heard by underground of the date of the trial—made space for us at the front so that we could be seen taking notes. Afterward, they came and shook our hands and thanked us with tears in their eyes for having come, since our presence had an effect on the sentences.

Again, in replying to my question about what was meant by "since our presence had an effect on the sentences," Miss Richards amplifies the statement as follows:

When I said that relatives came up to thank us for having attended the trial, "thereby reducing the sentences," I meant to convey that this is what they said. Many people told us this in general terms. The only detailed statement I had was given me by a man who has been in prison more than once for political reasons. He cited to me the case of a friend of his for whom a sentence of thirty years demanded by the prosecutor was not challenged by the defense. The Cuban legation had taken an interest in the case, and this man said that the presence of an observer from the Cuban legation resulted in a reduction of his sentence to twenty years. Presumably this was inference. He said also that another trial had been deferred because of the presence of foreign journalists on the day when it was to have come up. The British embassy also told me that Zoraa's trial has been said to be coming off on three or four occasions. Observers have been sent, and the trial has not taken place. Here again there is no proof of cause and effect, only inference. But I must say the inference convinced me.

The Shape of Things

IF YOU PRETEND A STRIKE ISN'T THERE, WILL it go away? For seventeen weeks now—115 days, as this issue appears—40,000 C. I. O. shipworkers have been conducting a "work stoppage" against three major shipbuilding corporations headed up by Bethlehem Steel. Yet one would hardly be able to learn of the event from the American press. For reasons not altogether clear, but apparently as a courtesy to the procurement agencies of the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission, an almost complete news blackout has been dropped over the nation's biggest current strike. Almost complete, but not quite: in full-page advertisements, Bethlehem has informed the public that shipyard workers are paid too much. What of the union claim that it was forced into the stoppage by the intransigence, arrogance, and deliberate maneuvers of management? What of the claim that Bethlehem, as long ago as the Congressional elections, saw an opportunity to break a union under the statutes which a reactionary Congress was certain to provide? What of the claim that the corporations have boycotted all meetings, since June, of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee—a tripartite board of union, management, and government representatives, set up by the government during the war and still in being for the duration of the national emergency? And the claim that, in so doing, the employers have abrogated a contract with the government? These are all valid questions, but they are to be found only in the strike bulletins of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, and in the union's letters to President Truman—all, as yet, unanswered. We shall try to dig deeper into these questions in a full report on the strike in an early issue. Meanwhile, we wish to call the attention of readers to the fact that the strike is a reality and a bitter one, complete with company scabs and hostile police. Seventeen weeks is a long time, and winter is just around the corner.

THE HERALDED OVERHAULING OF THE British Cabinet has come and gone, with political consequences hardly visible to the naked eye. The New York Times editorially professes to see in the shift another instance of revolution devouring its children, but this seems an unnecessarily lurid way to describe a shake-up that leaves a government slightly more youthful, administratively stronger, and politically exactly where it was. In a sense, some of the eleven veterans who were dropped or demoted were holding their portfolios only in order to give the younger men of the Labor Party an opportunity for seasoning. The one shift of consequence was the ousting of Emanuel Shinwell from the Fuel and Power Ministry, and, left-winger though he is, the devouring of this child of the revolution consisted merely in transferring him to the non-Cabinet post of Secretary of State for War. Among the rising stars in the Labor galaxy are Hugh Gaitskill, a professor of economics, who succeeds the peppery Mr. Shinwell; James Harold Wilson, who, at thirty-one, steps in as president of the Board of Trade and right-hand man to Sir Stafford Cripps, the newly installed and extremely powerful Minister for Economic Affairs; and George R. Strauss, succeeding John Wilmot as Minister of Supply. Bevin, Morrison, Bevan, and Strachey remain firmly fixed in their posts, and the Labor Party remains firmly fixed in the saddle. The Tories, in convention assembled, have seen fit to indorse the nationalization achieved to date, and even the Wall Street Journal's London correspondent advises his readers that Britain's difficulties have not been "due to the policy of nationalization." In fact, that paper begins to suspect that, revolution or no revolution, the British once more show signs of "muddling through."

EAST-WEST TRADE IN EUROPE IS BOUND TO increase, in the opinion of William L. Clayton, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, who has just returned from a trip to the Continent. In a press interview, Clayton said that while the revival of the Comintern might deepen the political division of Europe, no insurmountable trade barrier could be erected as long as there was peace. He insisted he did not want to be drawn into any sort of political discussion, but as an economist felt obliged to point out that once a normal rate of production is reached, commercial relations between the East and West are inevitable since their economies are largely complementary. Clayton's common-sense appraisal may help to restore the American sense of perspective. Even as commentators were predicting an irreparable split in Europe, the first shipload of Russian wheat arrived in an English port and Anglo-Russian trade negotiations were about to be renewed. Across the Channel, the French, who already have a pact with Poland, are negotiating agreements with several countries in the Soviet sphere of influence. Holland has opened trade talks with Yugoslavia. And there are reports of an impending French-Russian wheat deal. Whether in the Marshall or the Stalin zone, governments are too concerned about the needs of their people this winter to allow political obstacles to check the normal flow of goods. Increased trade between East and West will benefit not only the people of the Continent but the American taxpayers, who will have to shoulder the burden of the Marshall plan.

REPRESENTATIVES HOFFMAN AND BUSBEY are men who burn at injustice—to Hoffman and Busbey. The quality is all the more striking in view of their indifference to injustices suffered by those second-class Americans who do not sit in Congress. At the moment, the two Representatives are at white heat because their names are included in a special security file of the Civil Service Commission, a list of uninvestigated but possibly subversive individuals who might some day apply for government jobs. Like victims of their own House Un-American Affairs Committee, these gentlemen complain of "Gestapo tactics" and the technique of the "smear." We share their resentment. This sort of compilation, based on hearsay and unchecked evidence, has no place in the files of a government agency—or in the files of a Congressional committee. Had Messrs. Hoffman and Busbey asked that the entire file be destroyed, we think they could have made out a good case and served a good cause. Instead, they demanded only that Congressional names be removed. The commission, fearing for its appropriations, abjectly agreed, refusing only to let the Congressmen go through the files themselves. Its subversive does the country no favor and merely encourages these two little men in the belief that Congressmen are a race apart.

THOSE WASHINGTON REPORTERS WHO CARRY lanterns must have thought they had come to the end of a trail the other day when they interviewed Rustem Vambery, Hungary's new minister to this country. For instead of resorting to the old diplomatic device of lying abroad for his country, Ambassador Vambery took the simple and refreshing tack of saying exactly what he thought about the present plight of Hungary—about the degree of influence exercised upon its government by Soviet Russia, about the percentage of purity in the recent election, about Hungary's prospects for the future. He said he thought Hungary was "more subservient than is necessary" to Russia but that it would be an overstatement to say that the Soviet Union controls Hungary. He said that the Russian army of occupation naturally has an influence on the mind of the country. He said it was "very unfortunate" that the leaders of the other parties are not as able as the Communist leaders. And so on. He said, finally—and here, we must admit, he made a shameless bow to the great American obsession—that Hungary should not be used as a baseball between the Yankees and the Dodgers! We doubt whether this interview will be picked up by Cholly Knickerbocker, society fancier for the Hearst press, who, a few days before Mr. Vamberg was cordially received by President Truman, "reported" that Washington diplomats "are indignant because they'll now have to rub elbows with Rustem Vamberg." He called Mr. Vamberg a "noted Communist" and after telling another lie or two expressed sympathy again with "State Department regulars" who don't "cherish the idea of having to shake hands and sip tea with such riffraff." This is known as lying at home for one's publisher.

SUSPENSION OF THE PROGRESSIVE IS ONE more indication that Wisconsin's vaunted liberalism is now hardly more than the shadow of a great past. In its final issue, the Progressive's editor, Morris Rubin, writes of having "fought a losing rear-guard action against the soaring costs of production." We know exactly what he means, and he would have our sympathy even if the Progressive had not been as valuable a paper as it was. Yet we cannot help thinking that the rear-guard action might have been successful had there been an army left to save. The tragic fact is that the Wisconsin that sends a McCarthy, a Wiley, and an O'Konski to Washington is simply not the Wisconsin of the La Follettes and Victor Berger. With the power of the La Follette family crumbled away and its following dispersed, it is not surprising that the paper founded by "Fighting Bob" in 1909 should at last give up the ghost. His sons bear a partial measure of responsibility for the collapse of a political institution. "Young Bob," for whom we have great respect, made a monumental blunder when he attempted last year to lead his supporters back into the corrupt and stodgy Republican Party of the state. And Brother Phil, who was once a good governor, has followed an erratic course that has brought him at last to an understanding with Colonel McCormick, based on a common reverence for General MacArthur. In spite of the La Follette wanderings, the Progressive itself has for thirty-eight years steered a course of political courage and decency. We often found ourselves in strong disagreement with its policies, particularly its unrelenting isolationism in the pre-war years, but we have never questioned its integrity or its allegiance to the tenets of the liberal faith.

Now the Trouble Starts

THE hullabaloo over the Communist-affidavit issue, settled—more or less—by a National Labor Relations Board ruling last week, was important less for itself than for the false hopes it aroused and the dark augury it contained. Too many people looked at its solution as the end of a great log jam. Too few reflected on the possibility that if such racket, consternation, and dissent could be caused by a two-bit, immaterial question, sheer chaos would ensue when the board arrived at the really substantive and much more difficult problems ahead of it in interpreting the turbid law under which it operates.

The dispute was of the how-many-angels genre, applicable to some two or three dozen top officials of the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. Did every member of the A. F. of L. Executive Council have to swear he was not a Communist before any component union of the A. F. of L. could avail itself of the processes of the new law and of the help, if any, of the NLRB? Or was it sufficient for each union if only that union's officers executed the affidavits? It was clear that the drafters of the law had not given the question any thought; some of them admitted as much. It is probable that if Robert N. Denham, general counsel of the NLRB, had ignored the matter and had promulgated the more limited interpretation, no one would have noticed that there was a possibility of a different point of view. Instead, he chose to read the law the hard way, and said so. This played neatly into the hands of John L. Lewis, never a fellow to miss a chance.

Lewis had announced that he considered signing the oath infra dig. This would have been a statement of momentous non-importance, because the United Mine Workers' Union has no need to use the new law. But Denham's interpretation rocketed Lewis into a key position—something that has never made him unhappy—for as long as he remained a hold-out, he blocked all the rest of the A. F. of L. from access to the NLRB.

For reasons that defy common-sense explanation, the board stewed without action for five weeks, while Lewis paddled happily in a pond made to his own specifications. Once again he was the big shot, making political capital in the A. F. of L. while building up his prestige among left-wing elements of the C. I. O.

Finally, in fourteen closely typed pages, with arguments which would have been a credit to any scholastic monk, four members of the board told why their reading of the law differed from Denham's, and the fifth member, J. Copeland Gray, explained why Denham was right. As the newspapers say, Denham thereupon bowed to the will of the majority. He said he would not challenge the ruling, as he might have done, through a court proceeding. Senator Ball, who had previously said that Denham's interpretation was the correct one, intimated that the board majority was perfectly right.

Lewis has come out victor in a battle he could not have lost. He has proved himself a tough, trade-union hero, courageous in splendid isolation. The first to engage in a fight on a concrete issue with the new villain, he succeeded in having Denham's ears pinned back, even though he himself suffered a slight casualty when the federation dropped all its vice-presidents. This was necessary because even the board's ruling did not solve the problem of the affidavit in the case of federal unions, chartered directly by the top A. F. of L. body.

With the issue settled, there has been much jubilation, particularly in trade-union circles and even among officials of the NLRB, who should know better. It is felt that now the cases can pour in, the unions can have access to the board, and somehow everything will go back to the happy days of the Wagner act. The cases may, indeed, come pouring in. But the result will be only to bring to the surface disputes over innumerable other sections of the act, sections infinitely more complicated and, in distinction with this first unreal controversy, of solid weight and significance. Solution of the Communist-affidavit question does not end the difficulty with the law; it merely permits the trouble to begin.

The New "Comintern"

THE most significant point in the manifesto which accompanied and justified the revival of the Comintern has, it seems to us, been missed by most of the commentators. Primarily, that farrago of bellicose clichés has been interpreted as an open challenge to the United States, and, of course, the manner in which it assailed American "imperialism" gave plenty of color to that idea. But, after all, this merely added superfluous emphasis to a position that Moscow had already made abundantly clear. A much more striking feature of the manifesto was its all-out assault on Western socialism. Not only Bevin—an old enemy—but Attlee, Blum, Saragat, Schumacher, and other moderate or right-wing Socialist leaders were branded as traitors to the working class and to their countries as well. They are men who "are facilitating the task of American capital and are pushing their countries along the road of vassal dependency on the United States."

We are back again, apparently, to the phraseology of the early thirties, when "social fascist" was the orthodox Communist epithet for British Laborites and Continental Social Democrats. But with this difference: then, the emphasis was on class loyalty; now, the Communist parties claim that they are the true patriots, the only safe guardians of "national independence and sovereignty."

This attempt to discredit a large part of Western socialism obviously means the abandonment of the popular-front strategy which Moscow had pursued since the rise of Nazism, except during the Soviet-German-pact interlude. The manifesto reads like a declaration of open warfare against those Socialist parties which are not willing to cooperate wholeheartedly with the Communists. Spearheading the fight will be the powerful French and Italian parties, the only Western ones invited to participate in the initial meeting of the new Information Bureau. They have reasonable hopes of success, for in both countries they have a strong grip on the trade unions and the Italian Socialists are badly split.

The struggle against the Socialists and the anti-Marshall-plan campaign are closely connected. In France, the government, under Socialist leadership, has been forced to base its plans for recovery on the prospect of further American aid. If that aid fails to arrive, or if its effectiveness is reduced by widespread strikes, the government will fall and the Socialists be discredited. That might mean a bid for power by De Gaulle and the creation of a revolutionary situation in which the French would be confronted with a hard choice between communism and reaction. The Italians are already dangerously close to being forced to decide on one or the other of those alternatives.

The Soviet leaders have fully convinced themselves that recovery in Western Europe under American auspices would be dangerous to their security. In so far as they mean by that the physical security of the Soviet Union, we think they are wrong. But they may be right in spotting an ideological danger. If Western Europe is able to struggle to its feet and its Socialist governments are given an opportunity to develop their programs, they may prove a very disturbing influence on the rulers of the Kremlin.

On the other hand, it is a fact that American financial power may be used—through or apart from the Marshall plan—to back the interests of Europe's surviving economic royalists against the steady encroachments of Socialist strength. Our policy in the Ruhr, as well as the attitude of leading American officials toward the nationalization program in Britain, indicate clearly enough the course Congress and the Administration may take, and it is no secret that European Socialists are almost as fearful of the consequences of American financial help as they are eager to have it. To the extent that dollars are used as a dyke to check socialism, the Marshall plan will serve to fortify the Communist attack on Socialists in Britain and on the Continent; a possibility American liberals must foresee and energetically combat.

The chief weakness of the Russians' position is that they really have no alternative to the Marshall plan to offer Western Europe. The Comintern manifesto boils down to an invitation to the people to live on slogans until such time as Russia itself may be in a position to supply wheat, coal, and oil in abundance. The chief hope of Moscow lies in timidity and muddled counsel in this country. There are powerful voices here, capitalist voices, that want to put aid to Europe on a soup-kitchen basis; there are others who want to use it as a means of defeating Socialist developments and who thus play directly into the hands of the Communist propagandists. The gravest danger to Western European recovery is not, as acting Secretary of State Robert M. Lovett suggested the other day, Communist sabotage; it is ignorance, indifference, and prejudice right here in America.

Palestine

WITH the statements last week by the United States and Russia, the Palestine issue moves into a new and much more hopeful phase. The majority recommendations of the United Nations Special Committee, favoring the division of Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state, now become the basis of further debate in the ad hoc committee; and it seems sure, as we go to press, that many wavering states will follow the Big Two in backing partition. If the two statements mean what they seem to mean, a decent solution can be reached. The chief remaining danger lies in the disagreements which may crop up during discussions of important details—delimitation of boundaries, methods of enforcement, and the issue created by Arab defiance. This last difficulty cannot be put off, for the Arab League, under the personal direction of the Mufti, not only refuses, in advance, to recognize a U. N. decision in support of the majority report, but is organizing armed resistance. However feeble such a demonstration may be, it constitutes a challenge the U. N. must meet—though it has evaded it for days while the Arab leaders shouted defiance and announced that troops had been “massed” along the Palestine frontier.

If the United States is serious in its stand on Palestine, Mr. Johnson should state clearly in the Assembly committee this country's determination to back its decision against Arab blackmail. Unless this is done, and done quickly, smaller powers will find it hard to believe we mean business. Besides demanding an end to armed threats, the United States should take action against the Mufti as the chief instigator and organizer of Arab violence. It was supposedly a member of the Mufti's “striking force” who bombed the American consulate in Jerusalem last Monday. It is the Mufti himself who directs Arab strategy from just across the border in Lebanon. This cruel, crafty agitator is an escaped prisoner of war. By every criterion laid down at Nürnberg, he is a war criminal. His domination of the Arab Higher Committee in Palestine and of the Arab League is represented by many Arab political leaders who will not oppose him openly, for fear of assassination—a fate less wary ones have already met. No better way could be devised of ending Arab defiance of the U. N., while at the same time appealing to those moderate Arabs whose voices have been silenced, than to demand that the Mufti be handed over for trial as a war criminal. This would prove to all concerned that the United States will not knuckle under to threats or to embryo “holy wars.”

THE hope of a settlement in Palestine, of inestimable importance in itself, was almost overshadowed by the other implications of Russian-American agreement on the majority report. For Palestine is as central a factor in the struggle for power as any problem before the United Nations: strategy and oil, communications and political control, are inextricably tangled with the fate of Jewish hopes and Arab resistance. Palestine is one of the key “strong points” of the post-war world. And if Russia and the United States can not only accept a single formula but cooperate in carrying through a plan, peace will be established in the Middle East and the quaking foundations of the U. N. itself will be steadied. It is the presence of these overshadowing issues, on the other hand, that makes it essential for realistic Americans, while welcoming our government's position on Palestine, to follow closely every detail in the process of working out and applying the agreed program. Too often in the past—in the question of Spain, for example—apparent victories have been emptied of their meaning, and promises have crumbled into ineffective formulas. The test of our intentions in Palestine still lies ahead.

THE dinner of the Nation Associates could hardly have been held at a more opportune moment. Russia's clear-cut indorsement of the majority report had been announced that afternoon, and the speakers keyed their discussion to the developments at Lake Success. Sumner Welles, in particular, emphasized the point that common action on a specific issue might help break the deadlock in which all other major issues are caught; while Richard Crossman, Labor Member of Parliament and member of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, who came from London to speak at the dinner, insisted on the need of lifting Palestine out of the power complex in the Middle East and converting it into that “political vacuum” so generally regarded as undesirable. The responsibility of the United States in bringing about a final decent solution was ably argued by Bartley Crum, also a member of the Anglo-American Committee. Next week, The Nation will publish Mr. Welles's remarks in full and, in later issues, excerpts from the rest of the discussion.

Two-World Debate

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, October 14

A MONTH or two ago, some time before the opening of the General Assembly, I had lunch with a friend of mine whose judgment on international affairs I respect. "I've given up looking for hopeful signs in the world situation," he said. "We can count on relations between this country and Russia deteriorating in the next year or two. But I don't think there'll be war. I've come to the conclusion that it's important to spend a lot of time reading history; it saves one from despair."

This matches the remark of one of the better radio commentators last Friday when I interrupted him hammering out his daily script: "I've been looking for one optimist in the house," he said, "and can't find him."

Much of the day-to-day debate here at Lake Success is exasperating and depressing until you realize that the big facts are fixed, and unchanged by debate. From where our diplomats sit the Soviet Union is planning expansion. The nine-nation Communist manifesto was a declaration of intensified political infiltration into Western Europe. Our main job is to contain Russia.

From where Russia's policy-makers sit the big facts are America's undamaged industrial equipment, now accounting for two-thirds of the world's production; America's imperialist intentions as expressed in our aid-to-Greece program and the Marshall plan.

Both sides consider their foreign policy to be guided by rational considerations of security and defense. Each side suspects the other of dark designs which, if allowed to come to fulfilment, will produce the third world war. Neither side wants war.

Our representatives are softer spoken. They can afford to be. They have the majority of the world's nations on their side.

The Russian spokesmen are vehement, bad-tempered, and bad-mannered. It may be that they speak angrily out of frustration, knowing that they are going to be outvoted. It is more likely that they are laying down the propaganda line in rabble-rousing terms which may have some effect in the long nights of Europe's cold and hungry winter.

Certainly their tactics are making few converts at Lake Success. I talked last week to an old League man who had known Litvinov well in the Geneva days. He had just come out of a session in which Vishinsky and Bebler had whipped themselves up into a fine frenzy. "Litvinov," he said, "in the appeasement days put his case with challenging effect. It was an unanswerable case. But so much of what these men say is sheer nonsense."

PERHAPS it would make little difference in the overall big-power picture if the Russian group spoke with more restraint and precision. But it would certainly make a difference in the stand of the small nations. It is clear that a number of these are increasingly unwilling to stand up and be counted alongside of the giants. They don't want to be involved in a showdown. But instead of appealing to the smaller nations the Russian spokesmen have brushed aside with contempt anything which looks like conciliation or compromise. Had Spaak and Delbos not been subjected to the merciless invective of Vishinsky and Bebler, had the Swedish resolution not been lost sight of in the tempest, a more balanced and constructive line of action might have been agreed on in the Balkan crisis. As it was, most delegates were eager to end the brawl by a vote.

The Russian refusal to have anything to do with the Assembly's decision to set up a Balkan commission may well presage their action on the American proposal for a "Little Assembly." Here again, if moderate restraint can be counted on, there are enough delegates with doubts about the Interim Committee as originally outlined to modify the proposal in a useful fashion. There is something to be said for a continuing Assembly committee ready not only to take notice of crises as they occur as a result of Security Council deadlocks but also to be of some assistance in the continuing work of other committees.

Already the term "Security" has been dropped from the title of the American resolution, and the Canadian delegation is known to have a wider conception of the Little Assembly's functions. But if the Russian group meets the proposal with as little finesse as they used in the Greek question, the more reasonable voices just will not be heard.

INCIDENTALLY, in the Economic Committee the Russians demonstrated that they could put a case with force and effectiveness. Dr. Aratunian, chief economist of the Russian Foreign Office, spoke on the question of Europe's recovery. He accused the United States of using political tests for post-UNRRA relief. He asserted that it was America's plan to rebuild German industry along capitalist lines and that under American pressure Britain's efforts to socialize German heavy industry in its zone had been abandoned. "The United States," he said, "is converting the Ruhr into a base for executing its plans in Europe to the detriment of the peace-loving peoples and of the German people itself." This criticism, it will be recalled, had already been made by the French. Dr. Aratunian quoted American spokesmen to prove that the Marshall plan was primarily political in aim and that, from an economic point of view, it was directed more at saving American capitalism than at saving Europe.

Now, even if he neglected to mention that the Eastern nations had had a chance to participate in the Marshall plan and withdrew of their own accord or at Russia's bidding, few will challenge the statement that America's economic policy has political ends. Americans, however, would be slower to suggest that an economic plan which might save Western Europe from communism amounts to establishing a bridgehead for the eventual war against the Soviet Union. In fact, many would argue that if the Marshall plan is adequately implemented—and the "if" will be there until Congress decides what action it will take and when—war may be indefinitely postponed.

It is the economic, and consequent political, instability in Western Europe which is contributing most to the fear and suspicion on both sides. Moreover, stabilizing Western Europe may lead to the resumption of normal economic relations between East and West, and from economic cooperation political understanding may develop.

WHAT is astonishing is how one sign of accord between the big powers rekindles the hope that was in evidence when the United Nations was set up at San Francisco. The long-awaited American statement on Palestine and the remarkably similar Russian statement that followed yesterday have restored some faith in the world organization. The majority report of the United Nations Special Committee has now become the agreed basis of settlement, acceptable to most nations except the Arab states. There will be discussion about details, about frontier revisions, about immigration during the transition period. There will be more serious discussion about government during the transition period—both statements are vague on the means of enforcing the Assembly's recommendations. Britain has said it is withdrawing its troops at an early date and is not willing to enforce a settlement on which both sides do not agree. There is no United Nations force. And the "volunteer constabulary" suggested in the American proposal has been given various interpretations. But among the great powers there appears to be no fundamental disagreement. If this unanimity persists, many delegates are of the opinion that threats of Arab resistance will not materialize into serious armed action. Together, the American and Russian proposals lay the ground for an intelligent and just settlement.

Americans and Their Myths

BY JEAN-PAUL SARTRE

EVERYTHING has been said about the United States. But a person who has once crossed the Atlantic can no longer be satisfied with even the most penetrating books; not that he does not believe what they say, but that his agreement remains abstract.

When a friend tries to explain our character and unravel our motives, when he relates all our acts to principles, prejudices, beliefs, and a conception of the world which he thinks to find in us, we listen uneasily, unable either to deny what he says or entirely accept it. Perhaps the interpretation is true, but what is the truth that is being interpreted? We miss the intimate warmth, the life, the way one is always unpredictable to oneself and also tiresomely familiar, the decision to get along with oneself, the perpetual deliberations and perpetual inventions about what one is, and the vow to be "that" and nothing else—in short, the liberty. Similarly, when a careful arrangement of those melting-pot notions—puritanism, realism, optimism, and so on—which we have been told are the keys to the American character is presented to us in Europe, we experience a certain intellectual satisfaction and think that, in effect, it must be so. But when we walk about New York, on Third Avenue, or Sixth Avenue, or Tenth Avenue, at that evening hour which, for Da Vinci, lends softness to the faces of men, we see the most pathetic visages in the world, uncertain, searching, intent, full of astonished good faith, with appealing eyes, and we know that the most beautiful generalizations are of very little service: they permit us to understand the system but not the people.

The system is a great external apparatus, an implacable machine which one might call the objective spirit of the United States and which over there they call Americanism—a huge complex of myths, values, recipes, slogans, figures, and rites. But one must not think that it has been deposited in the head of each American just as the God of Descartes deposited the first notions in the mind of man; one must not think that it is "refracted" into brains and hearts and at each instant determines affections or thoughts that exactly express it. Actually, it is something outside of the people, something presented to them; the most adroit propaganda does nothing else but present it to them continuously. It is not in them, they are in it; they struggle against it or they accept it, they stifle in it or go beyond it, they submit to it or reinvent it, they give themselves up to it or make furious efforts to escape from it; in any case it remains outside them, transcendent, because they are men and it is a thing.

There are the great myths, the myths of happiness, of progress, of liberty, of triumphant maternity; there is realism and optimism—and then there are the Americans, who, nothing at first, grow up among these colossal statues and find their way as best they can among them. There is this myth of happiness: black-magic slogans warn you to be happy at once; films that "end well" show a life of rosy ease to the exhausted crowds; the language is charged with optimistic and unrestrained expressions—"have a good time," "life is fun," and the like. But there are also these people, who, though conventionally happy, suffer from an obscure malaise to which no name can be given, who are tragic through fear of being so, through that total absence of the tragic in them and around them.

There is this collectivity which prides itself on being the least "historical" in the world, on never complicating its problems with inherited customs and acquired rights, on facing as a virgin a virgin future in which everything is possible—and there are these blind gropings of bewildered people who seek to lean on a tradition, on a folklore. There are the films that write American history for the masses and, unable to offer them a Kentucky Jeanne d'Arc or a Kansas Charlemagne, exalt them with the history of the jazz singer, Al Jolson, or the composer, Gershwin. Along with the Monroe doctrine, isolationism, scorn for Europe, there is the sentimental attachment of each American for his country of origin, the inferiority complex of the intellectuals before the culture of the old Continent, of the critics who say, "How can you admire our novelists, you who have Flaubert?" of the painters who say, "I shall never be able to paint as long as I stay in the United States"; and there is the obscure, slow effort of an entire nation to seize universal history and assimilate it as its patrimony.

There is the myth of equality—and there is the myth of segregation, with those big beach-front hotels that post signs reading "Jews and dogs not allowed," and those lakes in Connecticut where Jews may not bathe, and that racial schim, in which the lowest degree is assigned to the Slavs, the highest to the Dutch immigrants of 1680. There is the myth of liberty—and the dictatorship of public opinion; the myth of economic liberalism—and the big companies extending over the whole country which, in the final analysis, belong to no one and in which the employees, from top to bottom, are like functionaries in a state industry. There is respect for science and industry, positivism, an insane love of “gadgets”—and there is the somber humor of the New Yorker, which pokes bitter fun at the mechanical civilization of America and the hundred million Americans who satisfy their craving for the marvelous by reading every day in the “comics” the incredible adventures of Superman, or Wonderman, or Mandrake the Magician.

JEAN-PAUL SARTRE is the leading French existentialist. His exposition of his philosophy has recently been published in this country under the title "Existentialism." He is also the author of a play, "No Exit," which was produced on Broadway last year, and of "The Age of Reason," a novel.

There are the thousand taboos which proscribe love outside of marriage—and there is the litter of used contraceptives in the back yards of coeducational colleges; there are all those men and women who drink before making love in order to transgress in drunkenness and not remember. There are the neat, coquettish houses, the pure-white apartments with radio, armchair, pipe, and stand—little paradises; and there are the tenants of those apartments who, after dinner, leave their chairs, radios, wives, pipes, and children, and go to the bar across the street to get drunk alone.

Perhaps nowhere else will you find such a discrepancy between people and myth, between life and the representation of life. An American said to me at Berne: “The trouble is that we are all eaten by the fear of being less American than our neighbor.” I accept this explanation: it shows that Americanism is not merely a myth that clever propaganda stuffs into people’s heads but something every American continually reinvents in his gropings. It is at one and the same time a great external reality rising up at the entrance to the port of New York across from the Statue of Liberty, and the daily product of anxious liberties. The anguish of the American confronted with Americanism is an ambivalent anguish, as if he were asking, “Am I American enough?” and at the same time, “How can I escape from Americanism?” In America a man’s simultaneous answers to these two questions make him what he is, and each man must find his own answers.

Rice and Riots in India

BY ANDREW ROTH

Cannanore, India, September 25

I DON’T know much about China, but it seems to me that here in South India the conflict between landlords and tenants is so sharp that it may grow into a civil war of Chinese proportions.” An earnest young North Malabar lawyer was speaking to some thirty or forty people crowded around him on the verandah of his house, come to ask his aid against the landlords and the dread Malabar Special Police. I was told that he had a thriving commercial practice which brought him about 3,000 rupees a month, but that he was contributing more and more of his time and labor to defending peasants who had been evicted or arrested. The Malabar Special Police is a semi-military force formed in 1921 to suppress the Moplah peasant uprising. It is kept apart from the people and has as bad a name for brutality as the “Black and Tans” had in Ireland or the S. S. battalions in Europe.

North Malabar, more than any other area in India, has political and economic problems which remind one of China’s. In many villages one sees the armed guards, the terrorized faces, and the battered huts that the Chinese civil war has left in its train. There is no such communal conflict as has scarred northern India, but violent disputes over agrarian questions have broken out between an extremely conservative local branch of the Congress Party and a militant and strongly entrenched Communist Party. In the last election in the Chirakkal Division Congress got 22,000 votes and the Communists 17,000.

The rightward swing of the Congress Party is marked in North Malabar. The agrarian structure of the province is the most backward in all India, with three or four non-producing landlords and sub-landlords taking as much as 80 per cent of the crop without making any contribution. An official investigation in 1940 recommended reforms, but nothing was done. In the United Provinces and some other areas where Nehru still exerts strong influence in the local Congress organization, the big landlords remain outside of the organization and fight it, but in North Malabar, when they saw that India would achieve self-government and Congress would rule, the landlords moved in on the party and took it over. They have amassed tremendous wealth through the increase in rice prices and have been able not only to buy their way into the leadership of the local organization but to bribe local officials into submission. Within Congress they are supported by equally conservative manufacturers.

ANDREW ROTH has been in India for the past several months reporting for The Nation on conditions since independence.

During the war Malabar suffered severely from food shortages, and in consequence of the widespread malnutrition cholera and other epidemics took a heavy toll. The post-war picture has been no better. Last year the rice ration sank to eight ounces a day—800 calories, half the jail ration for convicts—and this year it has already gone down to six ounces. Despite these conditions, the provincial government has done virtually nothing to control the big landlords, who have been holding back 25 per cent of the crop, or about 100,000 tons, to sell in the black market.

The Communists have seized the opportunity to make a number of dramatic attacks on the agrarian structure. The peasant pays from 50 to 80 per cent of the crop to the landlord in kind, which means usually that he is not left with enough to feed his family and use for seed. The Communist-led Kisan Sabha (Peasant Union) has proposed that rents be reduced and be paid in cash. It argues that if the rice remains in the hands of the peasants, not only will their families be better fed but the surplus will be more likely to be sold to the government, since the peasants have less influence with the procurement officers.

In some places, such as the village of Karivellore, the battle over rice has caused casualties. This village, whose land is largely owned by the Rajah of Chirakkal, has to import more than half of its food. The Rajah has been accustomed to taking his rent in kind, shipping the rice out of the village, and selling it where he chooses, presumably in the black market. Last fall the peasants, spurred on by the Peasant Union, demanded that he take his rent in cash and allow them to keep the rice. When he refused, the peasants would not let him move the crop. The Rajah then called in the Malabar Special Police, which sent 200 armed men to seize the grain. When the peasants resisted, the police opened fire and killed two persons, including a fourteen-year-old boy. Others were arrested and beaten mercilessly, and 196 persons were later indicted.

KANDAKKAI, a village which I visited, also had a brush with the Special Police. I did not go to Ellarinchil, one of the main trouble spots, because I learned that most of the men there were either in jail or hiding in the jungle and that the others would be too frightened to be seen talking to a foreign reporter. To reach Kandakkai we rode for hours in a jeep, then sloshed on foot along rain-soaked trails where the bridges were single slippery logs, and finally took to native canoes. The thin-faced, aquiline-nosed, sensitive-looking schoolteacher with whom I talked there was reluctant to discuss the disturbances. "Such horrible atrocities cannot be described," he said gloomily, "you have to experience them." He was one of five brothers who were a little better off than most of the 2,000 villagers. Two were teachers, one had a shop dealing in rationed goods, one a tea-shop, and the fifth worked as a lumberman. All of them, with their wives and children, lived in one house.

The sensitive village intellectual in a backward, poverty-stricken country like India frequently takes one of two roads. He escapes to the big city, where there are more opportunities for an interesting life; or he goes back to his village after obtaining his education and becomes known as a radical through his efforts to raise his village to his own level. The radicalism of the village schoolteachers is fostered by their miserable pay—most of them get only 30 rupees ($10) a month. Our Kandakkai schoolteacher was further embittered by the fact that when he tried to supplement his earnings by cultivating a piece of land, his landlord fixed a rent in kind which amounted to 80 per cent of the average crop he could hope to harvest.

Organizers for the Peasant Union found him an eager convert, and he worked for the union in his spare time. When the village built a nice little reading-room with a tiled roof, part of it was given over to the Peasant Union. In the small stock of books the leftist point of view was well represented.

In the fall of 1946 Kandakkai joined with other villages where the Peasant Union was strong in agitating for lower rents. When the landlord ordered the eviction of one tenant, the others fell to and helped him reap his crop. In December fifty men of the Malabar Special Police visited Kandakkai, searched eighteen houses, and beat up two men. In January they raided the village twice, arrested a number of people, beat up others, and destroyed household utensils. In February the police established a camp of 100 men in the village, and our schoolteacher and the other men of his family fled to the jungle.

"In the dead of night thirty M. S. P. men came to our house," he told me. "None of the men folk were at home because we were afraid of arrest. The police forced the women to open the door by threatening to smash it in. Then they ordered the women out of the house and entered and searched it. One of them said, 'Show us where your husbands are or we'll burn the house down.' They broke all the earthen cooking vessels. Afterward they let the women in, but they came back on several other nights in the hope of finding us there. A month later they locked the house and forbade the women to enter it. The women and six children were forced to eat, cook, and sleep on the verandah for six weeks."

Finally the police said they would allow the women to live in the house if the schoolmaster gave himself up. Unwilling to see his family suffer, he surrendered and found himself charged with rioting and with reaping a crop without the knowledge of the village headman.

As this man finished telling about his experiences, other villagers poured out their stories. The police had dragged one man off to their camp, pounded him with their fists, and jailed him on the same charge of unauthorized reaping. Another had been hit with the butt end of a rifle so that his hearing was affected. "They must have picked on me because I had asked the landlord several times to lower the rent," he said. The reading room had been completely wrecked, its books and periodicals torn, its benches and tables broken. Relatives of wanted men had been molested. Three village women had been gagged and raped.

A deputation of women went to the headman of the village, carrying their broken kitchen utensils, to protest against the acts of the M. S. P. and to demand compensation. An old lady of sixty-five named Kunkakkamma and a number of men were arrested on the charge of threatening the headman's life. After a beating in the police camp, they were sent to the Cannanore central jail, where they were kept for two months before being released on bail.

One result of the activities of the M. S. P. was a disastrous loss of food. The men who fled to the woods to escape police violence had to leave their crops unharvested. When their neighbors tried to bring in the grain they were stopped by the police, who hoped the overripe fields would lure back the men. It was estimated that some 12,000 pounds of rice were eaten by cattle.

"We find it hard to exist," one of the villagers said sorrowfully. Most of them had always been on the verge of destitution, and now their lives had been completely disrupted. Many had lost their pitifully few belongings through the wanton destructiveness of the police. Temporarily they were cowed, but they were convinced that their previous demands were entirely warranted. "As soon as the M. S. P. is withdrawn, we'll have to reorganize and ask for compensation for the damage that has been done to us," the schoolteacher said quietly. "And we'll present our demands for lower rents again no matter how great the repression."

THE tension in North Malabar relaxed somewhat with the advent of independence. To celebrate August 15 the local Congress committee, dismayed by the police brutality, asked that the amnesties widely granted throughout India to political prisoners be extended to the jailed agitators. Almost all the Communist and Peasant Union leaders being held without charges were released, as were those who had been jailed for speechmaking. In Cannanore, Congress, Communist, and Moslem League speakers hailed Independence Day from the same platform.

But the antagonism did not die out completely. None of the political cases—such as that against our schoolteacher—were dismissed, and in the first week of September one of the leading North Malabar Communists was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for an inflammatory speech delivered in 1946. Another leader, who had been underground during the severest of the repression, emerged after August 15 only to be arrested for a similar offense. Some of the conservative Congress leaders in the area feel that continued police repression is necessary to make the Communists cease their "violent agitation." The headman of one village said, "Ninety-five per cent of the people here are Communists. They are quiet now because of the M. S. P. If the police are withdrawn, there will be trouble again."

Other local Congressmen think differently. When Balakrishna Nair, president of the Chirakkal Division Congress Committee, was asked his opinion about the withdrawal of the M. S. P., he answered, "Certainly I want them withdrawn. We have been requesting, complaining, bemoaning—all to no purpose." He was deeply annoyed by the apathy and indifference of the provincial government. "I have seen the Ministers half a dozen times," he declared, "but nothing happens. And if the Ministry is indifferent, the police officials are arrogant. Every authenticated complaint I take to them is dismissed as a false allegation." Mr. Nair felt that the violence of the Communists could not be ended by counter-violence by the police.

There are indications that the provincial Congress leaders are coming around to the view that the best way to prevent further clashes is to ease the terrible conditions under which the peasants live. A bill to buy out the landlords and another to lower the rents have been introduced into the provincial legislature. If they are passed, and enforced in such a manner as really to improve the lot of the peasants, South India may escape the fate of strife-torn China.

Neutrality Pays Off

BY ARMAND SCHWAB, JR.

Zürich, September

COMING into Switzerland from France, near Geneva, you get to a little cafe even before the Swiss customs office. In that cafe, about ten yards from the French border, you can buy rich, strong Swiss beer instead of the pale malt water that is being brewed in France today. And you know you have reached the little island of abundance that lies unbelievably in the center of starving Europe.

The advantages of staying out of two world wars are apparent. It is good to visit a country without traumatic psychoses, political crises, inflation, or hungry mobs, a country which has plenty of white bread, butter, beer, and meat. It is good to observe the common respect and understanding of the four linguistic and national groups that combined so long ago to form this tight, tenacious republic. Yet even if you happen to be a citizen of the most prosperous nation on earth you are likely to feel some resentment. You cannot help realizing that the source of all this Swiss prosperity was the war the Swiss avoided. And you notice that they have almost no humility about their good fortune.

Of course one must be very careful in criticizing a people for staying out of a war. And it is only fair to remember that Switzerland at least did not join the German side like some of our other friends. But the fact remains that its neutrality was profitable for Switzerland. Throughout the war the country received enough German coal and gasoline to meet essential demands, though not enough to use for luxuries. These fuels and other imported goods were supplied by Germany in return for the privilege of transporting freight—but not troops—across Switzerland to the southern fronts. The Swiss controlled the famous Alpine tunnels, including the St. Gotthard with its heavy traffic, and through their power to blow up the tunnels they could keep Germany in line. At the same time the Swiss made machinery, textiles, and other things for the Germans, and got their profit. The Germans even permitted us to get some goods, in return for which we sent food to Switzerland.

THERE is still some food rationing in Switzerland but nothing like that in neighboring countries. Building activities continued even during the war and are in full swing now. The lack of destruction, coupled with the traditional Swiss neatness, makes the towns and villages seem as elegant as a lady's boudoir in comparison with the rest of Europe. The shops sell imported luxury items on which no other country would dream of wasting foreign exchange. There are drugs and cosmetics, clothing, and typewriters from America. And there are apparently more automobiles here per capita than in New York.

Prices in general have risen, although not steeply. (An excellent federal regulation forces upward revision of wages in certain categories of employment as the cost of living mounts, and so far there has been no vicious inflation.) For citizens of nations whose currency Switzerland wants, a very favorable exchange rate makes travel here inexpensive, but for citizens of "soft-money" countries, like France and Italy, the rate is almost prohibitive.

With help and encouragement from the government the tourist industry is regaining its old importance. Hotels are again giving the cold shoulder to natives, after heartily welcoming them during the lean war years. This year the British especially have thronged here, hungrily buying nylons and pastry with their government-limited allowances. So far, Americans have not come in large numbers, except for the 200,000 soldiers on furlough during and after the war, with whom the Swiss appear to have been completely enchanted.

A tourist industry inevitably makes a nation seem made up of oily hotel keepers and bowing concierges, but for every plump landlord there are a lot of farmers and skilled mechanics. Factories are turning out the famous Swiss products, as carefully made as ever. Skillful dairying is offsetting the dry weather and the lack of machinery. Credits are piling up in foreign banks.

Stability and plenty tend to beget conservatism, and this is true of Switzerland. The people's thinking is heavy and careful; their habits are reserved, even prudish—the largest city, Zürich, is practically run by a Frauenverein similar to our W. C. T. U. The country's long-standing democratic traditions, however, have produced a politically alert citizenry. Old-age and medical security, wage-adjustment laws, and tight fiscal control are among the recent enactments of the federal government, whose jurisdiction is being steadily extended.

In international affairs the Swiss seem strangely detached. Reading a Swiss magazine, or talking to a citizen, you feel as if you were standing outside the world, somewhere in space, watching its gyrations. The Swiss observe and comment, critically, inquisitively, without wholly participating. However, they worry a lot about the next war. Their disposition and traditions make them fiercely anti-Russian. They follow the usual Western European pattern of flattering America as "the real leader of the world today," but they are rather more willing than most Europeans to accept the inevitability of another war. While other people feel sick at the thought of going through it again, the Swiss say frankly that they might be able to stay out of the next war too.

ARMAND SCHWAB, JR., has just returned from a trip to France, Italy, and Switzerland.

Conscientious Objectors on Strike

BY HOWARD SCHOENFELD

[The story told here is six years old; yet it is timely. There are still some nine hundred Selective Service violators in prison, of whom about one hundred are conscientious objectors or Jehovah's Witnesses. A large number of the other eight hundred are considered conscientious objectors by church and welfare groups, although not, apparently, by the President's Amnesty Board. Sixteen thousand released violators of the Selective Service Act are still deprived of civil rights. In their interest, and in the interest of their fellows still in jail—some in Danbury Prison—we print Mr. Schoenfeld's article.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

THE Warden adjusted his glasses. "Men," he said, "this is my last appeal to you." His position was both delicate and difficult. If word of our impending strike reached the public, there would probably be a terrific reaction to it, and he was almost certain to be made the scapegoat. Meanwhile his authority within the prison seemed sure to be undermined. He was a man with a comparatively advanced outlook. There were adequate recreational facilities in his prison, smoking was permitted in the mess hall, movies were shown once a week, inmates were allowed to put on shows, and the prison generally was run along what are considered liberal lines. Indeed, Danbury is cited as one of this country's model prisons, and the worst we suffered under the Warden's administration was solitary confinement.

The Warden was a good-natured man and a sports enthusiast. No broadcast of a fight or an important game passed without the inmates hearing it. And no inmate was happier than he over the fact that the prison softball team was defeated in a really excellent league.

The Warden was a liberal with a position of authority in an evil system. Despite his efforts, his prison was a hell on earth.

Negroes were segregated; convicts in their teens were thrown into solitary; foul food was frequently served; threat of the lunacy ward was employed to coerce the sane; reading matter was censored unmercifully; stool pigeons plied their rotten trade; men "blew their tops."

A good impulse had prompted the Warden to ask the prison bureau to send us to his prison. His fate was to discover us unmanageable. We were a proud, stiff-necked lot who openly boasted we were the most radical men in the country. Inescapably, the Warden was forced to oppose us in order to uphold his authority and, with it, the authority of the evil system that gave him his power. For a kind man, it was a tragic situation.

The Warden continued: "If you carry through with this strike, not only will your lives be affected, but liberalism itself may be wiped out in the prison bureau. All of you know how hard some of us in the bureau have struggled to better the lot of the inmate. We've made progress lately, and we expect to make more, but the forces against us are powerful, and the balance is delicate. A strike at this time may upset that balance and throw the prison bureau back twenty years."

"But we aren't striking against the prison bureau," someone said.

"It doesn't make any difference why you're striking. The issue here is whether your group of twenty or thirty men has the authority in this prison, or whether the people of the United States, through the Federal Bureau of Prisons and the Warden, have that authority."

We decided to strike and take the consequences.

THE bureau, thoroughly aroused, acted swiftly. Carloads of Department of Justice men armed with machine-guns and tear gas were unloaded at the prison gates, according to the grapevine. Other Department of Justice men, the grapevine added, were released in the prison disguised as inmates. Guards let the regular inmates know they would be safe in starting fights with conscientious objectors. If we fought back, our case as pacifists would look pretty silly, and the bureau could get tougher with us.

Early in the afternoon stool pigeons began circulating among the men in an effort to bring a particularly vicious pressure to bear on us. The prison as a whole would be punished if the strike took place, they explained. Six or seven hundred bootleggers, counterfeiters, embezzlers, smugglers, pimps, white slavers, con men, dope peddlers, robbers, and murderers stood to lose considerably by our strike; yet not one of them put the slightest pressure on us to change our stand. We had cast our lot in with theirs from the beginning, and all of our group of ministers, divinity students, and Socialists had been in solitary or under restrictions at one time or another for protesting against the evil conditions under which they and we lived. Wherever men of our group went in the prison, the other inmates gathered about them. And many an inmate who had never known kindness before, or even decent treatment, discovered such things existed and regained his self-respect.

HOWARD SCHOENFELD is a free-lance writer who was imprisoned for nine months as a conscientious objector.

By late afternoon the prison was in a state of nervous apprehension. When the supper whistle blew that evening, the men poured out of their cell blocks and surged across the prison yard toward the mess hall, carrying us along with them. Midway they came to a sudden halt.

The Warden was standing on a small box in the center of the yard. Guards quickly rounded up the men and herded them into a bunched mass in front of him. I moved toward the rear, and two guards detached themselves and moved in behind me. Other guards stationed themselves through the mob wherever there were conscientious objectors. The men stirred restlessly, anxious to get to their suppers. Night was falling, and a high wind was nipping through the yard.

The Warden began to speak. As everyone knew, he said, a general strike was being called the next morning by a small group of inmates. The nature of the strike, as he saw it, did not concern the rest of the inmates, and he believed that they wouldn't join us. We were not striking against the prison bureau or the administration of the prison, he pointed out, but against the government of the United States.

The patriotism of the group calling the strike, although we were not yet at war, was of a questionable nature. We had deliberately disobeyed the law of the land—the Selective Service Act—and that was why we were in prison. We had been trouble-makers from the beginning, and now we were wilfully calling a strike against the best interests of the nation.

Everybody was against war, including himself, and he had gone along with us as far as he could, offering to allow us the use of the chapel for prayer and meditation on the designated day, but we had rejected the offer. The selfishness of our course was apparent. A strike in the prison at this time might prove disastrous. The prison bureau was more liberal than at any time in its history. He dwelt on the gains that had recently been made. Our strike would be a serious blow at those gains. The regular inmates would see the wisdom of steering clear of our strike. He expressed his confidence in the men and said he knew he could count on them for support. He paused for applause.

Silence met him.

Hastily he continued his speech, but he was interrupted by a clear, respectful voice: "That's not quite true, Warden." The speaker was Arle Brooks, a minister of the Disciples of Christ, known among the men for his meek character and spiritual humility.

"Seize that man," the Warden said, pointing at Arle.

Guards quickly surrounded the minister, locking their arms around him. The inmates, knowing Arle's character, broke into spontaneous laughter at the precaution. The laughter died instantly when the Warden ordered Arle taken away and thrown into solitary. A wave of angry muttering swept through the crowd.

IN THE dead of night a guard shook me awake. "Get your clothes and follow me!"

I picked my way through the mass of sleeping men and followed him into an adjoining room. Presently, I was led down the corridor and through the maze of the prison to a large waiting-room. Inside were the other men of our group, sitting silently. I lit a cigarette. A guard took it from me. The clock on the wall ticked.

A lieutenant of guards entered and checked our names against a list. He disappeared suddenly and as suddenly reappeared. He read a name. "David Dellinger."

David rose and followed him. David was a divinity student whose first act in prison had been to protest against the segregation of Negroes. Walking into the mess hall he had deliberately stepped out of the white men's line and sat at a Negro table. The mess hall is the most heavily guarded spot in a prison, and the simple action took extreme courage. Punishment was swift and ruthless. Outside, David had done settlement work in slums while attending theological seminary. Before that he had held an English exchange scholarship.

We waited. The guards watched. The silence was heavy. David did not return. The lieutenant entered and looked at his list. "Sturge Steinert," he said.

Steinert rose and followed him. We listened as the echo of footsteps receded in the corridor and faded out. Steinert was a Socialist who had been a student at Temple University. The American Legion had awarded him a scholarship for winning an essay contest on Americanism. The scholarship, I believe, was withdrawn when he put his ideals into practice. He also failed to return.

The Lieutenant entered and read another name. "Gordon Goley."

Goley was a religious man who had renounced all things material and devoted his full time to a study of the Bible.

The lieutenant called for us, one by one. The wait for those toward the bottom of the list seemed interminable. Finally the lieutenant entered and called my name. I rose and followed him. At the end of the corridor I was frisked before being led through the steel-barred door that opened into the administrative section of the prison. The lieutenant opened the door to the Warden's office and motioned me to enter.

The Warden was sitting at his desk wearing evening clothes, the coat of which he had discarded in favor of a smoking jacket. In one hand he held a volume of "Leaves of Grass"; with the other he was tuning a station on his desk radio.

He invited me to be seated and asked me if I had read Whitman. His manner was utterly friendly, but throughout the interview he continued to manipulate the radio dial nervously. He expressed his regret that he hadn't had the opportunity to discuss my viewpoint with me, and said he hoped that when I was released we could meet on more social terms over a glass of beer. I returned the courtesy. He went on to show his interest in my reasons for joining in the strike, and I showed him a copy of a note I had earlier given to the captain of the guards, stating my motives. He read the short note and brought the interview to a close by calling the lieutenant of the guards, who led me away and placed me in solitary confinement.

SOLITARY confinement was referred to as "constructive meditation" by the prison authorities. It differed in no way, so far as I know, from solitary confinement anywhere.

My cell measured five paces long and two wide. The walls and floor were bare concrete. The door was metal with a small glass aperture. Guards spied on me from time to time. Strict silence was maintained, although I soon discovered that by pounding on the wall I could get a response from George Houser in the next cell.

The first day dragged uneventfully, the second monotonously, the third was worse. I paced my cell for hours, threw myself exhausted on the cot, lost myself in day dreams. Insatiable sexual desires overwhelmed me, and I lost count of the days in the interminable silence, which was broken only by the dull voice of the guard during count. I began to look forward eagerly to meal-times, and one evening I found a cigarette and match neatly taped on the underside of the tray. Ecstatically I smoked it to the end, burning my fingers and becoming dizzy and nauseated.

The days passed. I made up songs and listened to the words in my mind. I wrote mental essays, novels, plays, and short notices. I scratched my growing beard and braided my hair. I reviewed my life, picking out the incidents I liked best and dwelling on them. I thought about God and prayed. I pounded the wall and paced the cell. Weeks passed.

One day a guard entered the cell block, walked down the corridor, and opened the door to Benedict's cell. Benedict was a fine athlete; in particular he excelled as a softball pitcher. Only one man in the prison could catch his fast ball. The prison team, built around his pitching, had been tied for first place in its league.

The Warden, as I have said, was a sports lover. Now the guard offered Benedict his freedom if he would pitch in the championship play-off games, which apparently were scheduled for that day. Benedict pointed out that he was in no condition to pitch. The guard explained he would be given time to limber up and mentioned how disappointed the inmates would be if the championship was lost. Benedict thereupon said he would do it on condition that all the men in solitary, including the inmates not in the pacifist group, were released. The guard said he would speak to the Warden and trudged off down the corridor.

He returned. The Warden could not agree to Benedict's terms, he said, but had offered a compromise. He would release all the conscientious objectors for the game, and Benedict permanently. Benedict refused. The guard disappeared, returning shortly with another offer. The Warden would release everybody for the game, and Benedict permanently. Benedict refused. The guard disappeared.

A lieutenant of guards appeared and told Benedict the men were warming up for the first game. He said he thought he could prevail on the Warden to release all the conscientious objectors permanently and the other men for the game if Benedict would pitch. Benedict refused.

Fully an hour passed. Then the captain of the guards entered and ordered us released. The prison team had lost the first game and the Warden had agreed to Benedict's terms.

Grimacing widely, we left our cells, and laughing at one another's pasty complexions, bearded faces, and unkempt hair, hurried out into the prison yard. A wave of applause went through the stands as Benedict rushed down the field and began warming up. In true Frank Merriwell fashion he summoned his strength after the long weeks of demoralized living and in a superhuman and prodigious performance pitched our team to a victory. This feat made the sporting pages of many newspapers, but another piece of news did not: after the games Benedict and the rest of us were rounded up and thrown back into solitary. The guard on duty was so disgusted that he did not even bother to lock our cell doors.

THE next day at noon the Warden reversed his stand and released us. The midday whistle had blown and the men were already in the mess hall, eating. We straggled across the empty yard, basking in the sun, enjoying our freedom. A spontaneous wave of applause broke out among the men as the first of our group entered the hall. Surging across the hall, the wave became a crescendo. Guards ran up and down the aisles; they were ignored. The pandemonium increased when Benedict came in, and a volcano of thunderous and deafening sound burst out when Arle Brooks entered. But when the "regular" criminals who had been in solitary entered, the convicts literally went wild, whistling, beating their metal cups on the tables, and stamping their feet.

We stood in the center of the floor, astounded at the demonstration. It became clear to me that although they were applauding Benedict, Brooks, and all of us who had been in solitary, they were doing something more. A mass catharsis of human misery was taking place before our eyes. Some of the men were weeping, others were laughing like madmen. It was like nothing I had ever seen before, and nothing I ever expect to see again.

Del Vayo—No. 18 on the Agenda

THE Spanish question is on the agenda of the General Assembly, but for all kinds of conflicting reasons most delegates are against a full discussion such as took place last December. Open and covert friends of Franco are anxious that nothing disturb the Christian General's happiness as he prepares to initiate the second decade of his rule with ceremonies proclaiming the regency. Others, friendly to the Spanish Republic, fear that in the present mood of tension little or nothing would be gained by pressing the issue; they would prefer to let the December resolution ride until a more favorable moment. But no matter what either group would like, the Spanish question will not evaporate.

For Spain remains a live issue, and Washington and London are terrified lest it explode without warning. I have often cited evidence to show that in 1945, at the war's end, the Franco regime could have been replaced by a democratic government without undue violence. Franco was ready to quit that year; only the unexpected support he received from the United States and Great Britain saved him.

For a while, in order to satisfy the Catholic monarchists in Spain, the Vatican qualified its support of the dictator; but on one of his visits to Rome Cardinal Spellman supposedly convinced the Pope that Franco must be kept in the saddle to strengthen the anti-Russian coalition. Whatever the Department of State and the Foreign Office may say, their aid to Franco is a tangible fact. In 1946, when Spain was close to bankruptcy, Great Britain concluded a monetary agreement with Franco which strengthened the regime considerably. Official trade figures for this year, published in Madrid on October 2, list the United States and Latin America as buying 53 per cent of Spain's total exports. The withdrawal of ambassadors did not reduce this more practical kind of recognition.

Inside Spain everyone, whether Falangist or Republican, knows that the United States and Great Britain are keeping Franco in power. The Anarchist organization has been the latest to acknowledge it; an underground statement issued at the end of September is not without political significance, since the Anarchist Confederación Nacional del Trabajo is the second-largest trade-union organization in Spain. For a number of reasons, the most immediate being their hatred of the Communists, the Anarchists until recently took the position that Spain must join the Western bloc. Now they have undergone a change of heart, out of despair at the position of the great Western powers. America's growing friendliness toward Franco was reported by Francisco Lucientes, Washington correspondent of the Spanish news agency. He cabled late in August: "Such neutral anti-Marxist countries as Spain greatly interest the North Americans as a counterbalance of good sense against the ideological madness that is lashing Europe." An editorial in Arriba, the Falangist organ, noted with satisfaction that Franco Spain had become part of "the American line of defense." The Anarchist manifesto lashes out against such an alliance between the Western democracies and a regime they have so often verbally repudiated. It is by far the most violent of the recent attacks launched by the Spanish underground against this country; it bitterly denounces the British Socialists as well and declares that "the only possible way left to the Spaniards is the way of violence."

The new element in the Spanish situation is the fact that the indirect help Franco has received is no longer sufficient. The economic situation has worsened so rapidly since last spring that indirect foreign aid cannot stave off collapse much longer. The United States faces the alternative of including Franco Spain in the Marshall plan—an unthinkable repudiation of its proclaimed position—or of advancing a big loan to the Caudillo. A few weeks ago I said that the 200-gram bread ration in France created a revolutionary situation. What of Spain, where the second cut this year has reduced the ration to 150 grams—officially; actually 100 grams? A Spanish crew jumped ship the other day in a Venezuelan port, declaring to the authorities: "There's no way to keep alive in Spain." Lack of foreign currency is preventing the regime from meeting the most pressing needs of the population.

Last week I received a letter from Madrid from an anti-Franco but conservative Spanish business man with whom I have kept in contact since I left Spain. When I saw him in France a year ago he told me Franco was solidly entrenched and the Republicans ought to accept a compromise—a monarchy or some ambiguous interim regime that would allow Republicans to return to Spain without being shot. Now he writes: "For the first time I must admit that you are right. There is no halfway remedy for this terrifying process of disintegration. The worst of it is that catastrophe is sweeping toward us at headlong speed. My heart breaks at the thought of what awaits our country." Daily the underground grows stronger and the repression more intense. When members of the resistance are captured, they are immediately sent to the terrible prison of Alcalá de Henares, invariably sentenced to death, and shot the next day. Official government sources acknowledge that 214 Republicans were executed between January and the end of August.

Whether the United Nations believes it or not, the Spanish question is an urgent one; when it explodes, the repercussions will reach farther than in the Greek affair. Nor can any government say it lacked advance warning. For months the Republicans have been saying that should a major revolt against Franco break out, deep lesions would appear all over Europe at the points of political tension. No party would have to lift a finger, but opposing camps would form, and thousands of Europeans would rally to the fight in a new and greater International Brigade. But on the eve of the Assembly meeting, when a high Washington official was approached about the need for a positive U. N. stand on Spain, he said: "Don't bother me with Spain now. I have too many headaches already."

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

European Customs Union—II

LAST week I wrote about the tentative but significant approaches of the Committee of European Economic Cooperation to the question of removing the barriers that have done so much to block intracontinental trade. I tried to show how strong was the economic case for a customs union covering as large an area as possible. At the same time I was forced to admit that the road to this desirable end was an extraordinarily rocky one.

One major difficulty was mentioned by Mr. del Vayo in last week's Nation. Pointing out that the sixteen "Western" nations that attended the Paris conference "constitute no economic entity," he declared that "only a United Europe will ever know peace, reconstruction, and prosperity." Certainly, the most effective European union would be one that brought together the industrial regions of the West with the surplus food areas of the East. That would constitute an economic entity nearly as well balanced and as well supplied with natural resources as the United States.

The mutual need for close economic relations between the Western and Eastern European groups was by no means ignored by the Paris delegates. In fact, their report, optimistically perhaps, assumed that by 1951 exchange of goods between the two regions would be approaching its pre-war volume. Moreover, they made it clear that they did not wish the Study Group which is to examine the problems involved in setting up a customs union to be exclusively Western; invitations to participate are to be extended to all European nations. Unfortunately, the political considerations which induced the Soviet Union to boycott the Marshall-plan conference and to order its satellite countries to follow suit will almost certainly bar, in the foreseeable future, even the discussion of economic union covering all Europe. Russia views any European union not under its control as a menace to its security; the United States is not prepared to aid any group dependent on Moscow. Europe is the first victim of the "cold war."

Caught between these rival forces, what are the Western Europeans to do? Must they abandon all hope of closer cooperation and continue to keep their economies in watertight compartments? Surely even an incomplete union is better than nothing. Indeed, the very fact that Western Europe is not self-sufficient, that it will have to rely on industrial exports to finance imports of food and raw materials from other parts of the world, makes the abolition of its internal trade barriers all the more imperative. Without that step the scale of most industries will remain too small for full efficiency, and competition with the United States will be possible only if wages are kept very low.

Assuming, then, an effort to establish a customs union among some or all of the nations represented at Paris, what are some of the hurdles to be cleared? An obvious one is the existing differences in standards of living, levels of taxation, scope of social services, and so forth between the countries in the group. If all internal barriers to the movement of goods, capital, and labor were removed, differences in living standards would tend to disappear, though, as we know from American experience, large variations inside a free-trade area are possible. The problem in Europe would be to attempt to bring about a leveling up rather than a leveling down and so avoid the kind of social strain, to cite one example, produced by wage competition between New England and Southern textile mills.

Some wishfully thinking American officials and bankers support the customs-union project in the belief that it will provide a springboard from which Europe will dive back into the laissez faire river. But Europe has bitter memories of the dangerously erratic currents in those waters. With every government in Western Europe—and, what is more, nearly every party from which an alternative administration might be drawn—committed to economic planning, hopes of a return to a free market are pretty unrealistic.

That being the case, it follows that any free-trade area in Europe must have an over-all plan into which national plans are integrated. A French scheme for doubling steel production, for instance, would have to be coordinated with the steel and coal programs of the other members of the group. A British plan to speed up housing would have to be considered in relation to building activity and supplies of materials throughout the whole area.

Again, before a customs union could become fully effective, it would be necessary to arrange for free convertibility of the currencies of all members or, better still, to provide for a new, common, currency. But that implies some standardization of taxation; otherwise convertibility might lead to a headlong flight of liquid funds from Britain and the Scandinavian countries, where direct taxes are high and rigorously collected, to France and Italy, where they are lower and more easily evaded.

In other words, a customs union among a number of countries with planned economies cannot be an isolated move. To make it succeed, the participating members would have to be willing to surrender some part of their national sovereignties to a body representing the whole group. As the London Economist wrote on August 23:

It would be idle to suppose that a customs union could ever be established within a purely economic framework. A political structure would have to be built alongside. . . . It may even be found that it is, after all, a waste of time to tackle the whole complex of questions wrapped up in Western European interdependence as exclusively from the economic angle as the present prominence of the idea of a customs union would suggest. It may be that, in the end, the political arrangements will have to come first.

That is a big order: so big that were the alternatives for Western Europe less grim, one would be tempted to dismiss the idea of economic union as fantasy. As things are, however, it is just possible that the instinct for survival will triumph over the centrifugal forces that have long been Europe's curse.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE BEGINNING

So summer comes in the end to these few stains
And the rust and rot of the door through which she went.
The house is empty. But here is where she sat
To comb her dewy hair, a touchless light,
Perplexed by its darker iridescences,
This was the glass in which she used to look
At the moment's being, without history,
The self of summer perfectly perceived,
And feel its country gaiety and smile
And be surprised and tremble, hand and lip.
This is the chair from which she gathered up
Her dress, the carefullest, commodious weave Inwoven by a weaver to twelve bells . . .
The dress is lying, cast-off, on the floor.
Now, the first tutoyers of tragedy
Speak softly, to begin with, in the eaves.

WALLACE STEVENS

"As Much Humanity as Possible . . ."

THE JOURNALS OF ANDRE GIDE.
Volume I: 1889-1913. Translated from the French, with an Introduction and Notes, by Justin O'Brien.
Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE publication of this first of a projected three-volume American translation of Gide's "Journal: 1889-1939" should mark a fresh start, rather than a continuation, of Gide's reputation in the United States. The "Journals" draw Gide's other works into focus; but do many people now read Gide's former American translations? Scattered and few and out of series, these translations began to appear in 1924 with "Strait Is the Gate," reached a high point of popular interest in 1927 with "The Counterfeiters," and narrowed down thereafter to a few assorted works presented more or less at random. After 1931 no more was heard of Gide in ordinary trade editions (a limited edition of "Si le grain ne meurt . . .," translated by Dorothy Bussy under the title "If It Die," came out in 1935) until after his disillusionment with Soviet Russia: "Return from the U. S. S. R." appeared in 1937 and "Afterthoughts on the U. S. S. R." in 1938. The latest work published in America is Malcolm Cowley's translation of "Interviews Imaginaires," in 1944; and here again, as in the two former books, Gide is presented as an aging but active idealist, nearer the edge of politics and journalism than the center of literature.

The "Journals" correct these views and provide a firm basis for judgments of Gide's character and place in letters. For they are the central pier upon which the imposing edifice of his work is built. Gide, in fact, from the beginning of his career has been a diarist. The regular, often daily record of thought and event has provided him with a form at once exigent and large, wherein his desire for stability as well as for movement and change, his detailed inquisitiveness as well as his wider curiosity, could be satisfied. Bored with the "big machines" of French literary form, incapable of filling in conventional backgrounds or of inventing stock figures, wary of technical tricks not based on actual emotion, happy to change his mind concerning the worth and direction of his material while that material was still in the process of composition, Gide has always preferred the short form, where effects can be brought off with full spontaneity, before the impelling emotion is exhausted.

Gide's most unfriendly critics have never been able to attack him in respect to his style. The present volume of the "Journals" shows us that style in the making, from the days when the young symbolist had not yet decided to write "without metaphors" to 1913, when the accomplished man of letters had evolved a manner of writing so clear and flexible that it was a matter of pride to himself and of emulation to his disciples. The youthful admirer of Châteaubriand has "sharpened his beak" upon Stendhal. The "Journals" soon come to be based upon sincerity of feeling. In this way they never become a mere record of events. Neither do they fall into the errors and longueurs of the journal intime, since Gide effectually skirts the endless introspective self-indulgences of the intimate diarist. Experience and interest continually enliven the record: books read, music played (Gide is an "intellectual" who can use his hands with precision and speed), journeys undertaken, gardens planted, friends met, meals eaten, daylight walks and midnight prowls described, methods of work delineated with the same care as the most obscure of passing moods, the weather and the scenery enjoyed. Gide's advance into maturity is by no means in a straight line, without forced detours or periods of circuitous progress. But he early found his pace and his road. He writes, in 1905: "I escaped early from that world in which, to appear proper, I had to watch myself too closely."

Gide's courageous moral stand, which had so much influence on the post-1918 generation, is not indicated very clearly here: he has written his "confessions" elsewhere. The first exposition of his moral theories appeared in "Les Nourritures Terrestres" in 1897, in the last decade of the nineteenth century, at a time when, in French intellectual life, all that was not "determinist" or "finalist" was suspect. A rigid positivism had penetrated French thought to an excessive degree. The only escape for "sensitive souls" was into the refuge of an equally strict and confining religious dogma. In this situation, through bitter personal suffering, after a stay in North Africa and a friendship with Wilde, Gide dared to reconcile irreconcilables. He brought emotion over into the moral realm, declaring the experiences of the flesh to be of equal value to those of the mind and the spirit; and he affirmed that spiritual values could operate in a life-giving manner outside the rituals of religion. Always claiming a basic Christianity, he began his meditations on the figure of a Savior who stood for man's joy rather than for man's tragic and deforming frustration.

As the world of affairs begins to claim more of his attention, Gide meets people and events head-on; he does not take anyone's opinion as his own; he analyzes character and motive with a penetrating combination of intuition and acumen. His dislike of virtuosity in art parallels his impatience with the deviousness and pretentiousness of human beings. The tension between the oppositions within himself continues; perfect balance between impulse and scruple, asceticism and sensuality is never entirely achieved. There are breakdowns, nervous crises, and capitulations, as well as spiritual and physical convalescences and reanimations. By keeping the poles of the tension clear, however, Gide escapes most of the enticements of self-deception. His life and relationships must be kept, so far as possible, vital and necessitous. All must be natural in the area of the senses while at the same time the will must function with a kind of "supple obstinacy." Gide's dealings with his colleagues and friends never lack an edge of critical sharpness; but shows of ambition, jealousy, rancor, and spite never occur, and small gossip and downright malice are relatively rare. His chief desire is to have friends who "exist behind and beyond what [they] reveal to us." He does not neglect "the insulted and injured."

Take upon oneself as much humanity as possible. That is the correct formula. . . . Absence of sympathy equals lack of imagination. The most gifted natures are perhaps the most trembling. . . . As soon as an emotion decreases, the pen should stop; when it continues to run on just the same—and it runs on all the more easily—writing becomes detestable. . . . The wonderful thing on this earth is that we are forced to feel more than to think.

These are the words of a man and an artist who has detached himself from killing and "glacial" abstractions and moved into a world where the modern divided spirit is at least partially healed, where there are provable and classic linkages between the timeless and the time-bound.

Nothing has been spared—neither good-quality large paper nor an intelligent and meticulous editor—to make this American edition, to be complete by 1950, impressive. The French Pléiade edition (1939 and 1940) on which it is based still retains a peculiar charm, however. Complete in one volume, printed on thin paper, its 1,352 pages compactly yet flexibly bound, this French edition resembles some object delightful and usable: a convenient missile, let us say, against "the Philistine"; or a concentrated form of nourishment, on which one could maintain life over a long period.

LOUISE BOGAN

The Straight Way Lost

THE MIDDLE OF THE JOURNEY.

By Lionel Trilling. The Viking Press. $3.

WHEN we meet John Laskell he is thirty-three, crossing the perilous Dantean decade in which the risks, doubts, and challenges of a man's life declare themselves and his personality first begins to contract into the limitations and decisions to which it is fated. He is "a fortunate young man of the middle class" who has disciplined his privileges by an earnest if skeptical liberal faith. He has become, after earlier creative leanings, an authority on housing, so justifying in his own mind the social bearings of his political sympathies. He has loved once, a healthy, intelligent girl called Elizabeth Fuess, and they loved in the intelligent, reasonable way of an emancipated modern passion. She, however, died suddenly, and he has not yet committed himself again to the risk of so inexplicably violated a confidence in life.

His friends are mostly liberals like himself. One is Arthur Croom, assistant professor and Socialist, a man "in whom the drive for power did not destroy intelligence and character," a "man of the near future." Another is Croom's wife Nancy, charming, domestic, college-bred, and soon to reveal "a passion of the mind and will so pure that, as it swept through her, she could not believe that anything that opposed it required consideration." A third is Kermit Simpson, rich publisher of the left-liberal New Era, "very handsome, a big rangy man who was good at field sports, court games, and boating," but also "all too bland. There was no roughness in him. He never followed passion where it led, nor did necessity ever constrain him to resistance. The blandness was fatal to his character." There is finally Gifford Maxim, member and secret agent of "the Party," a "man of the far future, the bloody, moral, apocalyptic future that was sure to come," who has become the standard of dogmatic conviction around which the lesser faiths and good intentions of his friends have come to take their bearings.

Laskell, when the crucial summer of the novel begins, has just recovered from an almost fatal attack of scarlet fever. It has laid open the lesions and doubts of his character. He has learned for the first time the difference between the sick and the well, between the meaning of death and the healthy world that fears to hear death mentioned, between the will to live and the wish to die, between security and fear and what these mean in the struggle for existence. Just as he is about to emerge into the world again to go to Connecticut for the curative summer the Crooms have arranged for him, Maxim drops a bombshell by revealing that he has renounced the Party. Laskell goes to the country. He lives down the road from the Crooms' house with the Folgers. He meets the semi-derelict family of the Caldwells—Duck Caldwell, selfish, honest, alcoholic, imperative, with a mind "not wicked" but "the pure will of nothingness," who works around the Croom house; his wife Emily, who once ran a tea-room and still echoes a feebly Bohemian past; and their child Susan, to whom Laskell becomes unwittingly attached.

Laskell, his wounds still open, thus becomes involved in a drama of faiths that comes to include not only the latent

ON THE PILOTS WHO DESTROYED GERMANY, IN THE SPRING OF 1945

I stood on a roof top and they wove their cage
 Their murmuring throbbing cage, in the air of blue crystal.
 I saw them gleam above the town like diamond bolts
 Conjoining invisible struts of wire,
 Carrying through the sky their geometry
 Woven by senses delicate as a shoal of flashing fish.

They went. They left a silence in our streets below
 Which boys gone to schoolroom leave in their playground.
 A silence of asphalt, of privet hedge, of staring wall.
 Through the glass emptied sky their diamonds had scratched
 Long curving finest whitest lines.
 These the day soon melted into satin ribbons.
 Falling over heaven's terraces near the sun.

Oh that April morning they carried my will Exalted expanding singing in their aerial cage.
 They carried my will. They dropped it on a German town.
 My will expanded and tall buildings fell down.

Then, when the ribbons faded and the sky forgot,
 And April was concerned with building nests and being hot
 I began to remember the lost names and faces.

Now I tie the ribbons torn down from those terraces
 Around the most hidden image in my lines,
 And my life, which never paid the price of their wounds,
 Turns thoughts over and over like a propeller Assumes their guilt, honors, repents, prays for them.

conflict between himself, the Crooms, and Simpson, but also the deeper conflict between these middle terms of the modern moral and political intelligence and the oppositions that hedge them—the derelict Caldwells on one side; the passionately dogmatic Maxim, driving from Communist to religious absolutism, on the other. The drama grows in tension; its debate proliferates; it arrives at a climax of passion (Laskell and Emily Caldwell) and another of death (Susan's, at the hand of her father). It tests the cluster of friends to their foundations. And the summer ends with their relations profoundly and permanently disturbed. One autumn morning Laskell, now tested in more than his health yet stronger in more than body, takes the train back to the city.

These, too briefly and inadequately, are the characters and outward events of Lionel Trilling's first novel, and readers who know not only his critical endowment but also his earlier stories will know what to expect in the way of a narrative keenly sustained and subtly articulated. It is, indeed, a novel of remarkable—of almost unflinching—auster-ity. Little or nothing has been conceded to the conventional inducements of current fiction. Effects of action and background are reduced to a minimum. Humor, by-play, color, and incident are pared to the quick. The treatment is on first acquaintance stark in its economy of detail and "atmosphere." But it defines a milieu that has, with the emergence of a new type of novel from the critical thought of the past ten years, become a new area in fiction. (It finds differing versions in "Memoirs of Hecate County" and Eleanor Clark's "The Bitter Box," and recent minor examples like John Kelly's "All Souls' Night" and Wallace Stegner's "Second Growth" aid in defining a new genre among novelists.)

It is the milieu of the contemporary literary and political intelligentsia. One must admit that nothing the realists and naturalists of the nineteenth century tackled in the way of unromantic discouragements when they undertook to bring the drab lives of servant girls, nuns, shopkeepers, miners, and wage slaves into the novel is missing for the present-day artist who attempts to dramatize a world as generally bleak, unheroic, and denatured as the world of contemporary thinkers, writers, and professors. Those flats in the Village, cottages on the Cape, houses in Connecticut, and campus colonies!—is it possible that the slightest spur to imagination lingers in them? One may, moreover, tend at first to complain that Mr. Trilling has abstracted his characters from their real roots and conditions in modern society; that he has endowed their acts and words with an obtrusive self-consciousness and absence of human spontaneity that reduces their dramatic appeal and pathos to a minimum. We are told little of where or how they originated in American life. All of them—the Crooms, Laskell, Simpson, even the more localized Caldwells, Folgers, and Walkers—are suspended in a kind of social and moral void. Their talk is strung to a painful pitch of personal abstraction. Exceptions do occur: two wonderful nurses and a country clergyman; but often their performances—especially the high-strung, bright-minded speeches of Nancy Croom, the pathetic soul-hungers of Emily Caldwell, or the efforts of her child Susan to recite a Blake poem "with expression"—are calculated to set the teeth on edge.

What Mr. Trilling has written is, quite overtly, a dialectic novel. The term appears in his pages. His language is analytical, his structure polemic, his sequence of scenes and confrontations among characters virtually syllogistic. Yet it is a remarkable testimony to his skill and sincerity, and to the tenacious probity of his thinking, that he has been able to keep his plotting sharply dramatic; that as we read we lose our sense of lacking familiar fictional ingredients; and that we become profoundly absorbed in his story, not only as a brilliantly sustained argument but as the record of an essential experience and milieu of our age, one fully equal in validity to the actualities of proletarian fiction and far more salient than the later attenuations and enfeebled appeals of the novel of sensibility.

By that time also, convinced by the passion with which ideas and convictions can possess the modern mind, we feel the authenticity of his scenes and people. Nancy Croom, with her socialist logic and scarifying affection, becomes a classic portrait of one type of modern woman. The little girl with her Blake poem is a true and pathetic image of cultured childhood (the Progressive-Schoolgirl in Mr. Trilling's story, "The Other Margaret" was a brilliant anticipation of this portrait). Kermit Simpson is the muzzy-minded prototype of a dozen wealthy patrons of the left. The scenes of the drama itself precisely define the orbit of middle-class gentility, academic inhibition, and well-to-do patronage that has nurtured the cautious self-deceptions and guilty fears which have lamed the liberal position in modern thought and made the triumph and tyranny of absolutes so sinister in our age.

For the theme of the novel is the fate of the liberal critical intelligence in our time—and its necessity. John Laskell's is the mind in which that fate is tried, the focus, made vulnerable by illness and a fresh access of clarity, of the conflict between the political and moral passions that contend around him. Mr. Trilling is, I suppose, the finest analyst and historian of the liberal predicament we have among us today. His account of that problem in his earlier books and essays is permanent. We are kept fully aware, in this novel, of his rigorous insight and schooling in the liberal dilemma. It is probably inevitable that one should recall his admirable book on Forster in this connection—particularly if one emphasizes the fact that "The Middle of the Journey" is quite independent of Forster's work in style, method, and content—and likewise his searching book on Arnold. It is also inevitable, knowing his brilliant critical talent, to recall how fully he knows of the existence of modern classics of dialectic art like "The Sacred Fount," "The Ivory Tower," "The Magic Mountain," "Howard's End," and "The Counterfeiters." Such books have provided a schooling for his imagination; he has not denied himself the most formidable models; but they have not deprived him of his own language and invention. What he said in his Forster book about that novelist's dissection of the evils of the "undeveloped heart" in modern life is as relevant here as what he said about the role which Forster assigns to the "relaxed will" and to "the Primal Curse . . . the knowledge of Good-and-Evil" in modern morality. When I discussed Mr. Trilling's book on Forster in these pages four years ago I compared the Englishman's art with that of André Gide. What those men share in their conception of the novel is shared also by Mr. Trilling. For him also the novel is what Gide called it—"a crossroads—a meeting place of problems"; he knows the importance of believing that "whatever your station or country, you should believe only what is true, and what you would be disposed to believe if you were of another country, another station, another religion."

When John Laskell, at the end of his momentous summer, faces the rival angers of his friends—the Crooms with their inflamed conviction of the guilt of society which permits no responsibility in the individual; Maxim with his dogmatic moralist belief in individual responsibility which admits the mitigation of mercy—he knows at last why they are angry with him. It is "the anger of the masked will at the appearance of an idea in modulation. The open will does not show that anger; only the will masked in virtue shows it." But against their accusations Laskell holds to his position. It is the will in modulation that must survive if absolutes are to be denied their tyranny and the intelligence is to survive for the uses of justice and truth. Mr. Trilling has been, in some quarters, severely—and ineptly—censured for defending "individual morality" against "social morality" in his story "The Other Margaret." This novel, with its subtle, athletic, and unsimplified articulation of the whole truth, "the double truth," of social and individual values, shows how truly he sees the complex actuality of values which the simplistic moralism of dogmatic or abstracting minds, hot for action and accusation, ignores. On that score alone "The Middle of the Journey" becomes a powerful document. But it is more than a document. It is a brilliant example of a new mode of fiction, one whose function in the moral dilemmas of our age his acute critical sense has seen, and whose claims on the imaginative resources of his generation the finely controlled, humanly faithful art of this novel demonstrates. It is a book that brings the best critical intelligence now discernible in America into play with an absolutely honest creative talent. And it shares with only a few recent books of my acquaintance the honor of establishing that cooperation of talents on a sound, perhaps even on a classic, footing.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Something Less Than Abigail

ABIGAIL ADAMS. By Janet Whitney. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

THIS biography, or rather semi-fictionalized life, of Abigail Adams belongs to a school of writing which I might venture to call—if the word can be used in a non-pejorative sense—feminine. The substance of it is letters, quoted or paraphrased, of the heroine; and happily the wife of John Adams could write with vigor and distinction. Interstices among the sources are filled in with imaginative recreations of settings, conversations, and passions; these unfortunately are composed in a vein contrasting widely with the hard clarity of Mrs. Adams.

Thus at the birth of John Quincy we find that Abigail, "lying in the big feather bed, exhausted, happy, and sad, had no suspicion that the two men who, each in his own way—one so earnestly masculine, one so nuddling and small—comforted her sorrow, were incipient Presidents of a republic yet unborn." Occasionally the writing achieves still greater miracles of anticipation, as with the announcement that Abigail, having been born in Weymouth, went visiting to Quincy and there breathed "what was to become her native air." Sometimes, striving for the dramatic, it reaches sheer bathos, as when, presented with Abigail pining for letters from John in Philadelphia, we are suddenly asked, "What, then, about the postal system?"

What, then, we are bound to continue, is wrong with this kind of writing? One difficulty, in this case, may be that the source is just too good. To offer anything beyond self-effacing annotation to the text of Abigail Adams's letters is impertinent. The delicate flavor of history is in them, the subtle essence of a provincial Enlightenment, rationalistic yet Puritan, proud yet insecure, but the bouquet evaporates quickly when opened in the heavy atmosphere of "Fate was busy at the loom." It adds little to our comprehension of the love of Abigail for John (she referred to him between 1797 and 1801 even in letters to her own sister as "the President") to be told, "He was very much of a man's man, but women fell for him." And when, in Mrs. Whitney's part of the narrative, we are treated to a dialogue in which the little woman strengthens the resolution of her spouse to scorn the proffered bribe of the royal governor, when she shyly murmurs her admiration and "his strong arms came round her waist," we can only long for the relief of the actual Abigail who said—in words not quoted by Mrs. Whitney—that her husband's opponents were "the most base, profligate, and abandoned Culprits which were ever permitted to scourge the Nations of the Earth."

However, the trouble is not only that such sentimentality fudges the narrative and dulls the characters. Abigail Adams lived in history and distilled it into her letters. They are a joy to read, just as they stand, but it is a greater pleasure to bring some sense of history to the reading. For an author, even a novelist, to identify himself too closely with his central figure is dangerous if he still hopes to put that figure into meaningful relations with other characters or with time and space. In the biography of a historical character such identification of writer and subject becomes pernicious, for if the biographer has any function beyond editing the words and listing the acts, it is to make an effort, however tentative, toward determining what, in the light of history, his subject means. No actor in history, not even so intelligent an actor as Abigail Adams, can quite say it. Instead of such interpretation Mrs. Whitney offers: "He gathered her to him in the dusk, and held her to his own hard-beating heart." In a narrative so centered Jefferson and Hamilton, whose differences with John Adams were the stuff of history and upon which Mrs. Adams had some good things to say, inevitably become insubstantial figures. We are told that Abigail "browsed through many a volume," but we learn little of what books she read or with what ideas her mind, generally recognized as about the best of contemporaneous American women's, was actually furnished. That she was the wife of one President and the mother of another is less interesting than that she was the fine exemplar of eighteenth-century New England culture; this aspect of the biographical problem is not even recognized in Mrs. Whitney's treatment.

Those who would enjoy the privilege of meeting Abigail Adams face to face will turn to the edition of her letters to her sister recently published in The Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, Volume 55, under the expert editing of Stewart Mitchell. Mrs. Whitney has touched upon only the high spots of these rich manuscripts; she has, however, been allowed by the custodians access to "relevant portions" of material not generally available to students. We are obliged once more to regret that the decision as to what among the Adams papers may or may not be relevant is denied the community of scholars. This volume is pathetic testimony to the fact that guardians do not always appreciate the best interests of their wards.

Bosses and the Boss

YOU'RE THE BOSS. By Edward J. Flynn. The Viking Press. $3.

REILLY OF THE WHITE HOUSE.

By Michael F. Reilly as Told to William J. Slocum. Simon and Schuster. $3.

MR. FLYNN'S "You're the Boss" is clearly destined to become a small political classic. I do not know of any book which combines so effectively a candid analysis of the machine system, an able defense of it, and a realistic account of machine activity in concrete political situations. Few politicians are sufficiently reflective or articulate to describe the techniques which have become for them a matter of instinct or conditioned reflex. No one perhaps since Martin Van Buren has equaled Ed Flynn in uniting professional virtuosity with insight and intellectual detachment.

"We cannot have government without elections," Mr. Flynn writes, "elections without organizations, or organizations without a 'spoils system' to keep them going." Political machines and their flora and fauna are thus indispensable to a democracy and will survive the passing squalls whipped up by "reformers" or "good-government" people—words Mr. Flynn rarely uses without derisive quotation marks. So long as the citizens are unwilling to give as much time to politics as the politicians do, they must expect machine rule; and when they do give the time, they can overthrow any machine which fails to serve their purposes—a fact which an intelligent boss never forgets. Whether machines will be good or bad "depends upon the interest of citizens in their party government, upon whether that interest is just as strong and unflagging as their interest in their local, state, and federal government." Thus though bosses are inevitable in our system, bad bosses are not. "This book is respectfully addressed to you, the reader," Mr. Flynn concludes, "because you're the boss."

Mr. Flynn's general analysis seems irrefutable. His defense of the machine, however, depends on the element which philosophical defenders of bossism, from Van Buren and Thurlow Weed down, have always made paramount but which practitioners have very often ignored: that for the most practical reasons of survival a machine must produce relatively honest and efficient government. When Flynn became leader of the Bronx, for example, it was proposed that he take advantage of the proffered aid of gangsters in fixing elections. His rejection of this proposal was on good pragmatic grounds.

If they engaged in such an election practice to help me, they would in turn come back and ask me to help them illegally. This price was too high to pay. Furthermore, I did not even want gangsters in the Bronx. So I decided not only to decline their assistance but to kick them out. I have found out that sticking religiously [sic] to this decision has paid me dividends many times over.

The trouble with machines, of course, is that so few bosses have Flynn's preference for the long view over the quick profit. In the American political equilibrium a reform movement is the price the boss pays for self-indulgence.

Mr. Flynn's comments on Roosevelt and the New Deal are strictly from his professional frame of reference. The broad social impulses of the New Deal appear to have had little interest for him—a fact which distinguishes him from someone like Van Buren. He would tolerate the New Dealers so long as they stuck to policy-making, but when Tom Corcoran muscled into the organization field, Ed Flynn struck back like a gamekeeper fighting poachers. A deep affection for Franklin Roosevelt, as for his wife, shines through an uncommonly honest assessment of F. D. R.'s personal virtues and shortcomings. "His two greatest weaknesses, in my opinion," Flynn writes, "were the bitterness which he engendered within himself and the weakness he displayed in his inability to be frank and open in many instances in his dealings with people."

"Reilly of the White House" adds a number of entertaining sidelights on Roosevelt. Michael F. Reilly succeeded Colonel Starling as head of the Secret Service detail at the White House on the day of Pearl Harbor. Through the war his assignment was to protect the President wherever business or relaxa-

ATLANTIC HARVEST. Memoirs of the Atlantic. Compiled by Ellery Sedgwick. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. $4.50.

IT IS perhaps disappointing that this volume of Mr. Sedgwick's does not turn out to be an "objective" and genuinely "representative" anthology of pieces from the Atlantic Monthly illustrative of its history from the beginning, in 1857, to the end of Mr. Sedgwick's own editorship in 1938. Certainly it is not that, and no one should buy the book who expects to find in it a single scrap by Emerson or the elder Holmes, by Lowell or Mrs. Stowe, by Howells or Henry James, by Charles Eliot Norton or E. L. Godkin or William Vaughn Moody. Mark Twain is here, as he ought to be, and so too are Sarah Orne Jewett and Edith Wharton, John Jay Chapman and Woodrow Wilson; but they are here for their own sakes, or for editorial reasons of Mr. Sedgwick's, and not primarily because they exemplify what the Atlantic once meant in American intellectual life.

The anthology, however, has a real interest, though a different one; it is a frankly personal collection by Mr.

Sedgwick of pieces that continue to interest or please him, and as such it furnishes us with a kind of blueprint for the editing of a highly successful and even distinguished magazine of what might be called the intellectual arriere-garde. There is no doubt that Mr. Sedgwick very early hit upon an editorial formula that was to prove brilliantly successful in its appeal to a very considerable segment of the reading public, and this anthology gives us a compact view of how that formula operated.

Its most important single ingredient might be described as the True Story Genteel or True Confessions for the Well-Educated. A good third of the pieces in this volume are in this decidedly non-"pulp" vein of personal revelation, autobiographic testimonial, or refined remembrance of things past. The educated girl from the East who married a handsome young moonshiner, the public-utilities executive who underwent conversion, the great actor's son who decided to become an actor himself—characters such as these were long familiar to Atlantic readers, and they rightly predominate in this anthology. Fortunately, too, Mr. Sedgwick's passion for the reminiscent sometimes presents us with a recollective essay on a different level; an admirable example here is Henry Villard's really lively "Recollections of Lincoln"—published when Bliss Perry was editor.

A hardly less important ingredient of the formula is the Grade-B or even Grade-C short story, preferably the short story that, while it comes to grips with some painful issue of the moral life, inculcates, indirectly or explicitly, an essentially wholesome and Anglo-Saxon—if possible American, and best of all New England—resolution of that issue. In consequence, one looks in vain for the writers of short fiction who, during the thirty years of Mr. Sedgwick's editorship, were at work on the frontiers of literary expansion and discovery—Sherwood Anderson, say, or Virginia Woolf, or Katherine Anne Porter, or William Faulkner—and what one does find is Katherine Fullerton Gerould, Mary Webb, Hetty Hemenway, and Walter D. Edmonds. It is true that Hemingway is represented here by "Fifty Grand," and Lawrence not by a story but by a rather inferior sketch; but it is hard not to feel that these are sops held out by Mr. Sedgwick to some placable Cerberus of the literary underworld.

Let me mention one more constituent of a typical Atlantic issue, and then have done: it is the more or less informal essay in the tradition of Lamb or Oliver Wendell Holmes, and it is represented here by an intolerably arch and allusive essay on cats by Agnes Repplier, a tweedy sort of piece "On Dogs and Men" by Henry Merwin (a name I must confess to no familiarity with, otherwise), and a really corny essay on national differences by Salvador de Madariaga—"Englishman, Frenchman, Spaniard"—the thesis of which, if this can be credited, is that the Englishman is essentially a man of action, the Frenchman a man of thought, and the Spaniard a man of passion. It must be added that Mr. de Madariaga puts forward this view in a bold and uncompromising manner.

Like all editorial formulas, Mr. Sedgwick's naturally has its negative aspect; he knows what ought to be left out as well as what ought to be put in, and it is striking that this anthology contains no poems whatever (unless perhaps A. P. Herbert's brilliant Shakespearean parody, "Two Gentlemen of Soho," should be excepted) and no literary criticism, unless, again, one should except Woodrow Wilson's often reprinted essay on "Mere Literature" and an effort by Ellen Terry on the letters in Shakespeare's plays—a piece that is not at all inconsistent with Ellen Terry's having been an admirable actress.

The greatest dramatic story of all time told in the actual words and familiar voice of . . .

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT "RENDEZVOUS WITH DESTINY"

The Big Muddy and MVA

THE MISSOURI VALLEY, LAND OF DROUGHT, FLOOD, AND PROMISE. By Rufus Terral. Yale University Press. $3.75.

PROBABLY the most important thing that can be said about the Missouri Valley is that the American people—including those who live in the valley—know so little about it. They cannot be blamed too much, since not until 1945 did the government begin to map the area by modern methods. It still does not collect adequate weather data in the region. Its experts do not really know how much water there is in the Missouri River system, and land still is being irrigated without determining whether this will increase its fertility or sterilize it through the release of alkali.

Since the homesteading days, since the railroads flooded the East with enticing circulars to sell the land which had been given to them, people have had false notions about the region. Few realize that a large part of it is almost a desert, dry, treeless, windswept. Having been impressed by a grade-school geography's emphasis on the length of the river, they are amazed to learn that it actually carries less water than, say, the Tennessee—a much shorter stream draining a much smaller watershed. Nor do they know that discriminatory railroad freight rates and the lack of industries help to make the Missouri Valley—like the South—one of the major economic problems of the United States.

This problem is not likely to be solved until it is fully stated. There is not likely to be an MVA until the need for it is widely understood. Ignorance about this region is the greatest barrier to the realization of its potentialities. Private-power lobbyists and other ax-grinders exploit it to the full. Against this ignorance Mr. Terral's book should be of immense help. Unlike the technical "literature" about the valley's problems, it is written for the intelligent layman. And unlike magazine articles and newspaper editorials, it does not deal merely with some immediate facet of the story; it tells it whole, and, with a grace that will keep readers interested in the details of a tragedy of neglect, exploitation, and preventable devastation which they might otherwise be tempted to abandon as too "difficult." (A better map in later editions also would help.)

Mr. Terral, whose qualification for this work was heightened by service on the TVA staff in Knoxville before joining that of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, outstanding crusader for MVA, has not oversimplified his book. Instead, he has written a series of chapters on the various sub-problems which flow together like the Big Muddy's tributaries to create the Missouri Valley problem. After a deft introduction to the errant river itself he really begins with the land and the over-exploitation of its top soil. Consideration of drought and flood brings up a discussion of the unbelievable welter of water laws written by the various states in a desperate attempt to conserve their most valuable asset. Then comes a fascinating chapter on grass, much more helpful in conservation than any statute. Incidentally, the development of buffalo-grass seed at the Hays, Kansas, agricultural experiment station, operated jointly by the Kansas State College and the United States Department of Agriculture, is an outstanding example of the perseverance of underpaid government scientists. Congressmen on the verge of a diatribe against "waste and extravagance" should read it.

The same spirit helped to plant shelter belts in the treeless, semi-arid Western valley, and it developed sorghum as "the corn of the plains." This has a shorter growing season than corn and so can be planted farther north; it does not require as much water; it has 90 per cent of corn's food value; it can be fed to cattle, hogs, and other livestock. It has been manna to South Dakota—whose farmers met in 1934 to discuss "whether it was possible any longer to make a living from farming" in the state.

From the research men, too, come suggestions for the industries which the valley needs to stabilize its economy—wool manufacturing; leather working; fiber, plastics, and building materials from wheat, corn, potatoes, and other field produce; grain alcohol, which, as was demonstrated during the war, could well replace high-octane gasoline as an efficient motor fuel; the phosphates which the soil needs; lignite, manganese, electrochemicals, and electrometallurgicals.

But there is no staying away from the river. It flows through the land and all its problems and possibilities. There is, for example, no chance for industries without power; and the river holds the power—in its narrow mountain reaches rather than where it wanders between wide banks to its mouth. It holds the possibility of cheap transportation, too. This has hardly been realized through the Army Engineers' channel-dredging, but Mr. Terral cites the advantages of the TVA's system of slack-water pools even though he is aware of its costliness. It is much less wasteful of water than the army's constant stream, a point of importance in a valley which needs irrigation and in which water is none too abundant. This must seem paradoxical to outsiders who hear only of the Missouri's floods. The trouble is that 60 per cent of the river's entire flow is discharged in May, June, and July. Certainly, the engineers' levees do nothing to change this.

So one comes back again to ignorance—or at least to an amazing lack of co-operation. Even the men who have worked hardest to meet the valley's needs confess that they are not working as a team. Said one: "We found a lot of good research going on, but in a good many instances work done in Utah and Wyoming was not known by the institutions of Colorado, not to mention the fact that it was not known by the people who live in those states." This alone is a decisive argument in favor of the MVA idea rather than the so-called Pick-Sloan plan, which would do precious little to wipe out frustrating divisions of interest and authority. Despite the propaganda of politically influential interests, coordination under a single authority of the efforts to solve the region's varied problems is essential. Mr. Terral's book makes this clearer than ever, and one hopes that it will be widely read—especially in the valley of the Missouri, where "the need to know" must be met to arouse the will to act.

Jeremiah from Massachusetts
AMERICA'S ECONOMIC SUPREMACY. By Brooks Adams. With a New Evaluation by Marquis W. Childs. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

WHEN first published in 1900, this book attracted some attention in Europe but fell completely flat in America. With eyes turned inward on their own prosperity, the author's fellow-citizens viewed his prophecies of British decline and his warnings of a coming struggle between the United States and Russia for economic control of Asia as just another example of Adamsian eccentricity.

Today, when many Americans are obsessed by the idea of inevitable conflict with Russia, the danger is that the once-neglected words of the Massachusetts prophet will be swallowed without the pinch of salt which subsequent events have provided. Adams often described the shape of things to come with amazing accuracy, but his vision was sometimes blurred, and in particular he failed to see how far history would outmode his prescriptions for action. He was right enough in condemning the absurdities of isolationism, but his alternative—imperialism, nineteenth-century style—is, as Marquis Childs points out in his thoughtful "evaluation," equally unrealistic today.

Brooks Adams, brother of Henry, great-grandson of the second President, was a philosophical historian. In 1895 he published his best-known book, "Law of Civilization and Decay," in which he developed the thesis that the center of trade—the point where the products of the East exchanged for those of the West—had hitherto moved in a westerly direction from Babylonia to Byzantium and thence to Venice and Amsterdam. With the downfall of Napoleon, that center had been firmly established in London, and a new world equilibrium had been achieved based on the concentration of economic power at that point.

Three events at the end of the nineteenth century led Adams to believe that this equilibrium was being destroyed and to write this book projecting the operation of his "law" into the future. They were the Spanish-American War, the Boer War, and the Boxer uprising, and in his belief their causes were closely related. The contest between the United States and Spain was brought on by the collapse in sugar prices that began when Britain, following free-trade principles, opened its markets to subsidized European beet sugar. That destroyed the prosperity of the West Indies just as repeal of the Corn Laws ruined British farming. In the English appetite for cheap food Adams saw signs of decadence; it was the cause of Britain's steadily mounting trade deficit and its forced liquidation of American investments following the Baring panic of 1893. This led, in turn, to the Boer War, which Britain fought to obtain control of a badly needed new source of income—the Rand mines. The dismal showing of the British forces in South Africa seemed to Adams the final proof of the deterioration of British character: too high living had resulted in mental and physical inertia.

England's difficulties with the Boers gave a green light to its Continental rivals. In particular, Russia, facing the alternative of expansion or revolution, intensified its efforts to get control of China and its mineral wealth, provoking the Chinese resistance that culminated in the Boxer outbreak. Here was evidence, said Adams, that the old equilibrium was destroyed: "The center of the economic system of civilization is in motion, and until it once more comes to rest, tranquility cannot return."

Adams had a low opinion of Russian organizing ability and did not believe Russia was capable of exploiting China's resources on its own. What he feared was a Russo-German combination which would dominate Eurasia and exclude the United States from Far Eastern markets. That, he insisted, would be a highly dangerous development for America, whose ever-growing industrial surplus required wider and wider foreign outlets. Unless it wished to resign itself to stagnation, the United States would be forced to compete for "the seat of empire." But that required a governmental organization equal to "the weight it must support and the friction it must endure; and it is the perfecting of this organization, both military and civil, which must be the task of the next fifty years."

Brooks Adams was an economic determinist, but his determinism seems to have been inspired by the pseudo-Darwinism of Herbert Spencer rather than by "Das Kapital." Thus he said in one passage: "Nature is omnipotent, and nations must flow with the tide. Whither the exchanges flow, they must follow." But if a fatalist he was also a moralist. He scolded the British for their over-indulgence and the Americans for wastefulness and unwillingness to modernize their government.

By implication, therefore, he left some scope for free will. The triumph of the East was not foreordained; energy and foresight might win the center of economic power for the Western Hemisphere. Could the prize be secured without war? Adams was not explicit on this point, but clearly he was not one to shrink from armed conflict—the final test of who was fittest to survive. With all his prescience, he did not foresee the deadly developments of modern science. But we who are agonizingly aware of them, while we cannot shut our eyes to the grim realities of the struggle for power between East and West, must strive to restore global equilibrium by means that do not involve suicide.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Asia's Revolution and Its Leaders

THE REVOLT OF ASIA. By Robert Payne. The John Day Company. $3.50.

ROBERT PAYNE, poet and novelist, turned in "The Revolt of Asia" has turned to political reporting, and his book offers a fresh and challenging approach to the understanding of social change in Asia. His method is to take us into the mental climate of Asia's leaders, which he reconstructs by a brilliant and intuitive use of the details of their careers and especially their own writings. As a biographer of lives rather than a journalist of events, Payne seeks in these revolutionary leaders the springs of their action. The result is tremendously illuminating, though it can also be misleading unless we keep constantly in mind that we are looking at these men on their own terms, as they see themselves.

In brief, Payne finds that Shjarir, Nehru, Mao Tse-tung, and other Asiatic leaders have faced a common problem—how to win independence of Western domination, lead their peoples by means of new democratic institutions, and remake the agrarian economy of Asia's peasant masses. In their various attacks upon this vast problem Payne finds overtones of the American Declaration of Independence far more often than the accents of the Comintern, Washington more of a hero than Lenin, greater concern for social democracy than for communism, more American influence than Russian. Far from being extremists ripe for totalitarianism, these revolutionists, he believes, are primarily reformers seeking a new Asian brand of socialism, inspired by the concept of the Rights of Man and the potentialities of Western technology.

This thesis has not before been so convincingly stated. Mr. Stassen should take note. If these mass movements of India, Indonesia, Viet Nam, and North China aim at national and individual freedom, and use socialist methods because they are too poor to use private enterprise as their path of development, are we well advised to denounce their socialism? Must the super-powers try to polarize every village in the rice paddies of half the world, or can Asia's new mass movements form a neutral element and remain third parties in world politics?

Payne seeks an answer by studying the individual leaders, their early struggles, their pronouncements, their responses to defeat and victory, their philosophies. He begins with Indonesia—Soekarno, Shjarir, Sjarifoedin—but especially Shjarir, the young Dutch-educated lawyer from Sumatra whose pamphlet, "Indonesia's Fight," written in October, 1945, espouses civil liberties and free elections and "provides the intellectual basis for the whole of the Asiatic revolt." Shjarir, says Payne, is a preeminent technician of revolution—a realist but humane and anti-militarist, a socialist leader relying on sentiments of nationalism, democracy, and cultural revival and, "unlike Mao Tse-tung, not obsessed with Marxist doctrine." Quite as much as Nehru or Mao, Shjarir has formulated Asia's problem of change in the broadest terms:

The West itself . . . knew that the application of knowledge and technique could have fatal results if at the same time moral standards were allowed to be overthrown. The chaotic condition existing among the world powers with all that it implies [annihilation by the atomic bomb] arises from man's self-doubt and from the lack of inner moral resistance.

The essential task of the modern man today, whether he comes from the East or the West, is to rescue himself from this abyss by endeavoring to fix again his known position . . . his destination in the cosmos. In all this he must be led by standards of truth, beauty, and kindness, which form together the components of human dignity. These universal values are today no monopoly of the East, nor of the West.

Turning to India, Payne analyzes the personalities and aspirations of Gandhi and Nehru, of Jinnah—whose "smile resembles the gleam on the handles of a coffin"—of Prakash Narain, the Socialist, and many others, and recounts the rise of Congress and the little-publicized Indian revolt of 1942. He shows a novelist's extraordinary facility in the interpretation of character and of national psychology: the motifs of anarchism, penance, and fatalism in the thought of Gandhi, the sense of mass frustration which has haunted modern India. Much of this is intuitive reconstruction by the author. His details are not always accurate (Ting Hsien is not in Hunan), and his transliteration of names is incredibly sloppy. Yet his portrait of Asia is built up out of a wealth of information and an intellectual grasp of the cultural revolution which few journalists have shown. "England," he says, "failed in India not so much by its indifference to the cry for independence, but because it tacitly acknowledged a social system that had lost its usefulness, and contrived nothing to put in its place."

From this standpoint of cultural values Payne discusses China, where he spent the war years, and illumines again the startling contrast between Chiang Kai-shek's "China's Destiny" and Mao Tse-tung's "New Democracy." He notes the absurdities and distortions of the Generalissimo's amazing book—"uneasy, theoretical, jejeune . . . terrifying to people who are actively concerned with the social and industrial reconstruction of China. . . . This is Confucius himself attempting vainly to speak about a world of machines, . . . the spiritual bankruptcy of the Confucians faced with the nascent industrialism of China." Under Chiang and Chen Li-fu the Kuomintang has become increasingly a party, "not of the people, but of the secret police"; this echoes the protests of China's student class.

On the other hand, says Payne, the Chinese Communist program, for all its Marxist trappings, has been a genuine continuation of the program of Sun Yat-sen. Mao's "New Democracy" has been Asia's first "blueprint of agrarian reform and democratic government" in which "communism is thrown overboard . . . in favor of a restricted capitalist-socialist state." Rather than the subservient eastern wing of Russia's bid for Eurasian hegemony, the Chinese Communists, Payne suggests, are the northeastern tip of a great belt of agrarian social revolution stretching from the Middle East around through India, Burma, Indonesia, and Annam to North China. Payne's conclusion is worth pondering:

Of one thing we can be reasonably certain: the Chinese Communists represent the Chinese peasants and have a passionate belief in the peasants' potentialities. Ignorant of industry and diplomacy, incapable of understanding the complexities of Western civilization, so secluded within their own valleys that they suffer from a kind of mental inbreeding, and so accustomed to fighting continual battles on all fronts that they are suspicious of strangers, they represent to a degree unknown elsewhere in the East the birth of a new social system in Asia. Chinese communism is, not an end product; it is a seed that has still to flower, and no one knows what shape the flower will assume.

However much it may over-interpret Asia's leaders or by-pass phenomena like the Chinese Communists' party-line propaganda, "The Revolt of Asia" does an enormous service in illustrating two essential points: first, that the tradition of the American War of Independence and the Rights of Man is indeed a dynamic factor in the minds and hearts of many Asiatics; second, that Asia's revolutionists must work for their own peoples within their own traditions, which are not those of the U. S. A. or the U. S. S. R. They face urgent local problems and must take whatever foreign ideas and technology are suited to their needs. They cannot afford to be doctrinaire or polarized.

I am not sure whether, as Robert Payne contends, Indonesia really has the economic and social resources for a degree of Asiatic leadership, or whether Southeast Asia can actually avoid nationalist Balkanization and move toward federation, or whether cooperatives and land reform have a chance to beat out the concentration of economic power in the hands of landlords, industrialists, and bureaucrats, or whether it is really meaningful to say that the Asiatic century has begun. But in this time when the world seeks to evaluate man's place in a new social order, it is immensely heartening to have so penetrating a glimpse into the minds of Asiatic leaders who think in terms we can understand. More than any other book, "The Revolt of Asia" conveys the spirit of Asia's social revolution.

Old Dramas, New Versions

GREEK PLAYS IN MODERN TRANSLATION. Edited with an Introduction by Dudley Fitts. The Dial Press. $5.

FOR one little thing, to begin with, it is a pleasure to pick up a book in which quotations from the Greek have been proofread with some care, including the matter of accents.

Here are eleven plays by the three great tragic dramatists: Aeschylus is represented by the "Agamemnon," the "Eumenides," and "Prometheus Bound"; Sophocles by the "Electra," the "Antigone," the "Oedipus Rex," and "Oedipus at Colonus"; Euripides by "The Trojan Women," the "Medea," the "Hippolytus," and the "Alcestis."

The editor, seeking for variety of translator as well as of author, has brought into this collection the work of nine translators. Judged as literature, whether prose or verse, rather than for a literal accuracy in following the original, the translations are of varying excellence, thus carrying the editor's principle perhaps farther than he intended. Mr. Latimore's translations of two plays of Aeschylus, "Agamemnon" and "Prometheus Bound," are the finest in the collection, and this is said with all due respect to the excellent version of "King Oedipus" by William Butler Yeats. Mr. Fergusson does handsomely if not nobly by Sophocles's "Electra"; and Mr. Fitzgerald, himself a poet, does very well by "Oedipus at Colonus," though some of the choral passages seem a little more Euripidean than Sophoclean. Collaborating with the editor, Mr. Fitzgerald also presents translations of Sophocles's "Antigone" and Euripides's "Alcestis"; particularly in the first of these, while there is a good deal of dramatic variety in the metrics, there is a bit of theatricalism in the stage directions and general mise-en-scène. Miss Hamilton's rendering of the "Prometheus Bound" seems not quite up to the superlatives claimed for it by the editor; the blank verse is a little inflexible, sometimes on the dull side; not nearly so much so as the Grene and Thomson treatments of the "Eumenides" and "Hippolytus." As for Mr. Prokosch, poor Mr. Prokosch! He has been so roundly and so often scolded for the lushness and softness of his own verse that here he seems to have attempted to write the barest, the starkest prose imaginable. The results are really quite funny. He does not, exactly, have Medea remark: "Good Heavens! I wish I did not have to go into the house and murder my two children," but he comes mighty close.

Mr. Fitts's introduction makes some sound points, tells some home truths, and has the virtue of enthusiasm with the defect of diffuseness. He really does enjoy the classics, as distinguished from regarding them as a solemn duty; and if he sometimes coos or twitters a bit, those sounds, at least, are pleasanter than braying. Some of the translators discuss their methods, or explain difficult points in the original dramas, in commentaries which are to be found in an appendix. There is, in addition, a useful and thorough Index of Names.

Fifty years from now most of the plays, not all, in this collection will have to be retranslated to satisfy the taste of an editor who feels that every age should have its own translations, and that these will no longer suit the public ear. The present collection should do very nicely pro tem; as Mr. Fitts says, the work is offered "for the time being." ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Verse Chronicle

THE AGE OF ANXIETY" (Random House, $2.50) is the worst thing Auden has written since "The Dance of Death"; it is the equivalent of Wordsworth's "Ecclesiastical Sonnets." The man who, during the thirties, was one of the five or six best poets in the world, has gradually turned into a rhetoric-mill grinding away at the bottom of Limbo, into an automaton that keeps making little jokes, little plays on words, little rhetorical engines, as compulsively and unendingly and uneasily as a neurotic washes his hands. A poet has turned into a sack of reflexes: Auden no longer has to struggle against standard tricks, set idiosyncracies, behavior adjustments aged into obsessive behavior—it is these that write his poems.

Most of "The Age of Anxiety" is supposed to be thought or said by four different characters, but they are only four chairs in which Auden takes turns sitting: always the same old voice saying the same old thing. "The Age of Anxiety" is "about" the Seven Ages of Man, landscapes, war, God, everything, anything; after all, if you treat everything alike, any subject is as good as any other, and you might as well give yourself room for completely free association. If a boat is torpedoed and the men die, it's just one more chance for rhetoric; all you need do is make your regular plays on words, write

They swallowed and sank, ceased thereafter
To appear in public; exposed to snap
Judgments of sharks, to vague inquiries
Of amoeboid monsters, mobbed by slight Unfriendly fry . . .

ing: Remember, the real subject of poetry is words. One understands what Auden meant when he said, in a recent review, that all art is so essentially frivolous that he prefers it to embody beliefs he thinks false, since its frivolity would degrade those he thinks true. What sounds like an indictment is a confession, and "The Age of Anxiety" is the evidence that substantiates the confession. Underneath the jokes and fantasies and sermons there is a chaotic, despairing, exhausted confusion about the poem; all its moral sentiments are solemn, hollow whistles in the dark, all its frivolity is the frivolity of a world in which everything is dying away into a senseless dream, "self in self steeped and pashed—quite./ Disremembering, disremembering all now."

Some of the rhetoric in "The Age of Anxiety" is an extravagantly accomplished and professional job, and there are even gleams of Auden, the real Auden, here and there among its manufactured, irrelevant pages; but most of it is mediocre and much of it is abominable—dreary facetiousness that would embarrass a comedian on the radio:

. . . Listen courteously to us
Four reformers who have founded—why not?—
The Gung-Ho Group, the Ganymede Club
For homesick young angels, the Arctic League
Of Tropical Fish, the Tomboy Fund
For Blushing Brides and the Bide-a-wees
Of Sans-Souci, assembled again
For a Think-Fest . . .

The critic who says what I have said about "The Age of Anxiety" is more or less in the position of the little boy who watched the emperor's new clothes go shivering by; but believe me, reader, that morning coat, that rich and modest necktie, that simple but assertive pin, are nothing but delusions of the reviewers, occupational phantasmagoria of people who are reviewing not one bad poem by Auden, but Auden. Auden was, and is potentially, one of the best poets on earth; if it weren't for this "The Age of Anxiety" would be worth neither indignation nor dismay, but only a line or two of indifferent dismissal.

It is wonderful to have some translations of Corbière published ("Poems," by Tristan Corbière, translated by Walter McElroy, Banyan Press, $3); I am so fond of him that I would willingly persuade Margaret Truman to sing

"Cris d'aveugles" on a Sunday Evening Fireside Chat if it would get him a few more readers. No poet of half his greatness is so underrated and unread. Mr. McElroy's translations are fond but, sometimes, foolish; there are horrible mistakes and additions, and the translator is not poet enough to keep within miles of Corbière in all the extraordinary passages that raise one's eyebrows or make one's hair stand on end. Mr. McElroy mistakenly decided to rhyme his translations, and he has a complaisance toward rhymes that beats anything that I, a liberal enough rhymmer, have ever imagined: he will turn that line of lines, Tu sais: j'avais laché la Vie avec des gants, in order to Letting go of life, you know, I wore gloves: those I kept—in order to have kept rhyme with best! Calme plat means dead calm, is translated calm expanse; de travers becomes with stately tread; Oui, j'ai beau me palper becomes I do well to pinch myself; Tu voulais voir à mon front becomes You saw reflected in my face; and so on and so on. And the translator has a distressing habit of missing or disregarding Corbière's jokes: after smiling at Un barbet qui dormait sous le nom de Fidèle, one finds that the fairies have left in its cradle this sad bump on a log: A water-spaniel fond of sleeping, named Trusty. Later, Nous nous mettrons au vert du paradis perdu becomes, We'll find our way to the green of the lost paradise—but Corbière has said something far better, since mettre des chevaux au vert is an idiom meaning to put horses out to graze.

Pound called Corbière the most touching of poets, and Laforgue said, with wistful love, that his poems are strident and unwearying as the cry of the sea-gulls: "We others are all poetic. . . . He is of a different mettle: an unseizable smoke-dried corsair, bold in his raids." Corbière's range is incredible: it is as if you learned that the same man had written "Moby Dick" and "Prufrock," and had then retired to make public appearances under the name of Groucho Marx. Many of Corbière's lines, in their short finality, might have been extracted from the "Sayings of Spartans"—their objects have a stubborn and thingy violence that beats even Robert Lowell—but there are plenty of other lines that put S. J. Perelman to shame, consummately reckless rhetorical passages in which the poet's mocking consciousness of what he is doing is half their effect on the reader:

Nature awakening—in her awakening burst loose—
Dropping her white sheet . . . puts out my chimney.

Look, my nightingales! . . . nightingales of the tornado—

Gay as larks—wailing like screech-owls!

My weathercock, way up there, rubs the rust off his yodel,

And you can hear my Aeolian door lamenting
As did Saint Anthony in his temptation . . .

"Cris d'aveugles" is full of an agony you have to go to the "terrible sonnets" to match; it would be hard to match anywhere the disgust and contempt and identifying acceptance of a poem like "Femme"; the neurotic self-dramatizing self-analysis of some of the dramatic monologues is quite as good as anything of the sort in Eliot—whom Corbière influenced, mostly through Laforgue; and there is everything in the world, one almost fancies, in "Le Poète contumace" and "La Rapsode foraine."

All bad popular poems have this in common: they are lies—and hopeful lies at that. Corbière is far too serious a poet ever to be solemn: what he says he means; but he says it in a series of wonderfully colloquial and idiomatic exclamations—his speech is a sort of living contradiction. Puns, mocking half-dead metaphors, parodied clichés, antitheses and paradoxes, idioms exploited on every level, are the seven-league crutches on which the poems bound wildly forward. If nature, once, made no jumps, it was different from Corbière, who progresses by nothing else; one of his poems passes through its aggregation of exclamations, interjections, vocatives, imperatives as an electron passes through its orbits—now here, now there, and in between nowhere.

There is nobody else so close to Villon, Corbière does equal justice both to what we want and what we get; his wonderful strength and toughness and irony come through a conclusive realization of emotion and spirit, not through any escape from either. (How sentimental, what a hothouse milkweed, a good tough writer like Hemingway seems in comparison!) Corbière's own epitaph ends:

Il mourut en s'attendant vivre
Et vécut s'attendant mourir.

He lived and died catercornered, de travers—obsessed not just by the hard way but by the hardest way; he is a rock set against all the currents of the world.

THE HEIRESS" (Biltmore Theater) is described on the program as suggested by Henry James's novel "Washington Square." That phrase claims for the authors, Ruth and Augustus Goetz, all the latitude anyone could wish, and the result is certainly a good deal more satisfactory than dramatizations usually are. To some it may seem that the play is a bit old-fashioned in manner as well as setting, but it does manage both to capture something of the mood created by a Jamesian situation and at the same time to provide for those sudden crises without which the subtlest atmospheric effects leave a theater audience unsatisfied.

Basil Rathbone plays the role of one of those splendidly cold and arrogant Victorian fathers whom one might find it difficult to believe in if Jane Austen had not anticipated them and if Victorian literature did not take them almost as a matter of course. He hates—though naturally he does not admit the fact even to himself—the daughter whose birth killed her mother, and it is this hatred which is responsible for the daughter's awkwardness and timidity. From his point of view he is angelically patient with her defects; from hers he is a perpetual reminder of the fact that no one will ever love or want her. He is terribly right when he undertakes to protect her from the advances of an obvious fortune hunter, but he does not even attempt to find a way of exposing the latter's character without at the same time suggesting the obvious implication: "No one could possibly want you except for your money." Hence, though the fortune hunter finally exposes himself, his intended victim never hates him in the same way that she hates her father, for the false lover at least pretended that she could be imagined to be desirable.

The last scene of the play, the one in which the heroine calmly bars the door against her lover after she has led him to suppose that she is about to elope with him, is perhaps theatrical in the bad sense of the term. A novelist would find it easier to suggest without the use of so obvious an incident the fact that the girl is not only renouncing this particular suitor but also all hope of anything but a lonely life. Even a more skilful playwright might have found a less melodramatic single scene to convey the same thing. But this is the only occasion on which the theatrical invention is disturbingly forced, and as a whole the play achieves what it intends. That it does so is certainly in no small part due to the extremely resourceful performance of Wendy Hiller, who is called upon to make clear, convincing, and moving at least three things: the shy awkwardness of the unloved daughter; her intense, desperate, and reckless passion when she allows herself briefly to believe that she is loved; and, finally, the proud, stoical acceptance of a life which will be physically comfortable, even dignified and almost splendid, but also completely empty. Patricia Collinge as a silly, romantic poor relation also gives a very telling performance.

Despite the recently renewed vogue of Henry James, the sorrow of the rich is not at the moment a very popular subject. Perhaps what I meant when I said that "The Heiress" might seem to some old-fashioned is simply that it is concerned with nothing except the character and the emotions of private individuals, and that today many persons, even among those who do not profess any rigid dogma, tend to believe that no work of literature which does not imply pretty directly some social or political conclusions can "mean anything." For all I know the future may be theirs. A hundred years hence a personally unhappy heiress may seem to most people as profitless a subject as, let us say, that special sort of conflict between love and honor which the seventeenth century found so unaccountably fascinating. But for me at least the time has not yet come, and I find occasional plays like this not only restful but a bit of a relief.

For those who do not agree with me perhaps "Our Lan" (Royale Theater) should be recommended, even though I had waited all through the first act for the appearance of the hero I thought promised by the title before it burst upon me that "Lan" is poetical Negro dialect for "Land." If the work in question had been treated as ballet, as opera, or as pageant, the highly idealized story of a group of recently freed slaves who established a primitively communistic community on an island off the Georgia coast just after the Civil War might have come off. In the present form, which seems to hesitate between realism and fancy, it fails—in my opinion at least, though not in that of all the reviewers—to be credible in any way. A few of the tableaux are pictorially effective, and a good many familiar spirituals are well sung, which may be enough for those who can never get enough of the latter. Even so, however, one might expect as experienced a director as Eddie Dowling to devise some less awkward way of bringing them in and to avoid such obvious false notes as that struck in the tableau where a Union officer reverently bows his uncovered head when, as usual, the colonists react to a bit of news by bursting into well-coordinated song. Worst of all, "Our Lan" is cursed with some of the most improbable dialogue since "Uncle Tom's Cabin." I do not profess to know what sort of idiom freed slaves actually employed, but presumably they talked in some manner recognizably human, not like the members of a Rogers Group that had been wired for sound.

MOZART'S Piano Concerto K.450, one of the finest of the series, which has been unavailable on records since RCA Victor discontinued the recording of Elly Ney's performance, has now been recorded for English Decca by Kathleen Long with the National Symphony under Boyd Neel (Set ED-25; $7). I wish I could report that the performance is what the work deserves; but I'm afraid I can recommend it only as the half a loaf that is better than none at all. There were details in Ney's performance—distentions of tempo—that I came to dislike; but they were occasional excesses in a sharply contoured performance in which one heard the operation of a strong musical mind and personality. Miss Long's playing, on the other hand, is colorless, contourless, and characterless, and she doesn't even achieve smooth, clear execution of the passagework. On a wide-range machine the sound of the performance is fairly good—the orchestra a little sharp, the piano occasionally distorted; on a machine of limited range the piano is very dull.

I am aware of, and impressed by, the pianistic and musical gifts exhibited by William Kapell in the recorded performance of Beethoven's Concerto No. 2 issued by Victor (Set 1132; $5); but I am aware also of the nervous excitement that he injects into the work and that doesn't belong there. And I am all the more aware of it after hearing, over WQXR, the performance that Schnabel recently recorded in England, and that Victor will not issue here—a performance made enchanting by its lightness of touch, relaxed ease, and matured mastery. The orchestral part in the Kapell performance is well done by the N. B. C. Symphony under Golschmann, and is well balanced with the piano by the excellent recording.

Victor also has issued what Henri Casadesus has called his arrangement of a viola concerto that he has attributed to Handel (Set 1131; $4). It is an agreeable work, which is played with unsubtle straightforwardness—and, in the first movement, with a little too much vigor—by Primrose and an orchestra under Weissmann; and the performance is excellently reproduced.

From Columbia have come two of Debussy's last instrumental works—the Sonata No. 2 for flute, viola, and harp, played by John Wummer, Milton Katims, and Laura Newell (Set X-282; $3.35—i.e., $1.25 for each record and $.85 for the album, these prices including the tax), and the Sonata No. 3 for violin and piano, played by Francescatti and Casadesus (Set X-280; $3.35). Listening to No. 3 again after a long interval I am more sharply aware of the elaborateness of the manipulation of subtle sonorities and figurations, the assured expertness and refinement of workmanship with which it is achieved; but I still find it an elaborate manipulation of mere stylistic mannerisms and formulas that leaves me indifferent. And in No. 2 not even the manipulation is impressive. The performances and their reproduction are very good—the sound of the violin and the piano being the best I have heard from American Columbia records.

Among several Columbia volumes of vocal recordings is one (Set 691; $4.60) of arias from Rossini's "La Cenerentola," "L'Italiana in Algieri," "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," and "Semiramide," sung by Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano, with dazzling beauty of vocal tone (marred only by occasional tremolo), brilliant agility, and delightful musical style. No such style is heard in the orchestral accompaniments conducted by Cimara, the sound of which on a wide-range machine is a little sharp.

Another (Set X-283; $3.35) offers four arias of Bach—the Qui sedes and Agnus Dei from the B minor Mass, the Et exultavit and Esurientes from the Magnificat—beautifully sung by Carol Brice, contralto. The orchestral accompaniments conducted by Sidenberg are adequate—except that in Esurientes the combination of the two flutes over the single bass-notes sounds very bare without the chords that Bach intended to be filled in by a keyboard instrument. Again the recorded sound of the orchestra is a little sharp on a wide-range machine. And perhaps I should add that I find these arias rather dull.

Another (Set 696; $4.60) offers the fine tenor voice of Raoul Jobin in the impressive Invocation to Nature from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and the lovely O, Paradis from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," together with arias from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" and Massenet's "Werther," "Manon," and "Hérodiade." Orchestral accompaniments conducted by Pelletier are good and well reproduced.

Still another (Set 689; $4.60) offers a group of French songs—Fauré's "Les Roses d'Ispahan" and "Après un rêve," Duparc's "L'Invitation au voyage," Bachelet's "Chère nuit," and four by Milhaud to texts by Ronsard—sung by Lily Pons with orchestral accompaniments conducted by Abravanel and Kostelanetz. Neither the songs nor the Pons crystalline tones are anything I care for. The performances are well reproduced.

And still another (Set 634; $5.85), finally, offers the Rome Narrative from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," the Grail Narrative and Farewell from "Lohengrin," Fanget an, Am stillen Herd, and the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger," and Nur eine Waffe taugt from "Parsifal," sung by the tenor Torsten Ralf sonorously but also with occasional strain, especially in high notes. The orchestral accompaniments conducted by Fritz Busch are excellent; and the performances are well reproduced.

Concord Recordings has sent me a replacement for the defective record in the set of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier that I reviewed recently. The performance of Prelude and Fugue No. 2 is good; the price of the set is $6.85.

Letters to the Editors

Communists Can Be Right

Dear Sirs: Continuing the argument with Alfred Baker Lewis in the September 6 issue I should like to add a few words for Mr. Lewis's benefit and that of other liberals.

For thirty-five years I have been a follower of the socialist and liberal philosophy, part of the time as a member of the Socialist Party and part of the time as just a plain liberal. For twenty years I read a great deal of Trotskyist literature, and as a result my sympathies were with him in his fight with Stalin. So you see I have no Stalinist taint, but I certainly am disgusted with most of the Socialists and liberals.

Why must the Communists always be wrong? It looks as if they might accidentally be right now and then, but not according to the liberals. No government in the world at present suits me, but let us look at the record of the Socialists in Europe. Before the war they were everywhere overthrown by the right after compromising with it. In France, much as I admire Léon Blum, they are conducting an imperialistic war in Indo-China, trying to hold on to their empire, and again compromising with the right domestically, preparing the way for De Gaulle.

The British Labor Party, perhaps the most intelligent socialist party in Europe, is doing fairly well at home, but its foreign policy is a mass of contradictions. In Greece it is rotten, bad in Germany and South Africa, and intolerable when it caters to Franco in Spain and to Portugal. I have great hopes for the Labor Party in England, but I am not sure the threat of fascism is over there yet.

Of course, all is not black or white on either the Communist or the Socialist side; both have made many mistakes, but I certainly go down the line with Del Vayo in trying to get the workers to cooperate to prevent a resurrection of fascism in Europe. From my reading I judge that the Communists in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and France are the nearest right of all groups in those countries. The Communists, like other groups, vary in different countries.

Here the reactionaries have the liberals and labor leaders so scared that they lean over backward to try to keep from being called Communist. Perhaps because Communists are such rare birds in Texas I am just a little skeptical when I read about the Communists getting control of this or that liberal organization or union. In my union if anyone opposes the group in the saddle, he is called a "Commie." Besides, as I said before, the Communists might be right sometimes. I am not so sure as I used to be. J. HAYDEN MOORE, SR.

"Dear Mr. Hoover . . ."

Dear Sirs: Following is the text of a letter sent last year to Mr. J. Edgar Hoover. Since my position must parallel that of thousands of other Americans, perhaps it would do us all good to expose it now to public examination:

Since the FBI has recently been making its periodic check-up on me—the fifth of which I happen to know—it might save your time if I gave you my record once and for all.

I was born in Lowell, Massachusetts, February 6, 1887, and have lived in Greater Boston ever since I was two and a half years old. I received my S. B. in architecture from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1909, and practiced my profession until 1918, when, like practically every architect in the country, I was put out of business by the First World War. The following have been my major activities since then:

I campaigned for woman suffrage—then considered "radical" and "red," but now universally acknowledged right.

I worked against American isolationism and for international understanding, organization, and peace. Now we are a leading member of the U. N.

I was secretary of the Boston Chapter of the American League Against War and Fascism, which advocated a purchasers' boycott against Germany and international official action to stop Hitler and Mussolini while they were still weak enough to be stopped without war. The FBI considered it "red." Over 300,000 dead Americans prove it was right.

I helped raise relief for the legal, democratically elected Spanish Republican government during the civil war, in the agonized conviction that unless we took that opportunity to stop Hitler's and Mussolini's plan for world conquest in its earliest aggression, a world war was inevitable. History has demonstrated how terribly right I was. Even the State Department now proclaims that Franco was a collaborator with the Axis.

I advocated a boycott of oil and scrap iron to Japan, to stop Japanese aggression in China. Pearl Harbor and every American dead in the Pacific prove I was right.

I am on the board of the Boston chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to fight against second-class citizenship for one-tenth of my fellow-Americans. The Declaration of Independence declares, "All men are created equal." Does the FBI consider this subversive?

I have for years been vice-chairman of the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts. Is defending the Bill of Rights subversive? Since my forefathers fought to establish the nation as a free country, my grandfather served as a member of Congress during the Civil War to maintain it free, and one of my great uncles as Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts strove to maintain its legal freedom, I feel that I should also do my share to defend the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

In this conviction I have tried to fight every attack on the liberties of every American. I have therefore been active in the Angelo Herndon case, the Scottsboro frame-up, and similar cases too numerous to mention.

Since denial of any voice in their own government is the supreme denial of freedom and democracy, I have fought the disfranchisement of ten million American citizens by a poll tax barring them from the ballot box.

While I am not, and never have been a Communist, I have publicly defended the constitutional right of any American to hold any political and economic views his conscience dictates. Freedom of conscience, thought, speech, and political action are fundamental American constitutional rights. To deny them is subversive; to defend them, the duty of an American.

I myself believe that the capitalist system, based on the motive of private greed, has run its historical course and that our present economic oligarchy must give way to economic democracy to match our political democracy. (Article V is as valid a part of the Constitution as any other article.) If I had believed that the Communist Party was the best instrument to bring about that forward step I should have joined it publicly, as was my American right.

I am an officer of Local 3, United Office and Professional Workers of America, C.I.O. As at least 100,000,000 Americans are workers or members of workers' families, the labor organizations which fight for the welfare of the working people are fighting for the welfare of the bulk of the American people, organized or unorganized. Moreover, as industry cannot operate unless its products can be sold, organized labor, in fighting today to sustain the purchasing power of the American people, is the greatest force now operating to save us from a depression worse than that of 1929. Surely not a subversive end!

In the endeavor to broaden my knowledge and understanding and to learn truth and wisdom about the world I live in, rather than form my judgments by

Puzzle Note

WITH this issue we announce the winner of the crossword-puzzle contest which has been running for the last twelve weeks in The Nation. The winner—voted for by our readers in the proportion of roughly three to two—is "Mr. Y.," whose real name is Frank W. Lewis.

Mr. Lewis, a research analyst for the War Department, writes that he "became a puzzle addict while on a tour of duty in England, where the so-called British Crossword appears in most papers." He then "turned to Jack Barrett [The Nation's former puzzle-maker] as the only American whose puzzles held sustained interest." Trying his hand at the same sort of thing, Mr. Lewis has, in the opinion of three-fifths of our readers, attained a technique and flavor approximate to the master's.

For the edification of readers who feel that they ought to be let in on the rules of his distinctive style Mr. Lewis has prepared a "Short Guide to Puzzle-Solving." The Nation will be happy to send a mimeographed copy of this "Short Guide" to any reader who requests one.

The many crossword addicts who voted for "Mr. X" may be interested to learn that he is Jack Luzzatto, of the Bronx, a contributor to many newspapers and to several anthologies of puzzles.

Aux Armes!

Dear Sirs: New York University proposes to build its new law center on Washington Square. This will necessitate the demolition of a square block of charming, century-old studios which are literary and artistic landmarks. It will mean the eviction of more than 300 persons in the midst of a critical housing shortage. Many of the tenants are serious artists who require the north light for their work. These buildings have lovely skylights and big casements, especially built for artists by "Papa" Strunsky, who renovated the buildings for artists about twenty years ago.

A year ago the Washington Square Association raised money by public subscription to finance a neighborhood survey conducted by Arthur C. Holden, architect and city planner. New York University contributed to its expense. That survey strongly advised the university to expand to the south and east of the square. The proposed site for the center violates the whole spirit of the Holden survey.

We fully appreciate the needs of N. Y. U. and its worthy objectives in building a bigger and better law school. The Washington Square-Greenwich Village community wishes to have pleasant relations with the university. However, we strenuously object to having the park appropriated as a private college campus. We oppose the destruction of one of the finest groups of studio buildings in New York while a sub-standard area exists adjacent to N. Y. U.—a blight on it and the community. People come from every part of the world to see the famous arch and look at the distinctive studio buildings, which have been the homes and workshops of John LaFarge, John Barrymore, Theodore Dreiser, and other celebrities too many to mention.

We appeal to those who love Washington Square to write to Chancellor Harry Woodburn Chase, New York University, Washington Square, New York, and ask that the university reconsider its plan before the wrecker's ax falls on this beautiful old quarter.

The Shape of Things

IN SO FAR AS THE FRENCH ELECTION WAS A choice between Soviet Russia and the United States, rather than a mere choice of city officials, the United States won, hands down. Whatever else they voted for, the people who piled up De Gaulle's big total voted for American aid this winter. Few of them may have read Senator Bridges's report of his personal warning to Premier Ramadier that "we would not tolerate communism" in France, but they know, just the same, that a Communist victory at the polls would have endangered the chance of large-scale help from America, both now and when the Marshall Plan comes up for discussion in Congress. By comparison with this stake, Russia's offer of wheat to France looked too little, too late, and too expensive. The final returns are not available as we go to press, but three things are already evident: First, the De Gaulle movement has grown, in a matter of months, from an amorphous rassemblement to the first party of France. Second, by throwing its support to the Gaullists, the M. R. P. has practically voted itself out of existence. And, finally, the combined vote of the working-class parties—Socialist and Communist—exceeds De Gaulle's by nearly 500,000. The latter factor will have no concrete meaning if the Communists and Socialists continue to fight among themselves. On the other hand, if the two parties abandon their present hostility and adopt a program of common action, it may have a decisive influence on the future course of French politics. Otherwise, political logic indicates that, in the coming months, De Gaulle will solidify his gains, with strong backing from Washington, and perhaps return to power.

FRIENDS AND ENEMIES OF THE MARSHALL Plan will both find ammunition in the report of the committee of government experts headed by Secretary of Interior Krug. Assigned the task of exploring the state of our resources and reporting on their adequacy to contribute to foreign reconstruction, the committee has gathered a lot of interesting facts together but failed to reach any clear conclusions. Current high production and consumption in the United States, it tells us, are causing a strain on our productive facilities and resources. However, supply difficulties are not "generally attributable to exports," which account for only a fraction of our gross product. On the other hand, the report declares, a foreign-aid program would have a two-fold impact on our economy: it would intensify certain current shortages and it would enlarge the drain on natural resources, which are already subject to a dangerously rapid rate of depletion. The committee seems to believe that a program of foreign aid involving four to five billion dollars annually for four years would not merely continue existing strains on our economy but add to them. Yet even with loans on this scale, it is almost certain that our exports to foreign countries in the next four years will decline in comparison with the past nine months. That record volume was only sustained by loans and grants at least equal to the amounts likely to be made available in the future, plus prodigious drafts on foreign reserves. Consequently, new loans will not mean an increase in the dollar spending power that has been available to Europe this year; they will mean, at most, its partial replenishment.

WHAT IS TRUE—AND THE KRUG REPORT discusses this point at length—is that foreign demand will tend to be concentrated on a few commodities of which there is a world shortage. The result will be a succession of supply problems which will be complicated by the jamming of one bottleneck into another. Thus, Europe could increase its own food production if it could get nitrogenous fertilizers, and it could expand its nitrogen output if it could get more coal. We have huge coal resources, but production is being checked by lack of freight cars, the output of which is in turn held back by insufficient steel supplies. In more ways than one, steel, it seems, is the key bottleneck, but the experts approach the subject of breaking it in a very gingerly manner. An increase in steel capacity, they point out, would itself absorb large quantities of steel, and, in any case, it is doubtful whether raw material would be available to feed new furnaces. They express the hope that output from existing capacity will be increased by technological improvements, and they call for industry-government cooperation in expanding raw-material supplies, particularly scrap, and in channeling finished steel to meet the most urgent demands. In his foreword, Mr. Krug does something to offset the rather negative tone of the report. It proves, he says, that the American economy is physically able to undertake "a considerable program of foreign aid" without jeopardizing national security or living standards. While some strain might be experienced, the war had shown that the American economy had great flexibility and strength. In short, the Secretary concluded, "what we as a nation can do depends in great measure on what we set out to do." That is the real answer to the question whether we can afford to meet Europe's most urgent need as set forth in the sixteen-nation report: if the will is there, the means can be found.

JUSTICE JACKSON'S PROPOSAL THAT THE Supreme Court hand down a clear-cut decision on the validity of divorces granted in the various states—a decision that "simple people can understand and live by"—served at least to dramatize an absurd and very troublesome situation in which an American's marital status may change if he crosses a state line. At the time, the court was hearing two cases in which Massachusetts courts had invalidated divorces granted in Nevada and Florida. The Justice urged the court to do something definite, since previous rulings were conflicting and confusing. Justice Frankfurter took up the cudgels for precedent. "The people who wrote these opinions may be in their graves," he said, "but the wisdom of their opinions lives on." This argument seems misplaced, if the opinions contradict each other. We are not sure that the Supreme Court should or could bring order out of this chaos, but certainly order should be made. Theoretically, the best solution would be the passage of uniform divorce laws which really coincided with the mores of a country where, for better or worse, divorce has become an accepted device for the pursuit of happiness. The trouble is that the end-products might be laws which would make divorce uniformly difficult and so encourage devices, legal and illegal, for getting around them. Perhaps a more sensible idea would be to press for a convention by which each state agreed to recognize the divorces granted in every other state.

BESIDES THE MOMENTOUS SQUELCHING OF John L. Lewis—and even that should not be taken as definitive—the conventions of the two great labor organizations reflected sentiment but made no history. The A. F. of L., it is true, for the first time in its long life set up a political agency to replace its traditional hit-or-miss technique of rewarding a friend here and punishing an enemy there. But the odds are against its "educational and political league" achieving much in the way of a coherent campaign, inasmuch as the federation's top men are as divided as they ever were between Republican and Democratic allegiances. The C. I. O. Polical Action Committee, which has had the advantage of being nearly solidly Democratic, is to be overhauled for a more comprehensive job of campaigning than it has ever undertaken. But it, too, is now assured of political headaches, as the thinly veiled struggle over the convention's foreign-policy resolution revealed. Philip Murray achieved the phenomenal by getting surface agreement on an indorsement of a "sound program for post-war rehabilitation" in which the Marshall Plan was not so much as mentioned. Communists like Irving Potash, of the Fur Workers' Union, professed to see in the statement "not a Marshall Plan, or anybody else's plan, but a C. I. O. plan." And George Baldanzi, who has no use whatever for the Communists, supported the statement with the explanation that "we are for the ideas enunciated by Secretary Marshall, no matter how the hell we write them in this resolution." But no one was deceived into believing that either side found the resolutions to its liking or that the left-right division is not deep and serious. Murray made his own attitude clear by the simple device of inviting Secretary Marshall to address the convention, thus affording him a C. I. O. platform from which to reply to Russian charges that he speaks for Wall Street.

ON AT LEAST TWO OTHER COUNTS, THE representatives of the left must have found the convention a sore trial. First, Jack Kroll, speaking for P. A. C., told the delegates that "a third party is definitely out," that "there's nothing worth while for us in a third party in the immediate future." And, second, R. J. Thomas, bitter opponent of Walter Reuther in the United Automobile Workers, lost the support of Murray, which he enjoyed last year, and as a result lost his seat as one of the nine vice-presidents. A factor in Murray's switch, aside from his own apparent drift to the right, was the charge that Thomas was flirting with John L. Lewis, who has long been attempting to wean the automobile workers away from the C. I. O. or split their union. In this sense, Lewis was defeated at Boston as well as at San Francisco, where the A. F. of L. met. In his own organization, Lewis's fortunes are at a low ebb. He was soundly beaten in his effort to keep the federation from having any truck with the National Labor Relations Board; branding his colleagues as "ravens" and "fat and stately asses," he as good as dared them to carry on without him, and they dropped him from the council; and, finally, he heard his catch-all District 50 denounced on the floor for raiding other federation units. He did succeed in averting a resolution to this effect, but only by having it referred to the council. Should the council find against him, he threatens once more to walk out on the federation—only this time he will go out as an embittered lone wolf rather than the leader of the most advanced forces in the labor movement. It is understood that a place on the council will still be his for the asking, and, after a proper period of sulking, he may decide to take it.

IN ADDITION TO ITS OTHER ADVERSE SCORES, the Eightieth Congress may claim the record of being the Congress which was kindest to the groups seeking to loot what is left of the American public domain. A House Public Lands Committee, headed by a chum of the big ranchers, Frank Barrett of Wyoming, has just recommended that the United States Forest Service lose, for three years, its right to reduce grazing permits in the National Forests. This will mean that, until 1950, rangers cannot prevent sheep and cattle from chewing off the bunch grass which anchors the topsoil. Floods, drought, erosion, and ugly hillsides will be the inevitable results of such a policy. The public will lose; the sole beneficiaries will be the handful of ranchers who graze their herds on land belonging to the government. This is of a piece with Mr. Barrett's bill to abolish the Jackson Hole National Monument. The monument protects for all the people a great scenic area which has belonged to them since the days of Lewis and Clark. Abolition of the National Monument would revoke their rights, for the land then would be available to Mr. Barrett's ranching friends. Sheep and cattle would graze on mountain pastures now reserved for campgrounds and for such big game as deer and elk. It is adding insult to injury to graze the beef now selling at epic prices on land belonging to the men and women who are victimized every time they visit the butcher shop.

A New Loan to China?

SECRETARY MARSHALL is expected to make his long-delayed announcement of a new policy toward China within a few days, possibly before these lines are read. Details of the policy, like the report of General Wedemeyer on which it is to be based, have been a closely guarded secret. But Washington rumors and well-authenticated reports from high Chinese officials in Nanking indicate that Wedemeyer has recommended a billion-dollar loan to bolster up Chiang Kai-shek's sagging forces, with a proviso that the civilian and military uses of the loan be strictly supervised by Americans. Part of these funds are to be used, it is said, for expansion of the American military mission in order to train and equip ten Kuomintang divisions to be used in "sealing off" the Communists in North China. While there is no certainty that Secretary Marshall will accept General Wedemeyer's recommendations, it is difficult to see why such a strong supporter of Chiang Kai-shek should have been chosen for the "fact-finding" mission except to find justification for aiding the Kuomintang.

The long delay in acting on General Wedemeyer's report suggests, however, that the State Department, and possibly General Wedemeyer himself, are far from happy about the probable results of stepped-up American assistance to the Kuomintang regime. They are aware that no constructive results have been achieved by the more than three billion dollars' worth of equipment and other goods that has been poured into China since the closing days of the war. They have seen international relief supplies diverted to political ends and sold in the open market for the enrichment of Kuomintang officials despite the best efforts of the UNRRA authorities. They know that slackness, incompetence, and corruption in Kuomintang ranks have increased rather than diminished as the economic and military situation has grown worse. And they have seen Chiang's glowing promises of increased civil liberties and democratic rights wither before a succession of political arrests and drastic new censorship regulations. Nor has this fresh wave of terrorism been directed primarily against the Communists. The Democratic League, the most important of China's middle parties, has been suppressed in some areas, and most of the hundreds recently arrested in Peiping for alleged opposition to the government were members of the liberal wing of the Kuomintang.

In view of these facts, it is idle to pretend that American assistance will be given out of pity for the Chinese people or to aid in reconstruction. If the loan is given, it will be a political loan of the crudest sort. As Wedemeyer himself phrased it recently, it will be designed to keep China from moving into the orbit of Soviet Russia. No one knows this better than the Chinese themselves. Numerous prominent Chinese individuals and groups have issued statements urging the United States not to send further military or financial help to the Nanking government. Just this past week, Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang, China's "Christian General," who has held high government posts and is second in military rank only to the Generalissimo, declared in New York that further American aid could only intensify the civil war and delay reconstruction. He characterized the Chiang Kai-shek regime as "a bottomless pit" which cannot possibly be filled, and expressed the hope that Americans would see this and make their views known before it is too late. He stated that the Nanking government had deliberately spread the story in zones devastated by recent fighting that the anti-Communist expeditions had been ordered by the United States. This had fostered anti-American feeling among the innocent victims of the civil strife.

Granted that the United States is determined to use its financial resources in a gigantic campaign to check the advance of communism, we can think of no place where it is likely to get less for its money than in China. Many more billions of dollars than Americans are willing to spend would be required to insure Chiang's position against attack. A billion or even two billions would, like the billions already spent, fail to fill the hole. Meanwhile, the popularity of communism in China is bound to be strengthened rather than weakened by the perpetuation of the corrupt dictatorial regime that holds power. Nor are superficial reforms imposed by American advisers likely to win the affection or confidence of the intensely nationalistic Chinese. Hard-hearted though the advice may seem, the most effective aid that can be given to China at the moment is no aid at all and the maintenance of a policy of strict neutrality in its revolutionary war.

Line-up on Palestine

WITH Britain firmly insisting on its new role as "neutral" in the Palestine debate, the play passes definitely to the United States and Russia. The speech by Colonial Secretary Creech-Jones has been attacked as obstructive and hostile to the solution his government invited when it handed the Palestine issue to the United Nations. And so it was. But it was wholly consistent with the position he took at the start of the present session, and so merits no new abuse. It leaves England on the sidelines, hands in pockets, while the Big Two uneasily carry the ball. And it has one positive virtue: it may force the other powers to act promptly, before the British walk off the field altogether, for by this time no one doubts that Mr. Creech-Jones meant business when he announced that his government would shortly pull its troops and civil servants out of Palestine.

What comes next? Will Russia and the United States actively support the policy announced in their respective statements? The issue hangs on this question. As Sumner Welles says on a later page, "Whether we shall now see a Palestine settlement of the nature recommended to the Assembly by the majority of the Special Committee on Palestine depends primarily on whether the Soviet Union and the United States will permit the settlement to be carried out." Already, doubts as to their final intentions are being heard in the corridors and committee rooms at Lake Success. Suspicion is chiefly directed toward the United States, which is said by many persons on the spot to be preparing for a defeat instead of working for a victory. Latin American delegates report an attitude of ostentatious indifference regarding their position on Palestine; seldom has the United States insisted so warmly on their complete freedom to vote as they please. China, too, has consistently backed the United States on major issues, but its statement on Palestine, while avoiding open repudiation of the majority report, was unexpectedly hostile.

The United States delegation is also urging the prompt appointment of a subcommittee to make a detailed plan for submission to the Assembly. The composition of this subcommittee, already decided upon by the Americans, would insure a half-hearted attitude on partition. It would also reverse the usual Assembly procedure, which is to appoint a subcommittee after amendments have been moved in order to reconcile differences and come back with a report representing the majority views rather than those of a hand-picked group acting in advance of the debate. By the time this issue appears, the facts may be known; but if a subcommittee is voted before the plan has been discussed, we shall have reason to suspect the purposes of the delegates who execute this maneuver. If it does not happen, the prospect of honest American support will look better.

As for Russia, its views were put plainly and well. What make us wonder, in spite of this, how strong its interest may be in seeing them carried out is Yugoslavia's support of the minority plan, recommending a bi-national federal state in Palestine. It is true that the Yugoslav member of the United Nations committee favored this solution from the start. But experience suggests that the Yugoslavs would probably accede to any serious wish on the part of the U. S. S. R. on this point—as the Latin Americans would in the case of similar pressure by the United States. Perhaps Russia merely does not care how its protégés vote on Palestine; but if this is so, it leaves the outcome more than ever uncertain.

The picture is further blurred by French silence. France has plenty of reasons for tiptoeing as lightly as possible over the thin ice of Moslem susceptibilities; but its influence as a member of the Big Five is inevitably diminished by such extreme caution.

At this moment of suspense, what seems likely to be laid before the Assembly is a modified partition plan, scaling down the area allotted to the Jews and restricting their control over immigration at least temporarily—this to satisfy the British as well as the Arabs—coupled with a renewed plea to the Arabs to exercise moderation and restraint and to the British to stay on the job during the interim period—assisted, probably, by some sort of U. N. token police force. This is a guess. It may be proved wrong before these words are in print. But it jibes with a good many facts and also, alas, with our knowledge of the mixed state of mind in official Washington. Such a plan, of course, would be no plan at all. It would mean fighting in Palestine and bitterness in the U. N. But it might easily look to the engineers of the Truman Doctrine like a handy way out of a dilemma—a way to give a little to the Jews and a little more to the Arabs and keep British soldiers on guard a little longer in an area we have so recently discovered to be a segment of the American frontier that we are scarcely prepared to defend it ourselves.

POLITICS and PEOPLE

BY ROBERT BENDINER

Taft, Rumor, and Eisenhower

IT IS something of a tribute to the liberalism of the American voter, if not to his skepticism, that Senator Taft should try at this late date to take on a pinkish coloration. Perhaps his public-relations staff has had nothing to do with the spate of stories linking him with individuals whom he would formerly have damned with enthusiasm, but it has been discreet enough to keep quiet and promote the illusion. First there was the rumor that Harold Ickes was about to come out in support of Taft's candidacy, though the two men seemed to have no more in common politically than a dim view of David Lilienthal, his life and works. The story, I should add, was not scotched by Mr. Ickes in anything like the choleric prose he draws upon when properly aroused. Indeed, the column in which he protested that he had not yet made up his mind in the matter included a passing tribute to "Mr. Taft's ability, his comprehensive knowledge of public affairs, his qualities as a floor leader, and above all else his fearlessness."

Now, from Drew Pearson, comes the far more outlandish suggestion that Taft's "possible running mate" if he wins the nomination would be none other than Walter Reuther. This fantasy seems a bit too elfin to have been conjured up in the Taft office. It is easier to take Reuther's view that it was launched by his factional foes in the Auto Workers' Union, for whom, judging from some of their messages to the union membership that I have seen, no yarn is too far-fetched. Reuther, understandably moved, disposed of the story by announcing that he "would see him [Taft] in hell before [he] would see him in the White House." But the episode is perhaps more complicated than he imagines. As this column goes to press, the notion of a Taft-Reuther ticket can be traced as far as a Chicago publicity firm, P. H. Morris and Associates, which will say only that "a group of responsible civic-minded citizens . . . all Chicago business and professional men" has made the proposal and retained the firm to promote the idea.

However this minor mystery is resolved, there can be no doubt that Taft himself is trying hard to shake off a reputation for diehard torism. Spurred on perhaps by an extremely sour press, he has reversed himself completely on the statesman-like proposal to kill all social legislation until the Republicans capture the White House. He has now evolved a billion-dollar welfare program for 1948 composed of highly diluted measures for old-age insurance, increased unemployment benefits, medical care, housing, and education—all extremely limited in scope and defended on the theory that if a "subsidy extends only to those of the lowest-income groups, it is not socialism."

More pointedly, at Des Moines last week he fairly fawned on Harold Stassen, the party's prudently daring semi-maverick. "Governor Stassen and I have differed on many issues," Taft told their common audience, "but we have not disagreed on fundamental principles." Stassen was careful to point out that his views were "more on the liberal side" than Taft's, but added that he had "a deep respect" for the Ohioan's "integrity, his sincerity, and his ability." So thick was the air with cordiality, in violent contrast to the open hostility between Stassen and Dewey, that it was freely assumed the two speakers had come to an understanding. In fact, the Iowa Republican State Chairman was so carried away by the prevailing spirit of good-will that he publicly announced: "There's the Republican ticket for 1948—Taft for President and Stassen for Vice-President."

Stassen has unequivocally repudiated this arrangement, which is precisely what he was expected to do at this stage of the campaign. But the mere suggestion of a Taft-Stassen alliance should be of distinct help to the Senator. If the deepening shadow that General Eisenhower is casting over all the Republican hopefuls is to be dispelled, the job will take more than the lone efforts of a Taft, a Dewey, or a Vandenberg. A dash of liberalism and a spot of imagination will be required, and the candidate who can count on Stassen as his running-mate will enjoy a distinct advantage over the field.

IT BECOMES plainer every day that the head-off Eisenhower movement is becoming a major political pastime, and the game is being played enthusiastically on all sides. Governor Dewey's staff is reported to be spreading the implausible but none the less effective theory that Ike in the White House is the secret hope of the leaders of Soviet Russia. The Patterson-McCormick papers are really getting warmed up, with John O'Donnell damning the General as "a Franklin D. Roosevelt in uniform"—obviously the harshest thing O'Donnell can say about anyone—and the Chicago Tribune calling him "the new Willkie in the Republican woodpile . . . everybody's man but America's."

The Democrats, too, are taking the Eisenhower threat very seriously, and their publicity apparatus is hard at work on the problem. James Roosevelt and Judge Samuel Rosenman, both reported by Eisenhower men to have been inclining toward the General's candidacy, were asked by Democratic headquarters to declare themselves publicly. Both came out for Truman. And from Democratic staff members comes the story that Eisenhower's publicity men are worried about repeated and embarrassing questions as to why Ike does not resort to Sherman's classic formula for heading off a nomination.

Their lame answer, as the Democrats gleefully tell it, is that Sherman took his unequivocal and unexplained stand only because he could not make public the real reason, namely, that his wife and children were Catholics and he feared that his candidacy might stir up prejudice. This strained rationalizing can hardly go on for any length of time, but it will have to do until Eisenhower is relieved of military duty and free to forget about General Sherman. Unfortunately President Truman has so far been unable to find a replacement for his Chief of Staff, a fact that Eisenhower's aides are, perhaps a bit nervously, calling to the attention of the country.

What may do Eisenhower more damage among Republicans than any rumor yet floated is Roscoe Drummond's detailed broadcast of a visit to the General by Henry Wallace, Michael Straight, and Bruce Bliven. The New Republic trio were said to have urged him to forget the G. O. P. convention and, with their support, to contest the Democratic nomination instead. An Eisenhower spokesman branded the Christian Science Monitor reporter's story as "absolutely wrong," and the New Republic editors flatly deny that they even called on the General. If this is as complete a fabrication as it appears, it is probably the most devious attempt yet made to deflate the Eisenhower boom.

Mr. Truman's Police State

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 19

FOR sheer political idiocy it would be hard to match Mr. Truman's airy dismissal of rationing and of rent and price controls as the methods of a police state. This remark was no chance slip of the tongue, though that would have been revealing enough of Mr. Truman's thinking processes. Nor was it an off-hand answer to a tricky question. At a time when most of the press is either advocating, or reconciled to, resumption of controls Colonel McCormick himself would hardly have asked the President whether they would make America a police state. It was Mr. Truman who launched the horrid phrase at a startled press conference after James L. Wright of the Buffalo Evening News, an able and veteran Washington correspondent, asked the President to help him "reason out this food-conservation program." Mr. Truman said it was an attempt to do voluntarily in a free-enterprise country what other nations have to do with police-state methods.

Behind the President his one-man brain trust, Clark Clifford, winced. Several reporters, to make sure they had heard right, proceeded to ask in different ways whether he really meant this to apply to (1) rationing and price control, (2) OPA during the war, and (3) rent control. The President insisted that police state was what he meant. He said that anything which had to be enforced on the people smacked of police-state methods. By this naive and sweeping definition all laws and government regulations smack of the police state; it would seem that any state which must employ police is, by Mr. Truman's lexicon, a police state. In fact, the President emerges, though of course unconsciously—and this is above all an unconscious Administration—as a pure-bred anarchist. Down with the police!

This would be good clean fun if Mr. Truman did not thereby throw away the best single domestic issue of the coming Presidential campaign, trip up the plans being made by some of his closest advisers for the reimposition of controls, play into the hands of Senator Taft, and destroy the expectations of those who still hoped the President was basically a liberal though a prisoner of the right. Let me take up these developments one by one. The rise in prices in the wake of OPA's demise can be blamed chiefly on the Republicans, though the responsibility rests on the right-wing Democrats as well. At one point in his press conference the President, while terming price control a police-state device, seemed to be attacking those who had battled to get rid of it. He asked reporters if they did not remember all the talk about prices being held down voluntarily when OPA controls were removed. He said they would find all that very interesting if they went back and read about it. These remarks added to the confusion, since they sounded as if the President regretted abandonment of police-state methods. They were all the more confusing because Mr. Truman has consistently championed voluntary methods of price and profit control. Like Humpty Dumpty, it is impossible to put the President together again.

Some ten days earlier the President's Council of Economic Advisers in its quarterly report had indicated the necessity for the reimposition of controls and had received the impression that Mr. Truman agreed. It was thought that the voluntary food-savings campaign was merely a shrewd build-up for controls. The Democratic National Committee has been attacking the Republicans for the inflationary spiral and trying to rebut Senator Taft's factually irrefutable statement that Mr. Truman shares responsibility with the Republicans for the runaway rise in prices and the collapse of the housing program. The two did in truth run a race in the early fall of 1946 to see which could get rid of controls sooner; it was Mr. Truman who scrapped meat rationing and jettisoned the Wyatt housing program. For all this might have been glossed over if Mr. Truman had now taken the offensive, said "I told you so," and begun a campaign for renewed controls, now growing popular again. Nor was such strategy dictated only by political expediency. The whole so-called Marshall Plan and the hopes of world reconstruction rest on the maintenance of the American economy on an even keel. For this purpose some controls are essential, and Mr. Truman's ill-conceived phrase will increase his own difficulties in imposing them. At his first move to slow down the inflationary spiral he will be accused of importing the principles of the "police state."

I don't think this will have much effect on the next election. Mr. Truman is still Roosevelt's heir, and the latest Gallup polls show a steady trend back toward the Democrats as prices rise; the masses of farmers and workers still feel that the Democrats are New Dealers at heart. This feeling, barring some sharp change of policy or, perhaps, the nomination by the Republicans of Eisenhower, may reelect Truman. But it will not insure effective leadership in meeting the severe problems ahead. A man who calls price control a police-state method, who dotes on Mr. Hoover and has loaded down his official family with bankers, brass hats, and nonentities, cannot be expected to handle the next depression with the kind of economic planning which will be required.

The easy way for this man and the men around him is drift—drift toward a bust, and drift toward war. Washington under Truman is a capital of confusion, incompetence, and reaction. Those who live here can be under no illusions as they see the government departments purged of the mildest liberals by the growing red scare abetted by the Truman Administration. The police state is not a state which uses policemen but a state where men's lives and reputations are at the mercy of arbitrary action without fair trial. If Mr. Truman wants to understand the police state, let him look about him in the District of Columbia, where one can see its beginnings applied to the employees of his own government. They know the terror of the anonymous accusation, and some have already heard the secret police knock on their door in the dark hours before dawn.

The Littler Assembly

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, October 20

IT IS a mistake to reduce this Assembly to its most obvious definition: a struggle between the great powers of the East and the West. For even within this definition there are subordinate meanings that change the over-all picture. In the usually accepted polarization you have simply a power struggle or, ideologically, the clash of two political and economic systems, one rooted in a revolutionary faith in a workers' state, the other holding hard to the principles of free enterprise and personal liberty. But many modern societies standing between these two have built into their economic systems large measures of social control which still admit of free political expression for the individual. England and France may be generally on the side of the United States in any showdown with Russia, but they distrust American capitalism about as strongly as Soviet communism.

Alongside this complex East-West conflict there is another—the drive of the colonial peoples for full independence against the reluctance of the old empires to yield what they have always considered their possessions. This struggle is evident in the tense debates in the Trusteeship Committee, with India leading the fight to force South Africa to obey the last Assembly's bidding and bring its mandate over South West Africa under the Trusteeship Council. It is to be seen in the Security Council when the Indonesian question is up for discussion. It is to be seen in the colonial powers' resistance to the nomination of the Philippines and Norway to the Trusteeship Council. That Russia sides with the colonial peoples is giving it added prestige, particularly in Asia.

These struggles are being carried on not in separate compartments but interpenetrating one another, so that the outcome is at no time certain on any particular issue. Nor will decisions at Lake Success or Flushing do more than put a check on the mighty human forces expressed in national hopes and aspirations, fears and frustrations. An attempt is being made in the United Nations to bring an angry and confused world under the control of reason and law. It can be done if the organization can hold together—but not in a week or a month or a year.

One other trend evident in earlier debates but most obvious in the discussions of the past week is the increasing dissent of the small powers from the decisions of the great. At times this dissent has merely been expressed in a grumbling protest. Delegates have told me that in the big-power conflict they don't want to stand up and be counted. But this week we have seen the influence of the small powers essentially changing the policy laid down by a great power.

From the beginning it was clear that the majority of the members shared an exasperation that the effectiveness of the United Nations was being frustrated by the Russian veto in the Security Council. No amount of Soviet pleading will persuade the nations outside the Russian group that the principle of unanimity is to be equated with a wholesale use of the veto. As Pearson of Canada put it last Saturday, "We are all vitally concerned that unanimity should prevail amongst the great powers, especially on measures necessary for the maintenance of peace. The fact is, however, that such unanimity does not exist. . . . We are in a situation where the unanimity rule has become, in effect, both the rule of dissent and a guaranty of inaction."

The American proposal for an Interim Committee has therefore been generally accepted in principle as a means by which the prestige of the Assembly can be increased in order to compensate to some degree for the impotence of the Security Council. But there has been wide criticism of its details. Sweden, France, the United Kingdom, Canada, and other nations have pointed out that the original terms of reference in the American resolution would bestow on the Little Assembly much greater authority than was desirable. The most serious amendments were proposed by Britain's Shawcross. These would remove from the surveillance of the Little Assembly all matters having to do with atomic-energy controls and disarmament and any question actually before the Security Council, and would prohibit it from conducting any study or investigation on the soil of a member state without the consent of that state.

Canada's resolution agrees in part with the United Kingdom's, but suggests that the scope of the Interim Committee should be broadened to permit it to do preparatory work on matters which had been placed on the next General Assembly's agenda—not merely matters having to do with peace and security. Other nations have brought forth similar amendments.

The American proposal, therefore, by the time it emerges from subcommittee study will be substantially whittled down. The Soviet delegate will have more difficulty in suggesting that the Interim Committee will in fact have more power than the Security Council or the General Assembly. The Little Assembly will, as one American remarked, be a littler assembly by the time the subcommittee is through with it.

This does not mean, of course, that it will be any more palatable to the Russians, who may boycott it as they boycotted the Greek commission. But if they study this new role of the middle and smaller powers they should be convinced that a mild revolt is brewing against Uncle Sam as quarterback. It is not a form of Soviet appeasement. It is, perhaps, a positive move away from power politics in the direction of those principles of cooperation expressed in the United Nations Charter.

Palestine and World Peace

BY SUMNER WELLES

[At the dinner of the Nation Associates held at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York on October 13, Sumner Welles, former Under Secretary of State, made the address which appears below. The subject of the evening's discussion was The Palestine Solution and Its Relationship to World Peace. The other chief speakers were Bartley Crum and Richard H. S. Crossman, M.P., American and British members, respectively, of the Anglo-American Committee on Palestine.]

TO ALL those millions of Americans who believe that their nation, because of the influence and power it possesses, should utilize that influence and that power so as to facilitate the solution of international controversies which block the establishment of a free, peaceful, and lasting world order, the past few years have been a profoundly discouraging period. For in the case of Palestine the great opportunity for leadership offered to our government had not been seized. Last Friday this situation radically changed. The United States has at length assumed its responsibility and undertaken a most constructive initiative.

I am not here to speak to you of any of the specific aspects of the Palestine problem, aspects which necessarily arise in an objective appraisal of the recommendations for settlement that have been advanced. Nor would I venture to dwell upon the continuing tragedy of those hundreds of thousands of homeless Jews whose spirits and bodies are rotting in the concentration camps of Central Europe and to whom no hope has as yet been given that they are to have any chance of safety or any opportunity for a new and better life in the days to come. There are many among you who have seen with their own eyes this horror and who have been struggling valiantly to put an end to a tragedy which need never have existed and for which there can be no justification.

But I do wish to speak to you on the issue which seems to me chiefly to concern us here tonight. That is the relationship of the Palestine settlement to world peace.

It would take long to enumerate the reports of the individuals and of the organizations, official as well as unofficial, which have now for many years been investigating the problem of Palestine. Many of these investigations, unfortunately, were undertaken for the sole purpose of procrastination. Many were ordered merely in an effort to avert a crisis which might otherwise be imminent. There is perhaps no other question of international import upon which so much authoritative information is available, and upon which the time and thought of so many able men and women have been expended. What so far has been lacking is the courage and the decision and the authority by which action might be taken on the basis of those facts.

I had hoped last spring that the period of evasion and buck-passing was at length concluded; that the repeated efforts of the British government to prevent any solution and the unsavory attempts of the government of the United States to saddle Great Britain with full responsibility, while at the same time refusing to lift a finger to make a settlement possible, had at last reached their end. For a new and great development had taken place. The nations of the world, at a special meeting of the Assembly of the United Nations, had declared their intention of seeking a settlement of the Palestine question and had appointed a Special Committee on Palestine to undertake a final investigation and to recommend to the full Assembly at its session this autumn whatever solution might in their judgment be most equitable and practicable in the light of all the legitimate interests concerned.

The overshadowing significance of that step could not be exaggerated. It meant that the free peoples of the earth had decided that a just and lasting settlement must be promptly found, and that the moral opinion of the world would support whatever decision the Assembly might finally reach upon such a basis.

AS WE all know, a few weeks ago the Special Committee submitted its findings. The recommendation of the majority of the committee—and it is pertinent to emphasize the fact that the nations represented in that majority could not conceivably be considered as having any partiality or any prejudice—proposed the partition of Palestine and the establishment within the Holy Land of a Jewish and an Arab state.

Many questions can legitimately be raised as to this, that, or the other detail contained in these proposals. But no unbiased man or woman can fail to recognize that, granted the lateness of the hour, granted the urgency of the need, granted the developments that have taken place since the report of the Peel commission was rendered ten years ago, and granted the crisis with which humanity today is convulsed, these proposals are the best that could at present be carried out and are inherently wise and just.

The majority report has, of course, been assailed by the Jewish extremists. It has, of course, been made the target of the Arab nationalists, who assert they will reject any settlement through which the Jewish people would at last attain the National Home long since promised to them. But I think there can be no question that a vast majority of the outstanding leaders of the Jewish people support the form of settlement now under consideration by the United Nations, however far short it may fall of the ideal for which they had hoped, and that a vast majority of the Arab peoples would accept, even though reluctantly, a settlement which puts an end to a controversy whose continuation can be of no benefit to them, were they to learn that the United Nations was determined to impose such a settlement.

If we view the world as it is today realistically, we cannot fail to see that force—economic force as well as armed force—still continues to be the dominating factor. Every delegate to the United Nations knows that unless the three great powers—Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States—jointly support whatever decision the Assembly may reach, and jointly undertake to facilitate the carrying out of the Palestine settlement, no settlement is going to be carried out. However strongly the other member states may feel that the settlement proposed is altogether just, however sincerely they may believe that such a settlement is imperative if a major conflagration is to be averted, they possess by themselves neither the armed might nor the economic resources required to bring about its consummation.

The United States has now spoken. It recognizes the urgent need for a final solution at this session of the Assembly. It supports the majority plan which provides for partition and immigration. While I question the wisdom of some of the modifications it advances, I regard other suggestions offered as altogether desirable.

From the standpoint of the realistic approach to the crux of the problem there is no more encouraging feature of our government's long-awaited statement of policy than the declaration that "the United States is willing to participate in a United Nations program to assist the parties involved in the establishment of a workable political settlement in Palestine" . . . and "in meeting economic and financial problems and the problem of internal law and order during the transition period." For here are more than words or expressions of sympathy. Here is the promise of material help and cooperation.

The position of Great Britain was made known by the statement of Mr. Creech-Jones to the Assembly. We can at least hope that the position then announced may yet be modified. It would be inconceivable, if the Assembly now approves a final settlement based upon the provisions of the majority report, that the British government would evacuate its administrative and law-enforcement agencies from Palestine before the Assembly's plan could be implemented, and thereby open the Holy Land to probable bloodshed and anarchy at the very moment that the United Nations was preparing to assume responsibility. The present difficulties of the British people must not be overlooked. But the United States was fully justified in urging that the mandatory power should not withdraw until a smooth transmission of authority can be assured.

There remains the problem of the attitude of the Soviet Union. Once before, at the Assembly's special session last spring, the Soviet government categorically stated it would support partition as an alternative form of settlement. The Soviet Union has now reaffirmed this position. We have reason for deep gratification that in this outstanding instance the Soviet government has shown a clear intention of helping to make the United Nations function and of working for world peace rather than for world disruption.

LET us strip away all unnecessary verbiage and assess the basic issues upon whose solution a Palestine settlement now depends. They are few in number.

The relations between the Soviet Union and the United States are every day becoming more critical. If the Palestine settlement is thrown into the whirlpool of power politics that now threatens to engulf the entire family of nations, no solution will be attained. If Moscow and Washington permit the question of Palestine to be used as an instrument in this looming conflict between expansion and containment, whatever final decision the Assembly may now reach will be void. Yet there is no reason that can be found to justify so needless a frustration. The establishment in Palestine of the Jewish and Arab states now proposed could never in itself be regarded as a threat to the safety of the Soviet system or of the Western powers. Only if these two new states came under the exclusive domination of either the East or the West could any fear be legitimately aroused on the part of one of the major powers. Great Britain has announced its wish to begin immediately the withdrawal of its occupation forces from Palestine, save in the remote contingency that the Assembly's decisions need not be imposed. Moscow can, consequently, no longer charge that Britain intends to use Palestine as a strategic base against Russia.

But since in all human probability the Assembly's recommendations for a Palestine settlement must be imposed and since an adequate police force must, therefore, be found, is it not unquestionable that if either the United States or the Soviet Union attempts to bring about the employment of its own troops for such a purpose, the Palestine question will inevitably become a cause for further suspicion, for further controversy, and for increased hostility between these two powers?

If the police force is American, the Soviet Union will construe such a decision as an aggressive step on our part. If the police force is Russian, such a measure will at once be interpreted throughout the West as a new indication of the Soviet government's intention to seize the Dardanelles and to dominate the Mediterranean.

And we know only too well from what has taken place in Korea what a joint Soviet-American administration of foreign territory implies.

It is for these reasons, which seem to me so altogether clear, that I publicly suggested some days ago that the major powers announce that no one of them would send military contingents to Palestine for policing duties, and that they agree that the Security Council should establish, after calling upon intermediate and lesser powers that had no conceivable interest in the Palestine settlement for their cooperation, a Palestine police force composed of military contingents from those powers, under the authority of the Council's Military Staff Committee. It has been said that such a suggestion is not realistic, that too many practical difficulties stand in the way, and that the problems of over-all authority and of expense constitute insuperable obstacles. The truth is, of course, that such a solution of the problem of security is wholly practicable provided the major powers wish to make it so.

If the Soviet Union and the United States are willing to cooperate in this regard, the Military Staff Committee of the Security Council is competent to adjust the question of over-all authority, and if the member states of the United Nations recognize in practice the obligation they have already unanimously incurred, the expenses of the administration of Palestine during the transition period and of an adequate police force are obviously expenses which should be shared proportionally by all the United Nations.

Frankly, such a solution of the need for maintaining law and order during the transition period seems to me far more effective and expedient than the suggestion of the United States that the United Nations establish a special constabulary or police force recruited on a volunteer basis. A volunteer force would necessarily take a long time to recruit and assemble and a long time to train. What criterion, moreover, should prevail as to the national origin of the recruits? What percentage of recruits should any given country be allowed to send? What authority would be responsible for screening the recruits? Would there not be constant suspicion that agents of the major powers were being incorporated into such a volunteer force?

If the lesser powers, as I have suggested, sent some of their own military contingents to undertake the required policing work in Palestine during the transition period, these governments would be each responsible for the membership of the forces so employed, and none of the controversial questions I have mentioned could arise.

WHETHER we shall now see a Palestine settlement of the nature recommended to the Assembly by the majority of the Special Committee on Palestine depends primarily on whether the Soviet Union and the United States will permit the settlement to be carried out.

We are told that the troops of the Arab states are now encircling Palestine. Propaganda is being directed toward the delegates to the United Nations Assembly, and toward public opinion in the West, to make it appear that hostilities will be inevitable if the Assembly adopts the proposals of its Special Committee. If the Assembly permits such blackmail tactics—such an open violation of the solemn commitments into which every Arab country has entered—to remain unpunished, and to sway its final decisions, the authority of the United Nations will be irreparably impaired. But can anyone in this room believe that the threats of violence now being made could ever be carried out unless the Arab governments received the secret support of one of the great powers? Can anyone doubt that if Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States unanimously declared that the decision of the Assembly was also their decision and that they would unitedly support the execution of the steps required to impose it, the attempted blackmail which we are witnessing would not rapidly be shown up for what it is?

Unless the means of securing effective collaboration among the three major nations can now be found, not only will the final settlement of the Palestine problem continue to be remote, but the immediate consequences may be of appalling gravity. Is it already too late for us to have ground for the belief that some field for cooperation between the Soviet Union and the United States can yet be found? Must we assume that the one world for which we had hoped and for which we have striven is already irreparably divided into two worlds, with all of the consequences that such a division inevitably portends? Need we disregard the lesson which the history of recent centuries should teach us—that if two antagonistic and rival nations find some field for cooperation, this experiment in cooperation can bring about an alleviation of tension and encourage the gradual solution of controversies which had earlier seemed altogether insoluble?

I, for one, cannot reconcile myself to the belief that it is already too late. I believe that the Palestine settlement affords both the Soviet Union and the United States precisely such a field, within which cooperation between them is altogether feasible, and that if they will but employ it they will find the path toward the solution of the differences between them much easier to follow.

There has been no greater tragedy in recorded history than that which the Jewish people have suffered during these past few years. Yet it is possible that through the settlement of the Palestine problem—the one fitting compensation which humanity can offer the survivors of that tragedy—the peoples of the world may find the way to avert a new holocaust, toward which we seem to be so rapidly drifting and in which all that remains of our civilization would inevitably be destroyed.

Mr. Attlee Changes Horses

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, October 17

NEW men, new policy? That question has been on many lips since it became known last month that the Prime Minister proposed to meet the new parliamentary session with a reconstructed administration. From the Cabinet appointments announced this week no clear evidence is to be deduced pointing to any radically different program. Mr. Attlee has changed horses in mid-stream, but the main observable effect is merely that the "pulls" within the team have altered slightly; the government coach seems likely to continue in much the same direction.

The inner history of this Cabinet reconstruction has provided observers of the political scene with not a little amusement. There is some evidence that the Prime Minister, keeping his deliberations very much to himself, had completed to his own satisfaction a full list of Cabinet changes a fortnight ago, and that this list was much more extensive than the one eventually published. In particular, it seems to have been intended to replace A. V. Alexander by John Strachey at the Ministry of Defense, and to intrust the portfolios of Transport and Labor to younger and stronger hands than those of Mr. Barnes and Mr. Isaacs. However, for reasons unknown to this correspondent, Mr. Attlee decided to announce the appointment of Sir Stafford Cripps as Minister for Economic Affairs in advance of the general Cabinet reshuffle. This put the ministerial fat in the fire. It was at once apparent to the Foreign Secretary that Sir Stafford, elevated to the position of coordinator of the departments of Trade, Labor, Fuel, Supply, and Public Works, would be in a position to voice in the Cabinet, and to give added weight to, the contentions of the "Bread Before Guns" school. Mr. Bevin wanted to know whether the coming Cabinet changes would have the effect of further diminishing the influence of his own group in the Cabinet. His curiosity was infectious, and for ten days most of the ministers were absorbed in the task of trying to "get at" the Prime Minister.

The result has been a rather peculiar compromise. Up to a point Mr. Bevin has had his way: the retention of their portfolios by Messrs. Alexander, Barnes, and Isaacs means that the Loyal Regiment of "Bevin's Own" has not suffered the casualties which he feared. With Mr. Dalton and Mr. Morrison somewhat eclipsed (Mr. Attlee suspected them last June of an intrigue to make Ernest Bevin Prime Minister), there is a nice balance of power within the Cabinet between Crippsites and Bevinites, leaving the Prime Minister in a strong position as chairman with the casting vote. For the rest, a good deal of dilapidated wood has been excised, and the new Cabinet, taken together with the list of junior appointments, promises a perhaps more competent administration.

It certainly contains no signs of a shift to the left. Emanuel Shinwell has been relegated to the routine obscurity of the War Office under the double thumb of Messrs. Bevin and Alexander, and his place at the Ministry of Fuel, which now loses a seat in the Cabinet, has been taken by Hugh Gaitskell, ex-lecturer in economics and ex-director of a company dealing in fine prints. Mr. Attlee—or even, it may be, Mrs. Attlee—had come to regard Mr. Shinwell as a political liability ever since his public speeches began to show an anti-middle-class bias. Whether this, or his known opposition to Mr. Clayton's demand that exports have a first priority on future coal output regardless of the requirements of domestic industry, was responsible for Mr. Shinwell's downgrading is a matter of speculation. Certainly the middle class should be reassured by the changes in Mr. Attlee's team. There is no ground for saying that they represent a definite swing to the right—leftism in England is not a working-class monopoly—but few of the men promoted or brought in have soiled their hands with manual labor; most of them are public-school boys turned public servants. If they remembered Ruskin's famous crack about Whistler, Mr. Attlee's rank-and-file trade-union supporters might have accused him of flinging a pot of Eton-blue paint in the face of organized labor.

AS FOR policy, the King's speech seems likely to be interesting mainly for its omissions: the expectation is pretty general that there will be no bill this session to nationalize either gas or steel; and the main dish for the autumn will probably be an unsweetened supplementary budget. Of the broad lines of policy for coping with the economic crisis we have already had a fairly full preview. In Mr. Bevin's sector there are no signs of dramatic developments. Some acceleration of the planned release of men from the forces? Perhaps, but certainly no radical break in the masterly continuity of foreign policy. Lightened, it is hoped, by placing the whole burden of the financial cost of Germany on the shoulders of the American taxpayer, British "commitments" abroad will be maintained—at any rate for the present. On the politico-economic chessboard it is for Cripps, not Bevin, to move; and though we have yet to learn how far Chancellor Dalton proposes to go in using the fiscal mechanism to aid the switch from consumption to exports, the main lines of the Cripps plan are known. The gap of $2,400,000,000 in Britain's foreign balance of payments is to be closed by import cuts amounting to $850,000,000 and an increase of $1,500,000,000 in British exports. Presto! The solution is found; all that remains is to complete the still very partial adjustment of supplies in the food shops to this winter's reduced import program and wait for British manufacturers and exporters to do their stuff.

That at least was the impression the public derived from the confidence with which Sir Stafford appeared to approach his task. But at his first press conference this week the Minister for Economic Affairs seemed to have begun to share the increasingly grave doubts of observers here about the practicability of his plan unless one of two conditions is fulfilled: either the famous "commitments" must be jettisoned wholesale, or Uncle Sam must, directly or indirectly, foot the bill.

The Cripps plan, in fact, is vulnerable to criticism on a number of grounds. With Britain's customers here, there, and everywhere imposing import restrictions enforced by their own difficulties, the export targets are manifestly optimistic. At any rate, their attainment by the end of 1948 cannot be relied on. Indeed, apart from the question whether markets can be found, the postulated increase of output of exportable goods presupposes a redistribution of labor and a detailed control of raw-material allocation far beyond the somewhat hesitant steps so far taken. Furthermore, no one has yet explained how the proposed expansion in the exports of British finished goods is to be achieved if we make good our undertakings in the Report of the Paris European Conference to supply the Western bloc with such a high proportion of the coal, steel, machinery, and other capital goods which British industry itself requires. And, even if the essential re-equipment of British mines and factories can be postponed for, say, a couple of years, what will happen to the painfully achieved balance between imports and exports when the output of capital goods is switched back, as it finally must be, to home consumption.

Sir Stafford has now admitted what was only too obvious from the outset—that the "balance" at which he is aiming is in one sense unreal. Even if British production and exports can both be increased as planned, we shall continue to have an immense deficit with the dollar area, against which we shall only nominally be able to set credits with Western Europe. Unless those trading credits can be converted into free dollars—which would mean that Mr. Marshall would have to supply the whole Western bloc with good American money to pay for British goods—Britain will not be able to buy what it needs in the way of food and raw materials from the dollar area. As a result Sir Stafford now concedes the grave danger of a "descent into a spiral of depression." The implication is clear that the Cabinet is coming round to the view that only Mr. Marshall and the American Congress can save the situation.

THE question is: Can the dollars be had on terms which the British public and above all organized labor would find tolerable? At the moment a campaign against "dollars with strings on them" is being waged in the press only by the Communist Daily Worker and by Lord Beaverbrook's (four-million net sale) Daily Express, which is becoming the mouth-piece for sentiment paralleling that of the Italian Qualunquists. Beneath the surface, however, there is a great and growing feeling among trade unionists and the middle-class left alike that the whole basis of the Marshall plan as now outlined makes nonsense from the standpoint of Europe and means Britain's acceptance of the status of a colonial dependency of the United States. The fundamental weakness of the Paris report, as seen here, is that it presupposes a European revival which can only be achieved by planning so totalitarian that it would be completely unacceptable to the nation which is expected to finance it. Mr. Clayton, in short, asked the Western bloc to produce an international plan without national planning—a contradiction in terms.

As for Britain's own contribution, honesty compels me to record that various leakages, revealing clear warnings from Mr. Clayton and other distinguished visitors that the price for dollar aid must be longer working hours and reduced real wages, have produced a strong current of resistance in the trade-union movement. Already the T. U. C. has compelled the Prime Minister to retract his suggestion that wages should be frozen, irrespective of the rising cost of living; and if, as expected, the autumn budget imposes new taxes on consumption and—as is rumored—on domestically consumed electricity, working-class suspicions of the whole "crisis policy" will be deepened.

There will be an increasingly strong tendency in the Labor movement to ask: Cannot we throw overboard more of our costly foreign commitments and reinforce our industrial man-power with at least 500,000 of the men now in uniform? And cannot we get along without dollar aid by concentrating on expanding our trade with the dominions and colonies and developing planned bilateral exchanges of goods with the U. S. S. R. and the Eastern European bloc?

This is not to say that Britain shows any sign of a complete polarization of opinion, as in Italy and France, between capitalist pro-American and Communist pro-Soviet groups. Not perhaps fully appreciating how grim the economic outlook is, and how precarious the situation of this densely populated island, the British public—or at any rate that large slab of it which can be called, broadly, social democratic—still wants Britain and the British government to pursue a quiet middle-of-the-road course. The trouble is that in the middle of the road there are as many shellholes as on the East versus West sidewalks from which Mr. Lippmann's "cold war" is being waged.

Panama on the Seven Seas

BY MICHAEL BARKER

THE New York water front today is the scene of amazing happenings that recall the stories of the shanghaiing of sailors on the Frisco and London water fronts in the 1860's. Seamen are being plied with drink and lured on to foreign vessels by South Street shipping crimps; aliens are forced to pay for the privilege of working; men on a ship reaching its home port are transferred against their will to another ship of the same company, where they must accept less pay and worse conditions.

All this derives from the discovery by American ship-owners that they can save money by flying the flag of another nation. They can operate their vessels "dirt cheap," they have found, simply by transferring them to Panamanian or Honduran registry. They do this either directly, while retaining ownership, or by forming a dummy Panamanian or Honduran corporation which they control. The procedure has proved so attractive that already the merchant marine of the Republic of Panama (population 635,836) is the third biggest in the world, with 1,500 ships and 2,000,000 registered net tonnage, the major part being in reality owned by Americans, by aliens who are legal residents of this country, or by shipping companies in which Americans have invested most of the capital. Since ships under the Panamanian flag are troubled by no regulation regarding the payment of a fixed wage, are relieved of any necessity to pass the strict American marine inspection regarding upkeep of the vessels, seaworthiness, safety precautions, and fire-fighting appliances, and enjoy extremely low registration fees and immunity from corporation taxes, it is small wonder that many of our less scrupulous operators have seized such an excellent opportunity to make a profit.

In addition to the ships already in commission, of which 192 were transferred to Honduran and Panamanian registry between the end of the war and last June, the sale of 110 others has been approved by the Maritime Commission. Another 143 ships have been filed for sale and transfer with the Maritime Commission. The approximate net registered tonnage of these 253 additional ships, most of them built during the war, is 1,500,000 tons.

The majority of established, reputable American steamship companies frown on the transfer practice. With a few notable exceptions the dummy corporations have been formed by a host of small-time, "fly-by-night" operators who buy a few ships and hope to undercut their competitors through cheap and shoddy operating methods. While most of these Panamanian and Honduran corporations are controlled by Americans, some are operated by Greeks, British, Norwegians, or Portuguese. To avoid a brush with the maritime unions, several American shipowners have formed dummy Greek corporations as a blind, which have in turn formed Panamanian or Honduran corporations.

Wages paid on these ships may be as low as $50 a month for an ordinary seaman as compared with $155 on American ships (N. M. U. scale), $87.50 a month for an able-bodied seaman as compared with $180, $90 a month for an oiler as compared with $180 and $197.75 (Diesel), and $400 for a master as compared with $668. However, it is impossible to quote a minimum wage for these hybrid ships, since on two Greek-Honduran vessels a number of Greeks, many of them not seamen, paid as much as $50 apiece for the privilege of taking the vessels from Piraeus to New York, because they were so anxious to return to the United States.

MICHAEL BARKER has been seven years at sea, sailing on American, Panamanian, Honduran, British, and Finnish ships. He has recently been investigating water-front conditions for the National Maritime Union.

WITH this huge fleet to man at substandard wages and under substandard working conditions, the ship operators are hard pressed to obtain crews. Numerous "crimping joints," dignified by the title of shipping agencies, have been set up around South Street, New York, to hire alien and American seamen, stranded on the beach, for Panamanian ships. These agencies receive $12 for every unlicensed man they ship out and $20 for every officer. One character thus employed, known locally as "Shanghai Mike," unable to meet the demand, sends out runners to pick up drunks in the bars and on the park benches of the neighborhood. The runners give their victims more to drink and when they have made them sufficiently befuddled, lure them to a ship or train, where a company official takes over. A parting gift of a bottle of "hooch" keeps them satisfied and comatose until their ship is out at sea.

"Paddy," a stocky young Irish fireman, was told by a British union official in London that if he jumped his British ship in New York he would easily be able to find an American ship which would take him to South Africa to rejoin his wife and child. Paddy quickly learned, however, that he could not get American seaman's papers and found himself stranded in New York. Rather than sign with a Panamanian ship that might dump him in China, he became a runner for Shanghai Mike, enticing drunks on to short-handed ships due to sail. "I would buy them a bottle or a new pair of dungarees, 'spring' their laundry, do anything to get Mike his twelve bucks and expenses," said Paddy. He added, "Now if I can get him run off the water front, I'll be happy."

Because several European governments, including the British and Norwegian, officially oppose the policy of providing crews for foreign-flag vessels, international shipping crimps operate in a number of countries. Hundreds of men have been sent to New York and other ports to sail on American ships under the Panama flag. Before they leave their own country they are told that they are to sail on a ship under their own flag, but once on board they find she is Panamanian or Honduran. They are of course unprotected by their own maritime laws while on a foreign vessel and could not claim one penny's compensation for disablement.

On a number of Panamanian ships crews sign not legal articles but a slip of paper stating they are a member of the crew. This permits the master to leave any of his seamen stranded wherever he wishes. Thus a Panamanian vessel obtained her crew in England, sailed to Greece, and took on a supernumerary crew of Greeks willing to work for 40 cents an hour. From Greece she sailed to an American port, where the British crew was dumped. These men then had to choose between taking out another newly transferred American vessel or starving on the beach.

One American-owned Panamanian corporation makes it a practice to sign on a crew in Portugal at a stated wage and after the ship is at sea to reduce the monthly pay of many of the men on the ground that they are incapable of performing their duties. These men, being Europeans, cannot leave the ship, paid off, in her home port of Philadelphia but can be transferred to another ship at the company's will and against their own wishes.

Since Panamanian ships are often forced to employ officers who have obtained licenses from the Panamanian consul after an entirely inadequate course of study in engineering and navigation, with no properly supervised examinations, accidents are common and vessels deteriorate rapidly. One ship, while in the port of New York, was reported to be creating a fire hazard by the leakage of hot oil from the filter pipes to the deck plates; it caught fire ten days later. On a thirty-two-year old Panamanian vessel held together by rust, holes were chipped in the hatch-combing of a hold containing 10,000 drums of high-test gasoline. The chipping caused sparks, and as if that were not danger enough all hands smoked on deck, despite strong fumes from the ventilators of the hatches.

AMERICAN taxpayers paid $20,000,000,000 to build their war-time merchant fleet. Millions of dollars are lost annually to the government, and indirectly to the taxpayers, through the non-payment of American-port registry fees and the evasion of corporation taxes by American-owned vessels operating under a foreign flag. The cost of registering a ship in Panama City is only $1 per net registered ton, plus $75 in consular fees. The only further charge is an annual tax of 10 cents per net registered ton. If a corporation earns 95 per cent of its profits outside the Republic of Panama, it pays no corporation taxes there.

Both the United States government and the heads of the army and navy insist that the existence of a large merchant fleet is essential for our national defense. At the outbreak of war the shortage of trained officers and seamen caused serious immobilization and delays. Unskilled men, improperly trained, were hustled on to the ships. Unnecessary accidents, shipwrecks, and collisions in convoy resulted. In the first year of the war the fatal casualties on American ships sunk were 50 per cent of the personnel, as against 7 per cent on Norwegian ships.

Already the American merchant marine is down to 11,000,000 tons of commissioned shipping, below its 1941 strength. The transfer of our war-built ships to foreign registry, with their consequent deterioration under incompetent and indifferent management, will deplete it to the point where it will not only be unable to supply the skilled personnel needed in a time of crisis, but will be too small, even, to train recruits for the industry in sufficient numbers. On the other hand, if American-owned ships are returned to American registry, the seamen now sailing them can still be employed, and in addition thousands of newcomers will be enabled to adopt a fine and attractive career.

Del Vayo—"Democracy" East and West

THE meeting of the European Socialist parties—the fourth in the past two years—is scheduled for the last week of November in Belgium. None of the previous reunions could reach agreement on the question of reconstituting the Socialist International; the creation of the Communist Information Bureau in Belgrade and the storm it has aroused on the left are certain to enlarge the area of disagreement at the coming congress.

The obstacles in the way of uniting Socialists of different tendencies on a common platform are both tactical and doctrinal in nature. One that is likely to provoke impassioned debate at Antwerp is the division of views on the new concepts of democracy in Europe. Here in the United States the problem has never been seriously examined: first, because only a few Socialists in this country have been brought up in the classic Marxist tradition; second, because they do not constitute a party capable of influencing American politics; and, finally, because discussions in the New Leader and comparable publications have been heavily weighted with invective against any European Socialist who does not accept—unconditionally—the anti-Russian line.

It is to the credit of the French party that despite the growing anti-Communist tendency reflected at its Lyon congress in August and more recently in the campaign speeches of Léon Blum, those Socialists who argue the necessity of common action with the Communists have been allowed to express their views without being accused of disloyalty.

This tolerance of theoretical differences which, before the First World War, made possible the presence in the same party of a right-winger like Bernstein and a brilliant leftist like Rosa Luxemburg, is reflected in many of the official publications of the French party. La Revue Socialiste, for example, recently opened its pages to an absorbing discussion between Lotar Radaceanu, Socialist Minister of Labor in the Rumanian Cabinet and an ardent supporter of working-class unity, and Titel Petrescu, leader of the Socialist faction which opposes any form of cooperation with the Communists.

In Radaceanu's view one can no longer talk of "democracy" in abstract or general terms. Democracy, he insists, is one thing when practiced in London, another when practiced in Bucharest. "From the point of view of the working class . . .," he says, "to recommend, after the overthrow of the dictatorial power that enslaved our country with the help of a section of the population, that our people accept and allow to be transplanted to Rumanian soil a formal democracy such as has been developed in the advanced capitalist countries of the West—in England, Switzerland, Sweden—is to propose our elimination as a potential democracy of the future." Radaceanu does not limit himself to a defense of left strategy in Rumania but discusses in broad terms the whole concept of democracy, classical and modern.

In recent months I have devoted several columns to this continuing debate among European intellectuals on liberal democracy versus démocratie massive. The right Socialist and his sympathizers base their position chiefly on the rights of the individual: the left Socialist interprets democracy above all in terms of a regime that can defend itself effectively against fascist revival and make possible a transformation of the economic and social structure without which the word democracy is meaningless. To the genuine Marxist a political idea has no value, indeed no existence, except in and through the mass. Nationalization of the British steel industry is for him a more convincing demonstration of democracy than an abstraction like "freedom of the press," which in practice may permit a few vested interests to control the newspapers.

Though nationalization was successfully perverted to the uses of fascism, under any popular regime it represents a tremendous step toward democracy. In the Balkan and Central European states a nationalization policy would have had little chance except under the existing coalition regimes which wrested power from the pre-war feudal oligarchies. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive the nationalization of major industries in the West or the East without transfer of power to the workers. This may take place in different ways, depending on the situation which obtains in each country. In an interview with Harold Laski, Stalin himself conceded that the process might occur without revolution or dictatorship in England and the United States; on the other hand many Socialists agree that force is inevitable in politically backward countries ruled by an entrenched upper class.

However intense this controversy may be, however, it should not be allowed to degenerate into a fratricidal fight among the Socialists themselves or into one between Socialists and Communists. During the war both parties frankly admitted that the split in the working class had contributed to the rise of fascism and the outbreak of war. The first official statement of the German Communists after the war acknowledged their tragic error in having fought the Socialists while the real enemy climbed to power. One would think that the two groups might have learned once and for all the lesson taught them, without distinction, in the torture chambers of the Gestapo. Now it becomes apparent that the Communists and the right Socialists in most countries have learned nothing. Today Europe has but two alternatives: either governments patterned after the De Gasperi regime which in the long run will serve, like the Brüning government in Germany, as vehicles for the return of the fascists to power; or governments based on Socialists, Communists, and progressive elements—the popular front. The denunciation of moderate Socialists and liberals voiced in the manifesto of the new Communist Information Bureau and the angry rebuttal of the Socialists suggest that the advocates of working-class unity will have rough going at Antwerp. But they will be strengthened in their fight by the conviction that their program is the only one which can save Europe from an imminent swing to the right and the eventual rise of a new fascism more skilled in its techniques of repression and far more difficult to smash than the earlier model.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Art of Planning

IN CURRENT discussions of economic affairs few words are used more frequently, and more carelessly, than "planning." Employed by people to whom any kind of positive government intervention in the economy is anathema, the word is endowed with overtones of unmitigated evil; anything planned by government is ipso facto damned. At the opposite extreme are some liberals to whom the word has become a talisman, who think "planning" is the solution for almost any social or economic problem. Both these attitudes seem to me to be dangerous to clear thinking. For in itself the idea of government economic planning is neutral; whether it is good or evil depends on the ends it serves and the means by which it is applied.

All those interested in planning, whether they are opponents or advocates, will find a stimulating discussion of the fundamentals of the subject in a slim pamphlet recently published by the Harvard University Press ("Central Planning and Control in War and Peace," 50 cents). It contains the text of three lectures delivered last spring at the London School of Economics and Political Science by Sir Oliver Franks, who, though he approaches the subject in terms of British problems, has much to say that is pertinent to planning in any democratic society.

An unusual feature of these lectures is that their author, as he is careful to point out, is neither a professional economist nor a student of politics. He is a philosopher who at one time occupied the chair of moral philosophy at Glasgow University and is now provost of Queen's College, Oxford. During the war, however, he was drafted from academic life to serve in the Ministry of Supply, where he became one of the top officials. Recently he was again summoned by the government to head the British team of experts at the Paris conference on the Marshall plan. Thus he combines practical knowledge of planning with a certain detachment.

I have no idea what political party, if any, Sir Oliver Franks adheres to, but it would be my guess that temperamentally he is a moderate conservative. Certainly he approaches the subject of planning with no bias in its favor. On the contrary, his war-time experiences seem to have impressed him with the difficulties, and even the risks, of government direction of the economy in peace time. Nevertheless, he has reached the conclusion that government planning and control of industry and trade are as essential to Britain in peace as they were in war. Only so, he believes, will it be possible to deal with the paramount problem of foreign trade, to insure the export of goods in sufficient volume to pay for the huge total of imports that Britain needs to support even a reduced standard of living. To accomplish this task the government must be in a position to estimate national productivity and decide how to divide the expected product between home and foreign markets.

Convinced as he is that planning is inevitable, Sir Oliver Franks is very concerned about the dangers of over-planning. The government, he thinks, should endeavor to reach its objectives without the aid of those large and complicated mechanisms, some of which he describes in his first lecture, that war-time exigencies demanded. While the determination of over-all economic policy must be centralized, its successful implementation, he suggests, depends on the "diffusion of initiative." Attempts to control every detail of the program are all too likely to lead to a breakdown of the overworked administrative machine. Industry and commerce, therefore, must be treated as partners in a national enterprise rather than as instruments of government policy.

This leads to another point. The successful organization of economic planning must be based on a unity of purpose which is accepted and understood by all concerned—workers and business men as well as Cabinet ministers and civil servants. In war time that was much simpler: unity was generated by the "march of events." But in peace time national purposes are apt to be "multiple, vague, and fluctuating"; so that the unity demanded by planning must be created by a deliberate act of will on the part of the government. When the ministers have formulated what they believe should be the national purpose and have decided on a general plan for the economy which is calculated to achieve it, they must nail their colors "to the mast and not to the fence." And they must use leadership to secure the public's acceptance of the purpose and understanding of the plan.

Planning, therefore, calls for a high degree of courage and leadership at the top. It also calls for close coordination among the various departments, including some whose functions are not, strictly speaking, economic. As Sir Oliver says, central planning precludes a government from having a number of more or less unrelated policies. "Housing, social security, exports, education, and defense are all factors in the general plan; the extent to which resources can be devoted to each is determined when the general balance is struck. The idea, then, which is expressed in import and export programs must be an outline scheme of management for the total economy, offering certain results in the standard of living to the people."

Sir Oliver makes no attempt to examine the actual plans of the Labor government in the light of the principles he outlines. But it is no secret that Mr. Attlee and his colleagues owe some of their difficulties to the fact that they set out with too many insufficiently coordinated plans and no over-all plan geared to the basic necessity of expanded exports. Consequently, to quote just one example, the housing target has been missed because houses cannot be built without foreign timber. The appointment of Sir Stafford Cripps as chief economic planner and coordinator is a step which should help to remedy this mistake. Certainly no man has a better intellectual grasp of the problems involved. But as this discussion is intended to suggest, planning, although it uses many scientific techniques, is an art rather than a science. In addition to a cool brain it calls for those intuitive qualities that go with the mystery of leadership. Warm admirer of Cripps as I am, I am inclined to doubt whether those qualities are among his many gifts.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Byrnes Tells Almost All

SPEAKING FRANKLY. By James F. Byrnes. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THE best advice former Secretary of State Byrnes offers in his revealing new book is to be patient in the contemplation of international affairs. Americans who, forgetting this admonition, let the bitter words of Vishinsky and other Russians arouse them to angry demands for Soviet blood only hasten the world toward explosion into a new war or at best drag down American diplomacy until it becomes futile gesturing. The great value of Byrnes's book lies in its recapitulation of the victories that the United States has achieved diplomatically, by patient plodding under stress, since the conclusion of World War II.

Byrnes reminds us that America persuaded Russia to remove its troops from Iran, and that the United Nations sent a mission to Greece to investigate the border battles in spite of initial Russian disapproval. He recalls that Russia and the United States created the mechanism for the control of occupied Japan which at its birth seemed to give Russia a voice in Japanese affairs but which actually has kept General MacArthur master of the situation. These successes, and also the five satellite treaties which went into effect a month ago, emerged from disagreements as profound as those over Korea, Austria, and Germany which today blacken the outlook for peace.

Byrnes's counsel of patience, however, has become so difficult to accept in this period of strain that he himself rejects it. "I have not lost hope [for world political stability]," he wrote. "I would say that our policy should be one of firmness and patience." Yet in speaking over the radio on his book's publication day, October 15, Byrnes abandoned himself to a prediction that war might come unless Russia improved its behavior. Even in the book itself, discussing the need for "firmness," he said impatiently, "We must use our best efforts to develop better bombs and more of them." That might provide a pragmatically sound—but terrifying—basis for a foreign policy if the existence of the A-bomb scared the Russians back inside their ancient boundaries. So far it has not.

The book is a major political document. It focuses on American relations with Russia from January, 1945, when Byrnes was ordered by President Roosevelt to come along to the Yalta conference, to January, 1947, when he resigned as Secretary of State. The man has always been a mercurial person, subject to quick shifts of opinion and emotion. Molotov, to whom "any exhibition of impatience or bad temper by others gives amusement," goaded him into losing his temper during the Paris peace conference in 1946. But his two-year period of responsibility for United States foreign affairs sternly educated and hardened him. He had become a firm man when he left office, and he had learned how to negotiate with Molotov. Is it possible that our present dilemma is partly due to the sudden replacement of Byrnes with a man who had only a vague notion how to proceed in dealing with the high officials of the Soviet government?

Almost the entire course of Byrnes's brief career in diplomacy was a test of patience. Russia dismayed him immediately after the Yalta conference by rejecting American interpretations of agreements made there. Vishinsky reconstituted the Rumanian government without consulting the Western Allies. The Kremlin insisted that "broadening" the Polish government meant adding men pleasing to the Moscow-manufactured Lublin regime. Stalin accused America and Britain of seeking a separate peace with Germany when they arranged at Berne in March for General Kesselring to meet General Alexander at Caserta to discuss the surrender of the Italian army.

The important disclosure that Byrnes makes in connection with those three happenings is that President Roosevelt himself was coming close to disillusionment. Roosevelt told Churchill on March 27, 1945, that "he was acutely aware of the dangers inherent in the present course of events." He added,

"We must be firm." Roosevelt and Churchill on April 1 sent a joint note to Stalin protesting against Russian interpretations of Yalta, and the State Department and the British Foreign Office were preparing another note when Roosevelt died on April 12.

It was in this atmosphere that Truman asked Byrnes, while both were returning from the funeral at Hyde Park, to become his Secretary of State—not at once, but at the conclusion of the forthcoming San Francisco Conference on the United Nations. The supposition that Truman and Byrnes destroyed a perfect understanding cementing Roosevelt and Stalin is interred by this book. But in the present time of crisis it is necessary to recall the message Roosevelt sent to Churchill one hour before his death: "I would minimize the general Soviet problem as much as possible because these problems, in one form or another, seem to arise every day and most of them straighten out, as in the case of the Berne meeting." Most of them may continue to "straighten out" if we do not let panic seize us.

Considering the public temper, Byrnes was an able Secretary of State. Why he left the post he does not explain. Perhaps he angered Truman during the Wallace crisis. Byrnes reveals that he resigned by teletype from Paris when Wallace attacked the foreign policy Byrnes was developing. To keep his Secretary of State, Truman sacked the Secretary of Commerce. But Byrnes soon followed.

His key problem in office was to determine the aims of Soviet policy. He thought he had the answer in the territorial discussions Molotov had with Hitler and Ribbentrop during the period of the Russo-German pact—control of the Dardanelles and all the region south of the U. S. S. R. toward the Indian Ocean, North Sakhalin, and various European areas—something short of world domination but a large region. Byrnes accepted Karl Marx as his guide for diplomatic action to frustrate Soviet realization of those ambitions—Marx who wrote of czarist Russia, "If the other powers hold firm, Russia is sure to retire in a very decent manner."

It is the patience and the firmness advocated by Byrnes betray a kind of chauvinism; he seems to assume that right and principle are almost always on our side. We need another book questioning whether the Russians, from their point of view, have had reasonable cause to suspect us of ill-will toward them. Within a year we may get some light on this point from the memoirs of Harry Hopkins.

Concerning Existentialism

EXISTENTIALISM. By Jean-Paul Sartre. Translated by Bernard Frechtman. Philosophical Library. $2.75.

WHAT IS EXISTENTIALISM? By William Barrett. Partisan Review Series. 0 cents.

WHETHER its future may be, existentialism has come a long way. Everybody is talking about it, a delightful lack of clarity pervades it, and an American publisher is selling a little lecture of Sartre's for a ridiculously high price. The lecture happens to be a bad one, deficient philosophically as it is full of energy and pleasantry. "There is no human nature," Sartre announces, "once there is no God to conceive it." And we go on to learn the "first principle of existentialism," that "man is nothing else but what he makes of himself." Fortunately, in the present instance, we are served better by the philosophichistorian. Dr. Barrett's essay is really worth reading. It is sensitively written, discerning—and only rarely extravagant—in its historical judgments, habitable, and yet soberly critical.

Barrett dotes a good deal of attention to the work of Martin Heidegger, otherwise inaccessible to American readers and to philosophers guided by the ordinary canons of intelligibility. Wisely refraining from the attempt to assemble a set of doctrines, he offers his own version of the traits that define existentialism. For, Kierkegaard, and Nietzsche, he suggests, are "purer" existentialists than the official systematizers, Heidegger and Jaspers; they have "a superior sense of fact." I don't think it a part of Barrett's meaning to imply a distinction between sense of fact and knowledge of fact. But in any case it would not be to the existentialists, official or unofficial, that one would ascribe mastery of fact, especially in matters human: it would be to Plato and Aristotle, Hobbes and Hume. The merit of the existentialists has been rather to distinguish the unusual, the arresting, the evanescent, the surprisingly pertinent in human experience: they have swelled rather than modified the fund of perception. Barrett is on surer ground when he says that the original "existential task" was to address the individual, the unique man longing for salvation, and that Heidegger himself departed from this task in his remote metaphysics.

Barrett sees existentialism as part of a larger, century-old enterprise which he calls "the search for the concrete." Unhappy term, "concrete"—as unsatisfactory in Barrett as in Whitehead and William James. But it is clear that what the existentialists look for in the appeal to "concreteness" is the emotional content that can be discovered in things. Barrett's way of putting this is to mark existentialism as a phase of romanticism, and Heidegger's philosophy in particular as "the scholasticism of the romantic individual." The movement reflects the quest for humanity in living, an intensity which the super-technological century appears to be destroying relentlessly. Existentialism has resulted in "an extraordinary widening and enrichment of data," but Barrett deplores the growing gulf that separates it from so-called analytic philosophy. Moreover, Sartre's existentialism, he feels, dwells too much on the phenomenological surface and could profit—in its examination of anti-Semitism, for instance—from psychoanalysis, which "dares to go below the surface." And, finally, he believes that when existentialism lapses into idealism it "loses its pungency, its sense of fact." Barrett might have asked, more plainly and explicitly, just what senses of "existence" are involved in all the clamor. No doubt existentialists would be found to differ with respect to whether the "existence" that interests them is the immediate foreground of experience or the great environment of nature. But pungency is not what would be at stake in their answer; in fact, nothing would be but the extent of existentialist mythology.

It is not easy at present to evaluate or place existentialism. To call it a mere reflection of modern confusion or "an assault on reason," as some responsible persons have done, seems at best an oversimplification. Existentialist writers have caught forcefully the great fact of tragedy in modern society. Since the rediscovery of Kierkegaard—a true progenitor, if ever there was one—they have been inventing and exploiting a new set of moral categories: despair, the will to be guilty, the choice of oneself, the absurd, the absolute decision. High-sounding terms! I wish Barrett had pointed out that the spectacular and the novel are not sufficient conditions for depth in ethical thinking. He, incidentally, is of the opinion that despite Kierkegaard's case, romanticism is basically incompatible with the Christian tradition. But this does not account for the peculiar fervency of existentialism, the religious romanticism of men like Unamuno, and the fact that there are Christian existentialists. Sartre, in the present lecture, emphasizes his atheism and its importance as giving meaning to the idea of human forlornness. Yet this is an evangelical atheism. The emotion with which the existentialist categories are filled has a curiously ancient theological flavor. The whole movement is zealously therapeutic, even in its concern for secular salvation.

Existentialism as a moral philosophy is thrust forth rather than developed and argued. And in a way the literary brilliance of its exponents obviates dialectical justifications. Certainly if one had to choose between the literary species of existentialism and the dense verbosity of its formal metaphysics, the decision would not be difficult. Thus far, at least, the greater success has been in narrative, semi-biographical, and dramatic contexts, where standards of explication and rigor are irrelevant. As logical positivism once came to liberate men from the duty of understanding historical speculation, so official existentialism threatens to liberate them from precision and intellectual discipline. It has not fully grasped the fact that paradox and terminological wit are instruments, not ends. The distinctiveness it can claim still lies in the quality of its imaginings. In vain does Sartre pontificate that "subjectivity must be the starting-point," that "existence precedes essence," that "before there

Byrnes Tells Almost All

SPEAKING FRANKLY. By James F. Byrnes. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THE best advice former Secretary of State Byrnes offers in his revealing new book is to be patient in the contemplation of international affairs. Americans who, forgetting this admonition, let the bitter words of Vishinsky and other Russians arouse them to angry demands for Soviet blood only hasten the world toward explosion into a new war or at best drag down American diplomacy until it becomes futile gesturing. The great value of Byrnes's book lies in its recapitulation of the victories that the United States has achieved diplomatically, by patient plodding under stress, since the conclusion of World War II.

Byrnes reminds us that America persuaded Russia to remove its troops from Iran, and that the United Nations sent a mission to Greece to investigate the border battles in spite of initial Russian disapproval. He recalls that Russia and the United States created the mechanism for the control of occupied Japan which at its birth seemed to give Russia a voice in Japanese affairs but which actually has kept General MacArthur master of the situation. These successes, and also the five satellite treaties which went into effect a month ago, emerged from disagreements as profound as those over Korea, Austria, and Germany which today blacken the outlook for peace.

Byrnes's counsel of patience, however, has become so difficult to accept in this period of strain that he himself rejects it. "I have not lost hope [for world political stability]," he wrote. "I would say that our policy should be one of firmness and patience." Yet in speaking over the radio on his book's publication day, October 15, Byrnes abandoned himself to a prediction that war might come unless Russia improved its behavior. Even in the book itself, discussing the need for "firmness," he said impatiently, "We must use our best efforts to develop better bombs and more of them." That might provide a pragmatically sound—but terrifying—basis for a foreign policy if the existence of the A-bomb scared the Russians back inside their ancient boundaries. So far it has not.

The book is a major political document. It focuses on American relations with Russia from January, 1945, when Byrnes was ordered by President Roosevelt to come along to the Yalta conference, to January, 1947, when he resigned as Secretary of State. The man has always been a mercurial person, subject to quick shifts of opinion and emotion. Molotov, to whom "any exhibition of impatience or bad temper by others gives amusement," goaded him into losing his temper during the Paris peace conference in 1946. But his two-year period of responsibility for United States foreign affairs sternly educated and hardened him. He had become a firm man when he left office, and he had learned how to negotiate with Molotov. Is it possible that our present dilemma is partly due to the sudden replacement of Byrnes with a man who had only a vague notion how to proceed in dealing with the high officials of the Soviet government?

Almost the entire course of Byrnes's brief career in diplomacy was a test of patience. Russia dismayed him immediately after the Yalta conference by rejecting American interpretations of agreements made there. Vishinsky reconstituted the Rumanian government without consulting the Western Allies. The Kremlin insisted that "broadening" the Polish government meant adding men pleasing to the Moscow-manufactured Lublin regime. Stalin accused America and Britain of seeking a separate peace with Germany when they arranged at Berne in March for General Kesselring to meet General Alexander at Caserta to discuss the surrender of the Italian army.

The important disclosure that Byrnes makes in connection with those three happenings is that President Roosevelt himself was coming close to disillusionment. Roosevelt told Churchill on March 27, 1945, that "he was acutely aware of the dangers inherent in the present course of events." He added,

"We must be firm." Roosevelt and Churchill on April 1 sent a joint note to Stalin protesting against Russian interpretations of Yalta, and the State Department and the British Foreign Office were preparing another note when Roosevelt died on April 12.

It was in this atmosphere that Truman asked Byrnes, while both were returning from the funeral at Hyde Park, to become his Secretary of State—not at once, but at the conclusion of the forthcoming San Francisco Conference on the United Nations. The supposition that Truman and Byrnes destroyed a perfect understanding cementing Roosevelt and Stalin is interred by this book. How to avoid destructive emotional conflicts

Emotional Problems of Living

Avoiding the Neurotic Pattern

By O. SPURGEON ENGLISH, M.D. and G. H. J. PEARSON, M.D.

THIS widely read book is written in non-psychiatric language for easy reading and comprehension. It explains difficulties in adolescence, in work, in marriage and in dealings with others. By uncovering the causes of neurotic behavior, it shows how to avoid destructive emotional conflicts.

"A first-rate job of telling how to cope with life's problems. It is a marker on the road to wholesome living."

For Sartre's talents the spontaneous theology of Kierkegaard, innocent of philosophic responsibility, would seem to be the more promising model. Maybe the public, as Aristotle suggested, can be relied upon to make the ultimate literary choice. It will continue to favor Kierkegaard, Dostoevsky, and Sartre's own fiction.

Twelve Days on Iwo Jima

THE ASSAULT. By Allen R. Matthews.
Simon and Schuster, $2.50.

IT IS not dulness of spirit that makes the average man decide that it is enough to have read three or four "combat books," but a wise economy of his powers to resist anxiety. I should not, therefore, urge Nation subscribers to read "The Assault" if it were merely another excellent book of the sort. It is a good book, uncommonly good, and its material is twelve days' experience of Iwo Jima, surely the most terrible of the Pacific encounters.

Long ago Stendhal, who knew something of war, wrote the classic description of battle in "La Chartreuse de Parme." His hero canters about the landscape looking for the battle and when it is over believes he has not found it. That description has often been criticized as a blague or as something which progress in the art of mass extermination has outmoded. Mr. Matthews's book confirms Stendhal, though his experience was unlike that of Fabrice del Dongo in that there was hardly a moment of those twelve days when danger was not within an inch of his cheekbones. Nature, to keep men up to scratch, or out of mere pique, even provided an earthquake, and fox-holes were apt to fill up with hot sulphurous steam. But other writers about battle, the author says, appear to have seen too much. Battles to those engaged in them do not have geometrical shapes. There is nothing consecutive or logical about the movements the soldier glimpses around him. Men run fitfully or crouch in odd postures; they shout and gesticulate, fall down or writhe and lie still, but all this is seen only at moments, when someone staggers through the fog of fear and frantic obsession.

There are many good objective descriptions in this book, but in its distinctive quality it reminds one of Camus's "The Stranger." Camus's man, in his unconscious effort to reject all engagement with life, wanders like a somnambulist through a brilliantly described world. Upon Iwo Jima the desperate effort to blanket out fear, to bludgeon the instincts into turning against themselves, produced a kind of somnambulism in which reason behaved like an obsessed manikin, yet somehow an effective one. "The Assault," in which the other ingredients of a combat book are present in good measure and quality, is remarkable in this respect. It is, as it were, a superb textbook for the study of the conflict between two mechanisms; on the one side duty and remembered training, on the other, fear. One sees how the desire to do things the right way—so small an incentive?—operates within a storm of near-panic. In the presence of huge fear the other emotions flash like fireflies, briefly. Resentment of the command, anger at blundering comrades, relief, enjoyment. And one also sees clearly how the very inability to grasp the whole enables the will to survive. A man's felt world of relations is his own small group, and so loyalty remains constant, as constant as fear.

When at the close of his twelve days Mr. Matthews was sent to the rear, dejection was immediate. Reality was back there where his comrades were. Relieved of fear, loyalty instantly spread out beyond the group and covered all the men upon that front. That is the absorbing thing in this book. It is as if the author were reporting a tremendous laboratory experiment. Exhausted men, almost broken, are pulled back out of action. They expect to be sent into rest. The command comes, no one knows quite how, to return to the front. With the suddenness of lightning, anxiety produces a wild, spuming effluence of rumor. Anger, grief, and immediate fear produce only laconic utterances. Anxiety is voluble. Mr. Matthews may think I have missed much that he considers important in his book. I have not. He can write so well, for instance, that if I were still a publisher's editor I should throw overboard all professional etiquette and ask to see his next manuscript.

RALPH BATES

The Philippine Problem

THE PHILIPPINE STORY. By David Bernstein. Farrar, Straus, and Company. $3.75.

CAN we afford to permit our friendship with the Filipinos to deteriorate into antagonism, hatred, and possible bloodshed? Can we afford to say 'good riddance' to the Filipinos and stand by, bemused, while they stagger in the direction of the Soviet Union?" Thus Mr. Bernstein in the peroration with which he concludes his proposal of a twenty-five-year plan of American aid to be offered "to assist the Filipino people in building an economic structure that will last for generations." At the time he was writing it had not become apparent that the first stagger would be not in the direction of the Soviet Union but in the direction of Franco Spain. This does not rule out the possibility of an ultimate goal which is very different—one of the characteristics of a stagger is that the staggerer may go backward as well as forward—but it does point to the fact that the Philippine problem is perhaps more complicated than the author of this book seems to understand. That problem did not begin when the Americans gave the Filipinos their independence, or when MacArthur was taken at night from Corregidor, or when the Spaniards handed the Islands to the United States some fifteen years before Mr. Bernstein was born. At that time Americans inherited trouble which had been three hundred years in the making, and any attempt to write wisely about the Philippines must have behind it a more than cursory study of the institutions which the Spaniards found there and those which they installed there.

Mr. Bernstein's thesis is that the Philippine Islands and their people emerged from the war in a very difficult position, that they could not at the time afford the independence which had so long been promised them, that the act of giving them that independence has not freed the United States from an obligation to give continued assistance to its former wards. With this thesis few could quarrel. But to put it into force in the form of administrative measures, grants of aid, and so on is a very different matter, and one which sets up question marks all along the line. It was not for lack of warning of trouble ahead that independence was granted on the promised date with as much panoply as could be summoned by a shattered people standing at attention as best they could while their capital lay in ruins about their feet. No Filipino leader had dared risk his future by asking that the accolade be postponed. No responsible American statesman thought it possible to make the world believe that the delay would be solely for the good of the Filipinos. So the fatal comedy was played as planned; Mr. Bernstein's suggestion that now it would be nice if the United States offered a twenty-five-year aid plan, against that background and no strings attached, is, in the present state of world tensions, not a very realistic one.

In the main this book is polite, well-informed, and temperate. There is not much in it that will be new to Nation readers, but it is useful to have all this information in one place. Mr. Bernstein's knowledge of the Islands dates from his official connection with them during the late war. In 1942, while serving with the OWI, he met the then President, Manuel Quezon, who had been rescued from the Japanese siege by the United States. At the latter's request the author set up the Office of Special Services for the Philippine government in exile, acted as political adviser, helped beam short-wave news and information to the Islands. After the Japanese surrender he became special adviser to Quezon's successor, President Osmeña. He knows many of the leading personalities in government circles, and he does not speak unkindly of his friends, or of the Huks who were not his friends.

Concerning the economic plight of the Islands he says quite rightly that the United States, by giving the Philippines the advantages of free trade, continued that deviation from their native norm which the Spaniards had started. Geographically, they should be a great market sitting astride sea routes in the Asiatic trade. But they were pulled by conquest toward the West, first into the Spanish orbit and then into the American pattern.

In a world consisting almost entirely of "ifs" it is interesting to speculate on what might happen were the Philippines to be cut loose from American ties and left free to resume their old place at the crossroads of an island world off the coast of Asia. Unfortunately the island world is not what it used to be, and has not been for some four hundred years. Neither is Asia, nor the United States, nor Spain, which made all the trouble in the first place.

A Westerner Goes East

RICHER BY ASIA. By Edmond Taylor.
Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

EDMOND TAYLOR, after something over two years in India, Ceylon, and Southeast Asia, from 1943 to 1946, found his intellectual and spiritual life greatly enriched. If the world at large, he feels, could learn what he learned in that experience, it too would grow much richer by Asia. His enrichment consisted in coming to understand for specific reasons what he might have been willing to admit only in disembodied principle before he went there: namely, that Asia and Asians have a right to their own lives free of Western imperialism, which is injurious to them and the imperialists alike; that their cultures have values, chiefly of the mind and the spirit, which the rest of the world should understand and at least in part employ; that through the recognition of these facts mankind can achieve the state of one world which will forestall other wars. Institutions and nations, he tells us, like individuals, quarrel and fight because they suffer from paranoid delusion, which seems to be just another way of saying that they misunderstand one another's motives and needs and give way to panic and irrational conduct expressed by violence. Mr. Taylor's ideas are evidently sound enough, though they are hardly novel and do not in themselves constitute the interesting part of his book.

The real value of the work lies in the author's full and careful statement of the steps by which he reached his convictions. He analyzes his intellectual experiences in the greatest detail, and the subject of the book is actually the education of Edmond Taylor. Since he has unusual powers of self-analysis and a fluid, vivid, and rich prose style, this personal history is absorbing and stimulating, except in a number of spots where excess of detail and repetition tend to relax the attention of the reader.

Mr. Taylor has remarkable skill in investigating individual and public sentiment through conversation and interview, and he has obviously supplemented this by considerable reading and reflection. His book may therefore help other thoughtful men who cannot duplicate his experiences to obtain some measure of the rich education which he has so conscientiously recorded.

W. NORMAN BROWN

Fiction in Review

A REVIEWER who has persistently battled the popular notion that a novel is as good as its politics must do a bit of backtracking in the case of Humphrey Slater's "The Heretics" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.75). Perhaps, after all, a novel is as good as its political heart in at least this one sense—that if it has a truly sound political core, this healthiness is likely to be reflected in the feeling tone of the whole work. There would certainly seem to be a relation between Mr. Slater's decent political point of view and the fact that his book suffers from none of the weaknesses endemic in our contemporary fiction of good-will; it is not priggish, condescending, or inflated. On the contrary, its manner is beautifully quiet, self-respecting, direct, consistently matching its disciplined political intelligence with a disciplined literary taste.

But unfortunately Mr. Slater's good sense and taste, while they save him from the common pitfalls of current political fiction, seem also to put a strong brake on his novelistic energy. "The Heretics" is lamentably underwritten in point of character development and drama. It is only the suggestion of the fine novel it might have been, a seed rather than a full growth.

Mr. Slater divides his story into two sections, the first dealing with the Albigensian heresies of the early thirteenth century, the second with the Spanish civil war. The connection is only ideological: Mr. Slater is giving us a comparative study in fanaticism. But he also contrives a narrative link by carrying over the names of the chief characters in the first half of the book to the second. Four children are the main actors in the early section of "The Heretics"—a brother and sister, Paul and Elizabeth, their friend Simon, and Moro, the Moorish boy with whom they join forces after their parents are killed as heretics. Seven centuries later a Paul and an Elizabeth, brother and sister, and a friend Simon are again Mr. Slater's principal characters; in the confusion of the Spanish war, in which the three of them become variously involved—Elizabeth as a correspondent for the English papers, Paul as a Trotskyite soldier, Simon as a Stalinist soldier and spy—the old quartet is completed by Cordova, Elizabeth's Spanish lover. It is a stuntsy contrivance, without either intellectual or emotional vitality.

For the fact is that no more than Mr. Slater's modern characters are present-day counterparts of the Albigenian orphans is the Spanish civil war a modern equivalent of the heresy-hunting of the Middle Ages. "The Heretics" is not saying anything so mechanical as that history repeats itself. What it is saying, if I read it correctly, is that the instinct to fanaticism has been fairly constant throughout history. Just as a dedication to the ideals of the church issued in the reign of terror against the Albigenians, so a dedication to the Soviet ideal produced the ruthlessness of the Spanish Communists; in whatever period, that is, there is a reverse of violence to the coin of principle. Mr. Slater's parallels between the child victims of the church crusades and the Russian bezprisoni, between the trials of the heretics and the Moscow trials, between the Nominalist-Realist issue and the theoretical issues of radical dissidence have a more than literal significance. They indicate the paths of thought and feeling that connect man to man over the centuries.

The earlier portion of Mr. Slater's book is historically interesting. It was nevertheless a mistake for Mr. Slater to have included it in the same novel with his Spanish material, which, quite by itself, has such fine fictional potentialities. Probably no one who has written about the Spanish struggle is better qualified for the task than Mr. Slater, both in military knowledge—he fought in the Spanish war and he has published several books on military strategy—and in political insight. "The Heretics" has none of the sentimentality or political ambiguity that marred Hemingway's "For Whom the Bell Tolls." Its author is not caught by the myth of heroism, nor is he afraid to move completely into the open with his indictment of the Stalinist command in Spain; the book's most brilliant passage, indeed, is a short satiric chapter describing a meeting of the Operational Policy Commission, three Spaniards and three Russians. Yet despite these advantages, "The Heretics," as a work of the imagination, is not to be compared with Hemingway's Spanish novel. Every human situation in it, every occasion of drama, is, if not entirely thrown away, taken at its lowest pitch—quite as if the whole business of novel-writing were properly conducted only on the scale of a well-bred drawing-room conversation.

And one's disappointment at Mr. Slater's undue reticence turns to bitterness if one happens, as I did, to read "The Heretics" hard upon Frederic Wakeman's "The Saxon Charm" (Rinehart, $2.75), which is one of the most inept books ever to come my way, and yet one of the most self-proclaiming. The new novel by the author of "The Hucksters" has a novelist as its protagonist and a good deal to say about the profession of literature. Clearly, Mr. Wakeman believes that the writing of novels is a very superior pastime, for he provides opportunity for everyone in his book to acclaim it. Whenever Novelist Eric Busch, hero of "The Saxon Charm," utters an inanity, which is whenever he opens his mouth, there is a bystander to murmur, "What wisdom!" And obviously Novelist Busch would feel no less strongly about Novelist Wakeman than Novelist Wakeman feels about Novelist Busch.

Let other reviewers risk libel by naming the likely original of the villain of Mr. Wakeman's piece, the prodigious play-producer whose genius for the theater is so heavily larded with egotism that it leaves no room for the genius of his playwrights. I am content merely to report that Mr. Wakeman calls him Matt Saxon, and that he comes nowhere near making a credible fictional character out of him. We are intended to understand that Saxon's malign charm was the temporary undoing of a fine writer named Busch who had written a fine play about the life of Molière. (Happily Mr. Wakeman spells Molière correctly; the same cannot be said of his repeated spelling, "Stendahl.") People who can believe in the quality of Busch and of Busch's dramatic effort, or who can even remember with respect that there was such a person as Molière after Mr. Wakeman's manhandling of him, will no doubt also believe in the inordinate power for good and evil of Mr. Saxon. I am not one of them.

But I should add that my untempered response to "The Saxon Charm," however much it may result from the contrast between Mr. Wakeman's entirely unwarranted confidence and Mr. Slater's unwarranted modesty, is also directed to a culture which encourages such cheapness as Mr. Wakeman's and even pays dearly for it. The terms in which the hero of "The Hucksters" left the advertising business and committed himself to the life of art should perfectly have prepared us for the kind of art we get in the novel that follows "The Hucksters." There was every evidence in Mr. Wakeman's book about radio advertising that the point of view of its author was identical with the point of view of its chief character, and that if, after he broke with his old world, Mr. Wakeman's hero went on to be a writer he would simply lay aside his "sincere" neckties for "sincere" ideas. But self-revelation was read as healthy self-criticism, Mr. Wakeman was credited with a conscious act of social usefulness, and anyone who failed to appreciate his service to American life was accused of refusing help when it was offered.

Perhaps the same accusation will be leveled against the critic who fails to welcome Mr. Wakeman's newest seriousness. Perhaps here the ungenerosity will be found to lie in tracing so close a connection between the quality of "The Hucksters" and the quality of "The Saxon Charm," in failing to encourage Mr. Wakeman's journey from Mammon to literature. But I risk the imputation in view of the substantial aid our society makes available for such travelers. The report is that the movies

WOOD
KRUTCH

MAURICE EVANS'S revival of "Man and Superman" (Alvin Theater) is said to be New York's first since 1912. Even the Theater Guild steered clear of it in the days when the Guild was treating Shaw as a staple commodity, and it gave—privately—as its reason the belief that this particular play was too heavily loaded with doctrine to be still viable. But it is obvious now that these fears were groundless. When you leave out the famous scene in hell—which has almost never been played—and forget all the published paraphernalia of preface and appendix, what you have left is a vigorous farce-comedy merely spiced with brains. Indeed, the present reviewer, at least, was struck by nothing more forcefully than by the fact that as time goes on it becomes more and more evident how completely the best of Shaw's plays are in the grand tradition of classical comedy, how relatively superficial is that overlay of "modernity" which once seemed the only reason why they could be considered "important."

At the performance which I attended the audience seemed predominantly "Broadway." I saw no evidence that any considerable number of its members were professional Shavians or, for that matter, that the play was familiar to them. They burst into laughter at the right moments, but it was the genuine laughter of surprise, not the dutiful laughter of those who know what is expected of them. I doubt that the references to the "life force" and the other specific Shavian doctrines were anything more than rather vague allusions to what are now vague commonplaces.

What the audience was seeing and reacting to was simply a fresh version of one of the oldest comic situations—that, namely, in which a man's surrender to the wiles of a woman is a better joke than usual because he knows what is happening to him and continually protests that it never will. John Tanner may think that he is something new in the world. Nothing like him, so he thinks, could have existed before Marx and Bergson had revealed the truth about the world and the universe. But in actual fact he and Ann are merely Benedict and Beatrice. They are also, especially in the last act where Tanner makes his big speech explaining why he consents to marriage and how different his marriage is going to be from any that ever was in the world before, merely Millamant and Mirabell. Of course they talk a different lingo. They give different reasons for doing what men and women have always done. But the difference between Tanner and Mirabell is no greater than the difference between Mirabell and Benedict. Congreve rewrote Shakespeare in the terms of his age; Shaw rewrites Congreve in the terms of ours. And to say this is, of course, not to belittle Shaw but to exalt him. In no very distant future his doctrines will be either forgotten or taken for granted, and in either case they will be incapable of keeping him alive in the theater or even in the library. But it looks more likely now than it did twenty years ago that his place in dramatic literature is, if not as secure as Shakespeare's, then at least as secure as that of Congreve or Sheridan.

It is obviously out of some such convictions as these that Mr. Evans has staged the play. He has costumed it as a period piece, but in such a way that though there are occasional moments when the result is to make it seem merely quaint, the effect on the whole is less to set the play in a particular time than to take it out of time and to put it in the eternity where comedy belongs. There must have been a temptation to play Tanner either as a tweedy and red-bearded young Shaw or even as a parlor pink of the thirties, but Mr. Evans has chosen instead to play him as a young man who is grotesque in nothing except his ideas, and that I think is right, though I am less sure of the rightness of Frances Rowe's Ann, who is stylized almost as much as the Gwendolin of Mr. Gielgud's "The Importance of Being Earnest." As an isolated figure she is striking and amusing. Her interpretation makes, of course, the point of the contrast between essential woman and the disguise which the sentimentality of the Roebuck Ramsens and the Ricky-Ticky-Tavies make her put on. But that is not the way I have always seen her in my mind's eye, and I should very much like to see an opposite manner tried. In the play Ann is the only person except Tanner who is a realist. Indeed, there is less self-deceit in her than there is in him. Her concessions to respectability and decorum have always seemed to me to be, not attempts to deceive, but overtly mocking, and I should like to see her played, not as even externally a Victorian doll, but as a woman whose feminine vitality is almost embarrassingly obvious.

If you leave out of account the pseudo-Ibsenite dramas of his nomenclature, then "Man and Superman" is, of course, the first of Shaw's plays in which he dared to profess preaching as his primary aim. Yet it is also, of all his plays, the one in which he makes most open fun of himself, the one in which the Shavian hero is most decisively put in his place; and Mr. Evans gets the full effect of the final scene in which Ann's "Go right on talking" brings the curtain down upon one of the funniest conclusions in modern comedy. Indeed, when the whole thing is played as he plays it, all the implications of the title except one pretty well fade away. The only real superman is and will remain merely Woman. Perhaps it is worth noting that the line which got the heartiest laugh was Tanner's definition of virtue—in the "limited Victorian sense of the word—as merely "the trade unionism of the married."

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

COLUMBIA has issued a new recording of Beethoven's Violin Concerto made by Szigeti with Bruno Walter and the New York Philharmonic (Set 697; $7.10). I am unable to compare it with the old Columbia recording that Szigeti and Walter made in Europe; but even if my recollection of more excitingly dynamic phrasing by Szigeti in the old performance is correct, his playing in the new one is superb, and Walter again provides it with an excellent orchestral framework. Unfortunately, however, the recorded sound of the new performance is bad—worse even than that of the Brahms concerto performance for which Columbia last year was given its prize for excellence by a jury of prominent record critics acting on behalf of some record magazine. On a wide-range machine the orchestra is harsh, the violins knife-edged and acidulous, the solo violin wiry and shrill. And I have no doubt whatsoever of my recollection of the beautiful recorded sound of the old performance.

Victor has issued a recording of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins made by Heifetz—who plays both solo parts—with a chamber orchestra under Franz Waxman (Set 1136; $3). Heifetz's playing in the first movement is uncharacteristically straightforward in style, but the joint performance of the movement by soloist and orchestra comes out constrained and jerky. In the slow movement we get the constant swelling and wailing that are characteristic of Heifetz's phrasing, and that carry over into the finale. The recorded sound of the performance lacks some of the spaciousness and richness one expects, but is otherwise good.

Other Columbia recordings include one of Dvorak's Symphony No. 1 played by the Cleveland Orchestra under Leinsdorf (Set 687; $7.10). The work is engagingly melodious, with a particularly fine opening movement; it is well performed; the recorded sound of the orchestra is clear and bright, though without all the warmth and luster it might have; and some of the surfaces of my copy are poor.

Also Strauss's music for "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme" played by the Pittsburgh Symphony under Reiner (Set 693; $7.10). The music is luxuriant and sugary, with some pretty tunes and humorous touches; the performance is good and is well reproduced except for the shrill and nasal sound of the solo violin.

And also an effective performance of Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier" by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy that is the best-reproduced of the group (12584-D; $1.25).

On a Victor single disc (10-1323; $.75) are excerpts from Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera" and Giordano's "Andrea Chenier" beautifully sung—a number of years ago, I would guess—by Bjoerling. On another (10-1325; $.75) is a piano piece by Schumann that I find uninteresting, his Arabesque Opus 18, which Iturbi plays in his excessively mannered and affected style. The piano is excellently reproduced; but the surfaces of my copy are noisy. And on still another (10-1326; $.75) are Rubinstein's performances of the Dance of Terror and Ritual Fire Dance from Falla's "El Amor Brujo"—the recorded sound of the piano too hard and bright in the first, dull and strange in the second, and the surfaces of my copy noisy.

From English Decca comes a set (ED28; $5) of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture played by the National Symphony under Jorda. The work is one of Rimsky's best; ears accustomed to the sensationalized Stokowski performance may find Jorda's too unexciting, but it seems right, and the orchestral playing is very fine; and it is reproduced with marvelous fidelity to timbre, clarity of texture, spaciousness, and brilliance.

Also superbly reproduced is the excellent performance by the London Philharmonic under Sargent of the ballet music from Holst's "The Perfect Fool," which may have been effective with the stage action but is agreeably inconsequential by itself (Set ED31; $5).

And on a single disc (K1164; $2) are Handel's Cave Solvo from "Atalanta" and Ob, Sleep! Why Dost Thou Leave Me? from "Semele," sung with lovely vocal tone (except for the insecure opening phrase of the second piece) by Ada Alsop, soprano, with the Boyd Neel String Orchestra.

Upon What Meat Doth Our Caesar Feed?

Dear Sirs: Recently in your columns two able writers discussed the relative food value of the salmon and the tuna. But surely both of these excellent varieties are surpassed in importance by a much smaller fish. I refer, of course, to the humble red herring.

Consider how nourishing the red herring is, at least to that relatively small proportion of our population which constitutes our present ruling group, namely, the leaders of the Republican Party and the N. A. M. With its highly diverting odor, the red herring exerts an influence all out of proportion to its size. We all know what it accomplished at the last election.

Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed that he has grown so great? Upon the little red herring, of course.

The A. D. A. and the Marshall Plan

Dear Sirs: In his article Marshall Plan vs. Socialism, in your issue of October 4, J. Alvarez del Vayo stated that "the recent statement of the Americans for Democratic Action unfortunately ignored the inescapable fact [that] if American liberals in their all-out support of the Marshall plan help to defeat socialism in Europe, their own natural allies will be wiped out in the inevitable clash between the extreme right and the Communists."

Mr. del Vayo's statement completely misrepresents the position of Americans for Democratic Action. Every A. D. A. statement on the Marshall plan has emphasized the very point which Mr. del Vayo claims we have ignored. We agree with him that this phase of the plan is crucial and feel that it justifies making A. D. A.'s record perfectly clear to readers of The Nation.

On July 22 the Executive Committee of A. D. A., together with several of its members, including Mrs. Roosevelt, Barry Bingham, Emil Rieve, and Herbert Lehman, proposed an immediate six-point program to give substance and life to the "high hope" latent in the Marshall plan.

That program covered the "inescapable fact" which Mr. del Vayo claims was ignored. It read as follows:

We urge that the Administration make clear—beyond any possibility of honest doubt or of purposeful distortion—that the United States does not intend to use its aid as a means of forcing upon European countries an economic system contrary to their freely expressed desires. We must repudiate those confused voices who would withhold American aid from nations engaged in expanding the areas of public ownership or public control; we must make it abundantly clear that we regard the free governments of Europe, with their varying degrees of state control, as among the most honored champions of democracy.

Again on September 20 the National Executive Board of A. D. A., meeting in Chicago, issued a statement calling for a special session of Congress to meet the indivisible foreign and domestic crisis. That statement said that "we reject the proposals to deny aid to the Socialist governments of Europe. If we should use our aid as a means of vetoing internal change based on the free choice of the peoples concerned, we would sacrifice our best allies in the struggle against totalitarianism."

Elaborating that point, the lead editorial in the current edition of the A. D. A. World, official organ of Americans for Democratic Action, devotes itself to attacking those "confusionists" (Senator Ball, Harold Stassen, McGraw-Hill, and the N. A. M.) who advance the contention that Western Europe is finished unless it turns its back on all forms of socialism. . . .

Mr. del Vayo assumes that the entire Administration is committed to using the Marshall plan to help defeat socialism in Europe. He quotes Arthur Krock and Secretary Snyder, but ignores an authoritative report that such suggestions have been steadfastly rejected by Secretary Marshall, George Kennan, and the Harriman committee. In fact, the whole implication of Mr. del Vayo's article seems to be that liberals should not support the Marshall plan.

It seems very clear to us that it is the responsibility of American progressives to see that the Marshall plan is made a reality, free from the political restrictions proposed by the "confusionists."

Without the Marshall plan Europe faces another winter of hunger, want, and chaos under which the remaining hope for democratic planning may collapse. That, too, is a rather inescapable fact which Mr. del Vayo apparently ignores. If all liberals do the same, then all hope for social democracy in Europe is truly lost.

Wanted: an Integrated Science Foundation

Dear Sirs: In a recent article, Atomic Bombs or Atomic Plenty, in The Nation of September 20, Leonard Engel condemned President Truman's veto of the bill to establish a National Science Foundation and emphasized the great danger of continued military control over scientific research. We agree with Mr. Engel on the importance of the proposed foundation and on the dangers of military control, but we would like to point out certain facts that he apparently overlooked.

First, as pointed out by the New York Times on August 8: "No great harm has been done by this reluctant veto. No funds were specifically appropriated for research to be conducted under direction of a National Science Foundation. . . . Hence it would have been impossible to have set a [foundation] in motion"—this year, at least.

Second, it does not seem to us profitable to spend further time attacking or justifying the Presidential veto. Events have shown that the critical issue now is not so much whether we are to have a National Science Foundation—all parties seem to concur in this—but rather what kind of foundation it is to be. The sponsors of the vetoed bill wanted a foundation publicly supported by government funds but administered by "dollar-a-year" men. Only by happy coincidence is such an organization administered primarily in the public interest. The alternative is a foundation both publicly supported and publicly controlled, with direct responsibility to our elected officials.

Third, it should be noted in connection tion with Mr. Engel's apprehension over the military's dominance of science that the type of foundation proposed in the vetoed Smith bill was advanced and strongly supported by Dr. Vannevar Bush, chairman of the Research and Development Board of our National Military Establishment. This fact, taken in conjunction with the provisions of the bill regarding liaison with the army and navy, suggests the possibility that the proposed foundation would not have represented a clean break from military control.

In condemning control of basic research Mr. Engel very effectively pointed out that in spite of the excellent qualities of individual officers, military control would lead in the long run to emphasis on weapons for war rather than on peace-time applications, because "the system is stronger than any number of excellent individual officers." We would like to point out that the same principle applies to the proposed foundation. If the wrong sort of foundation is established, its stultifying effects may well prove stronger than the efforts of any number of well-meaning individuals working within it.

The task for progressives is not simply to urge a science foundation but to insist on a type of foundation that will be fully integrated into our national life. Such a foundation should be democratically administered to promote the general welfare through the encouragement and support of basic research in all sciences, including the social sciences.

Arbitration and Sovereignty Not Incompatible

Dear Sirs: Your editorial Vetoes and Other Tools, in The Nation of August 30, says that the Netherlands ambassador to the United States, Mr. Van Kleffens, rejected United Nations arbitration of the Indonesian dispute because such action would infringe Dutch sovereignty. Then follows this statement, "He did not bother to explain why the Security Council's cease-fire order had not infringed Dutch sovereignty or why American mediation would not do so."

The fact of the matter is that on August 15 Mr. Van Kleffens told the Council, "The United Nations scored a success with the cease-fire invitation.

You know that we accepted that on humanitarian grounds, not because we recognize the jurisdiction or the Council."

In all likelihood Mr. Van Kleffens never bothered to explain why United States mediation of the Indonesian dispute wouldn't have infringed Dutch sovereignty because it never occurred to him to do so. After all, if the Netherlands government voluntarily accepts third-party mediation, the question of sovereignty doesn't arise.

With a few notable exceptions American liberals have not looked kindly on the Netherlands police action in Indonesia. In Holland, however, the Socialist Party of Labor, which together with the Catholic Peoples Party forms the coalition government, has supported this action. Furthermore, these Dutch "liberals" took this stand even though their party is strongly committed to a policy of cooperation with the Republic.

It is well known that on March 25, 1947, Dutch and Indonesian representatives signed the Linggadjati agreement for the settlement of their peoples' future relationship. The Socialist Soetan Sjahrir signed for the Republic and the Socialist Willem Schermerhorn signed for the Netherlands. This agreement was widely praised as setting the pattern for a new and equitable relation between the peoples of East and West. To say the least, however, the agreement hasn't lived up to its promise—or rather, the Republicans haven't lived up to the agreement.

Remember that the Indonesians are not fighting for their freedom: that has already been promised to them as of 1949, and their interim de facto authority has already been recognized. The Netherlands government still stands on its offer to deal with the Republic on the basis of the Linggadjati agreement.

Dear Sirs: This is fan mail! I hope very much that you have had a bale of letters commending you for Richard L. Neuberger's articles on Alaska. For someone as well known as he to write so fearlessly and honestly, and with no ax to grind, does my heart good.

I stayed up there for some months, and it is just about God's most beautiful country, and the people are for the most part, friendly, frank, and intelligent. Yet, as he says, the Territory is tied—head, neck, and heels—and the situation for enterprising young people up there makes me sick! I am glad Mr. Neuberger is talking about it to a new group of readers.

A Social Affair
in Johannesburg

Dear Sirs: At the present session of the United Nations the treatment of the colored peoples in South Africa is once again the subject of discussion, and it is the fervent hope of liberal-minded citizens of that country that the introduction of a more progressive policy may result.

The conception that the white races are superior to others creates the belief that the white man may treat his colored neighbor as he pleases. A recent incident will illustrate this: Only a few weeks ago a native employed as a chef at a home in a fashionable suburb of Johannesburg was beaten to death by Europeans while waiting to board a tram car. Investigation revealed that the assault was provoked by the fact that the native was well dressed and was wearing gloves; the Europeans apparently found this incompatible with "keeping the Kaffir in his place."

The evil of this attitude, however, lies not so much in the injustice to individuals as in the fact that the systematic suppression of the colored peoples effectively prevents their playing a part in the development of the country and creates bitterness which can only become more dangerous with the passage of the years.

An Important Difference

Dear Sirs: In my article in The Nation of September 13, Chicago Has One More Chance, there is a statement that the coming Chicago referendum for a bond issue for public housing "will most certainly be voted down now as a result of the Fernwood violence." This is a garbled version of my original text: the bond issue might be defeated. The difference between might and most certainly is important to advocates of public housing in Chicago who are working to turn might into will not.

The Shape of Things

THE UN-AMERICAN HEARINGS DIRECTED BY J. Parnell Thomas and designed to expose Communist plots in Hollywood are still going strong in Washington. So far, they have revealed what the well-dressed movie star wears when he attends a hearing of the Un-American Committee; they have disclosed that Adolphe Menjou reads Marxian literature; they have indicated that there are some seventy-nine Communists and fellow-travelers in Hollywood who have had little or no success in injecting propaganda into films and whose influence on the screen unions is declining as a result of democratic opposition within the ranks. The first episodes of the Perils of Parnell, though they have played to a full House, have been a dismal flop as far as their alleged purpose is concerned. The Undoubting Thomas and his committee have added little to what was already known about Hollywood—that there are actors and writers among the swimming pools who, with varying degrees of innocence, salt their high-paid existence with dreams of “the revolution” and even sometimes invest some of their money in it. But the committee has done a fine job of flouting every American precept of the rights of individuals and doing it in the most cowardly way possible—under the protection of its Congressional immunity. Moreover, by holding over Hollywood the threat of such “investigations,” it has added to the stultifying pressure of the Hays code still another pressure which should go far toward making American films even more puerile and timid than they already are. We doubt whether the hearings are a prelude to censorship, if only because such exhibitions make official censorship unnecessary. Altogether, a fine day’s work—making hash of the Bill of Rights at the American taxpayer’s expense. The exposure of a few Communists in Hollywood seems hardly worth the price.

AFTER A WEEK OF UNDILUTED NONSENSE, however, the sane public has begun to react. A sober conference in New York on Cultural Freedom and Civil Liberties, called last weekend by the Progressive Citizens, converted itself into a crowded demonstration against the Washington hearings and allied varieties of hysteria. Several thousand delegates and plain citizens, overflowing the big ballroom of the Hotel Commodore, adopted a series of resolutions calling for abolition of the Thomas Committee and revocation of the President’s loyalty tests. At the same time, Americans for Democratic Action, in New York, issued a strong attack on the committee signed by a wide assortment of writers and other professional people. And two official protests have come from the Motion Picture Association—one by Paul V. McNutt, special counsel for the association, and one by Eric Johnston, its president. This is a good beginning. A few more well-aimed rebuttals may bring to an early close the Washington run of Mr. Thomas’s melodrama.

THE IRANIAN MAJLIS HAS DECIDED TO REJECT the proposed Russian oil concession in Azerbaijan province and to refuse all further foreign participation in the development of oil resources. This action was hardly surprising after Premier Ghavam, who signed the tentative agreement with the Soviet government in 1946, asked for its nullification. Moscow will certainly feel that it has been double-crossed and is sure to protest bitterly, even if it does not immediately take other steps. However, the Soviet case is weakened by the undeniable fact that the concession agreement was signed under duress while the Red Army was occupying part of Iran and encouraging a separatist movement in Azerbaijan. In deciding on its present action, the Iranian government has undoubtedly been emboldened by American moral and material support. We have recently granted that country a $25,000,000 arms loan, and our ambassador in Teheran pointedly declared, just before the oil debate started in the Majlis, that “the United States is firm in its conviction that any proposals made by one sovereign government to another should not be accompanied by threats.” According to rumor, this public declaration has been backed up by still stronger private assurances to the Iranian government. The British government, on the other hand, is said to have advised Teheran to leave open a door for further negotiations with Moscow should the concession be turned down. This advice may not have been wholly disinterested, since the barring of Russia was likely to raise questions about the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company’s profitable concession in the south. And the Majlis program, in fact, includes negotiations with Anglo-Iranian for larger royalty payments. Nevertheless, the British suggestion was wise. Iran cannot develop its oil without

A CLASH BETWEEN THE BRITISH LABOR government and the House of Lords was bound to come. When the Attlee Cabinet took office, it seemed probable that the upper chamber would throw out some vital bill passed by the Commons—thereby holding it up for two years—and create the kind of situation that led Asquith and Lloyd George, in 1911, to go to the electorate on the issue of the Peers versus the People. For the past two years, however, their lordships have behaved very circumspectly: they have done nothing in particular and done it very well, refraining from challenges to the government on matters of principle and confining their activities to suggesting technical amendments to bills. But if they have kept their power under wraps, they and everyone else have been conscious of the fact that it existed, ready to be unleashed at the strategic moment. Most people thought this moment would come when the government moved to nationalize the steel industry, as it was pledged to do by its election program. For various reasons, that bill has been postponed until next year, which means that the Lords, by virtue of their authority to reject bills for a maximum of two consecutive sessions, would be able to stymie it until after another general election. Consequently, the Labor government has decided to take the offensive by introducing legislation limiting the Lords' power of delay to one year. That seems to us a pretty mild way of dealing with what is, after all, a hopeless anachronism. In fact, from this distance, it is a little difficult to understand why people we respect, like the editors of the Manchester Guardian, are so stirred up. Their theory seems to be that the government's action will tend to destroy national unity at a time of crisis. But attached as the British are to historical monuments, we cannot believe that they are going to split badly as the result of this modest effort to whittle down hereditary privilege.

THE TWO SUBCOMMITTEES ON PALESTINE—one to deal with partition, the other with the Arab demand for a "unitary state"—are struggling, as we go to press, with an almost impossible assignment. They were directed to send to the full committee, by Wednesday of this week, concrete proposals for carrying out their respective solutions. Since such basic and controversial problems are involved as the administration of Palestine during an interim period and the enforcement of whatever decision is reached, it seems likely that the discussions will drag on for some time. This is the more probable, since the appointment of the two groups was accomplished only after a series of unsavory intrigues and maneuvers too complex to recite here. In the end, Dr. Evatt overruled several attempts to load the subcommittees with members whose only function would be to delay action. Perhaps the most challenging and yet hopeful aspect of the whole situation is the presence of Russia and the United States on the subcommittee dealing with partition. As its only big-power members, these two are faced with the salutary necessity of working together toward an end both have publicly espoused. If they are able to agree on a plan to carry out the partition proposal, it will surely be adopted; in such circumstances, Britain would not and could oppose it. But the problems they must meet involve issues in which power politics might easily play a destructive part. At this moment, the subcommittee has become a test tube in which the capacity of Russia and the United States to cooperate in a specific action will presently be proved. The result has an importance far outweighing the Palestine issue itself.

THE THREE HOUSING AMENDMENTS TO BE voted on in New York State in themselves present no unusual features. They simply call for $135,000,000 to be lent to the cities for housing and raise the maximum state subsidy by $4,000,000 and the amount of subsidy contracts that can be made in any year by a half-million. But New York State is pivotal politically. How New York votes on housing will affect the 1948 party platforms. Some Republican diehards now think Senator Taft was shrewd to support low-rent housing. The Republican-dominated Joint Investigation Committee on Housing is touring the country, ostensibly to find out about conditions but actually to determine just how "hot" housing is. Another reason for national interest is the position of Mr. Dewey. At the beginning of the year, the Governor thought he could prevent the submission of any housing amendment this year and thereby pick up positive support from the American Legion and the real-estate lobby. Now that it seems evident that the veterans' vote may hinge on housing, Mr. Dewey behaves as though he were the loving parent of the amendments. The main danger lies in public lethargy. Last year, only one in three voting citizens voted on the housing amendment. Since this is an off year, with several other propositions to pass on, the real-estate lobby is hoping that the housing amendments will fail. Mr. Dewey's Republican cronies have never liked public housing either. They view Mr. Dewey's support as purely strategic and will, as before, do what they can to side with the lobby. But unexpectedly there has been a big registration. Why? Outside of a judgeship fight in New York City between able Representative Benjamin J. Rabin and the Dewey-sponsored J. Edward Lombard, Jr., there are no important battles. Is it because housing has really become a live political issue?

The President Acts

NOW that we have failed to save the world by forgoing chicken every Thursday, it is heartening that President Truman has resumed the leadership which the country rightly expects from the White House. In the continuing tug-of-war between his two groups of advisers, the Missouri provincials won a minor skirmish in the President's recent outlandish remarks on price controls and the "police state," only to lose a major engagement in his bold decision to call Congress in special session.

The decision did require a measure of courage, because there is no doubt that the Republicans, bending the Administration's urgency to their own purposes, will exact a price for their cooperation. One has only to note the comments of their leaders to be convinced that the making of political hay is in prospect. "Everything will be before us," was Senator Taft's prompt reaction, and he has announced that taxes will be one of the first matters considered. It may be recalled in this connection that it was Representative Clarence Brown, now Taft's Presidential campaign manager, who, in the last session, raised the slogan "No tax relief, no foreign relief." Speaker of the House Martin has served notice that Congress will "take up any domestic issue" that seems necessary, and Senator Ferguson, who at first opposed a special session, now thinks it "a good idea."

Since this intention to throw the session wide open was foreseen as a major danger, there is naturally speculation as to why the President, in announcing his decision, chose to stress the highly controversial cost-of-living issue rather than the crisis in Western Europe. Legislation on prices is all but certain to involve protracted wrangling on the Hill, while European relief, which has been steadily winning support among hitherto hostile Congressmen, is almost sure to be approved. Nor is there much doubt that it was pressure from Secretary of State Marshall and our principal European ambassadors that prompted Truman to act rather than a sudden conviction that only immediate legislation could check run-away prices. But it is our own belief that, in this instance, the President has combined an act of statesmanship with a political shrewdness none too common in this Administration. By calling the session, he assures Western Europe of stop-gap aid, and by giving the domestic crisis as his chief reason, he once again puts the responsibility for checking inflation squarely on Congress, where it belongs.

We do not know what specific inflationary curbs the President will propose, but there are strong hints out of Washington that they will include some kind of control on the prices of a few key commodities imposed at the source of production, government allocation of crucial materials, and extended import-export controls—all of which, by the way, were urged editorially in the September 20 issue of this magazine. We hope that Congress will adopt some such program, but if it does, we shall be greatly surprised if it fails to demand a quid pro quo in the form of reduced taxation. Politically, such a course would make sense in a pre-election year, but economically it makes none at all. Less money in the Treasury will not serve the purposes of the Marshall Plan, and more money in the pockets of the public will further stimulate inflation. Thus, in one neat stroke, both purposes of the special session might be seriously undermined by the "bargain."

Republicans who are not willing to press a political advantage to such lengths would do well to consider the formula worked out by Senator Morse of Oregon, amounting to a tax-reduction bill with a delayed fuse. Under the Morse proposal, the cut would become effective at some future date, to be fixed either by the President, subject to a Congressional veto, or by Congress, subject to a Presidential veto. In this way, the reduction would be assured, but it would be timed to events and made to serve as a brake on a sliding economy rather than an encouragement to further inflation.

Whatever the domestic political perils involved, the President has done the right thing. He has arrested a dangerous tendency toward government by drift, he has administered a psychological shot-in-the-arm to the despairing peoples of Western Europe, and he has imparted to his own country a sorely needed sense of how grave the situation has become.

American Success Story

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

CABLING from Athens to the New York Herald Tribune on October 22, Joseph Alsop used these words: "In our vague, somnambulist way, we have already begun to act abroad like the great power we are." And he goes on to urge that we do it consciously, methodically, using all needed resources. But what is unconscious or somnambulist about our behavior in Greece? Mr. Alsop describes Americans taking over the Greek administration—not as advisers but in "key positions in the more important ministries." He tells how they are balancing the budget, revamping the tax system, insisting on the dismissal of 15,000 civil servants. (He does not explain what effect budget-balancing will have in a country with a miserably small income whose heavy military expenses are being expanded, not reduced.) Mr. Alsop says that the Americans understand the job they are doing and feel right at home doing it.

Greek officials, he reports, are delighted and have shown their satisfaction by inviting the Americans to "extend their responsibilities still more immensely by advising on the military operations of the Greek army." Later press dispatches announce that Washington has accepted the invitation. Somnambulist? The word hardly seems to fit this brisk readiness to run a foreign state and direct a civil war.

Then there is our triumph in the United Nations. The same paper that carried Mr. Alsop's vivid story reported the adoption by the General Assembly of the American resolution setting up a United Nations border watch to protect the Greek frontier. The only votes against the resolution were cast by the Slav bloc, and Vishinsky's demand that Anglo-American armed forces be withdrawn from Greece was turned down by the same overwhelming majority. Was this American initiative also a sign of somnambulism? Or is it clear, by this time, that the Truman Doctrine, launched as a strategic military-political move against Russia in the Balkans, has been carefully elaborated into a system of full-fledged intervention, sanctioned and buttressed at last by the United Nations? Forgotten is the unilateral character of our initial action, forgotten the idea that "aid" to Greece might have been administered through a United Nations agency; today, American policy is practically U. N. policy, and Moscow, not Washington, is by-passing the international organization with its threat to boycott the border commission.

America in the right, Russia in the wrong, Griswold running Greece, a U. N. commission on the border to ward off Slav aggression—if these be the results of United States sleep-walking, one awaits with trepidation the hour when consciousness returns.

BUT while these evidences of firm purpose and firmer control accumulate, other events in Greece suggest that America's democratic intervention has its limits—perhaps self-imposed. Americans boss government departments and agencies, and prepare to boss the army. But apparently neither they nor their front man, the venerable Premier Sophoulis, has anything to do with the administration of justice. On October 20 and 21, just before the Alsop story appeared, dispatches from Athens reported that Communist newspapers had been suppressed and fifty-odd "alleged Communist guerrillas and sympathizers" had been executed after trial by extraordinary courts martial.

Since civil war is raging in Greece, one would normally expect captured partisans to receive summary punishment. But this civil war has been taken over and called something different by the Americans. It has been called a "defense of constitutional government" and "restoration of order." If we can plunge in and run administrative agencies with the bland self-confidence Mr. Alsop describes, one would think we might also check the sort of repressions we criticize so sharply in other neighboring countries. It is true, of course, that we engineered the amnesty offer and had some political exiles brought back from the islands. But the amnesty has failed; not, I suppose, because the guerrillas want a war to the death, but because they have little confidence in a government that imprisons and executes leftists and suppresses newspapers while ostensibly conforming to the democratic susceptibilities of its great protector. Two Communist newspapermen, by the way, were fined and sentenced to eighteen months imprisonment the other day for spreading "false reports" and stories "insulting" to Dwight Griswold. According to Dana Adams Schmidt, writing from Athens in the New York Times of October 21, Premier Sophoulis, having had so disappointing a response to his amnesty offer, must now carry out his promise to "exterminate the minority serving foreign interests." The quotes are the Premier's.

THAT the Soviet Union has helped bring about the American success, no one but Vishinsky and his colleagues would deny. The Americans baited a trap and caught the Russians in it. By going well beyond the findings of the U. N. commission of investigation and placing all blame for Greece's border troubles on the Balkan states—and inferentially on the U. S. S. R.—the United States jockeyed the Russians into a position of intransigence that cost them considerable neutral support. Many states were reluctant to accept the American formula; first, because they genuinely wanted conciliation rather than a deadlock, second, because they know that the Balkan states cannot justly be shouldered with sole responsibility for the Greek struggle. It was this feeling which finally forced the United States to modify its resolution, withdrawing the direct charge against Greece's neighbors and substituting a milder, but still incriminating, reference to the findings of the Security Council's investigating commission.

By that time, Russia was committed with utmost violence to the position that no version of the American formula could be accepted and only the withdrawal of Britain and the United States would end the trouble in Greece. Since this view was as well calculated to anger the two Western powers as the American resolution was to anger Russia, the results were increased ill-feeling and a final showdown in which even the most conciliatory Western delegates felt obliged to vote with the United States.

Why was it necessary for Russia to force the issue to this point? A more moderate course might have won the Soviet delegation a major strategic victory along with increased respect. If they had indorsed the principle of a border commission while insisting on strict impartiality in its composition and terms of reference and rejecting all imputations of one-sided guilt, their position would have been almost impregnable. Such an attitude would have exposed the provocative bias of the American resolution and undoubtedly won over a large number of delegates. But the Russians rejected compromise in favor of denunciation. They buried their best arguments in a thunder of invective. They demanded all or nothing; and America consequently walked off with a total victory it did not deserve.

New Line-up in France

BY LOUIS LEVY

FROM New York it is rather difficult to see clearly what has happened in France in the last ten days. The American press has given a curiously distorted picture of the French elections and subsequent developments, and official French figures on the vote of the various parties are not yet available.

None the less it is already possible to draw a few general conclusions. The first is that the Gaullist threat is now out in the open; the General's Rassemblement received more than 30 per cent of the total ballots cast. The second is that the working-class parties have by and large held their own. Despite the economic crisis and the difficulties encountered since liberation, the French masses are not taken in by the verbiage of apprentice dictators. In this connection the consolidation of the Socialist Party is especially significant: contrary to predictions of American correspondents in Paris, it resisted the double assault of Gaullists and Communists and on the whole maintained its positions intact.

It would be futile to try to gauge the extent to which foreign policy, notably the formation of the Communist Committee of Warsaw, influenced the French voter. Unquestionably it played a part; in the Paris region, for example, the Gaullists cut deep into the Communist vote. However, one should not lose sight of the fact that the feature of these elections was the consolidation of the left positions on the one hand and the absorption of the right and center forces—the P. R. L., the M. R. P., and the Radical Socialists—by the Gaullist Rassemblement, on the other. The latter process may have been accelerated by recent developments abroad, but signs of it have been apparent for several months. And De Gaulle naturally did his best to speed the realignment.

LOUIS LEVY, French journalist and writer, is correspondent of the Populaire in London and now at the Assembly of the U. N. He is also delegate of the Executive of the French Socialist Party in Great Britain.

The collapse of the M. R. P. should surprise no one familiar with the history of French politics. In the period before the war the Christian Democratic left never succeeded in penetrating the strongholds of Catholicism. The spectacular rise of the M. R. P. after the war was due to a special combination of circumstances, involving the Resistance and the role played by men like Georges Bidault and Francisque Gay. Today, however, it is plain that the church has withdrawn support from the left Catholics, an augury which gives little reassurance as to the political intentions of the Vatican.

TWO or three days before the elections Léon Blum delivered an important speech at the Vélodrome d'Hiver in Paris. The chief of the Socialist Party affirmed the determination of the French people to be neither "Americanized" nor "Sovietized." His most serious reproach to the Communist Committee of Warsaw was its acceptance of two blocs in Europe as a fait accompli. He declared that socialism must exert every effort to prevent the formation of antagonistic East-West blocs. Finally, after denouncing De Gaulle's "Caesarism," Blum warned against aggravating the present differences between the two wings of the working class, whose unity may prove necessary in the coming struggle.

In the light of this speech I confess that Premier Ramadier's recent Cabinet shake-up was somewhat unexpected. I broach this subject with infinite caution, having thus far received no detailed information from Paris. Apparently if Ramadier has not moved in the direction of the popular front to which Blum's speech logically pointed, it is because he felt that collaboration with the Communists might not only intensify the split between left and right but also jeopardize the Marshall Plan. He therefore seems to have hit on a centrist formula in order to fight the Gaullists, while at the same time assuring his middle-class supporters that he will strongly resist the maneuvers of the Communists. Ramadier's pledge to these M. R. P. and Radical Socialist elements took the form of sacrificing the two ministers whose dirigisme (economic planning) they have violently opposed—André Philip, Minister of National Economy, and Tanguy Prigent, Minister of Agriculture. At the same time he shelved two ministers suspected of Gaullist sympathies—Michelet, Minister of War, and Jacquinet, Minister of Marine. Their posts are now combined in a single Ministry of National Defense headed by Teitgen, an M. R. P. leader who in recent weeks has taken a sharp anti-Gaullist stand. The Ministry of the Interior remains in the hands of Edouard Depreux, who, unlike certain of his Socialist comrades, did not wait until 1946 to discover the danger of Gaullism.

I have tried to explain Ramadier's move on the basis of the few facts at my disposal, without, however, defending it in the least. To my way of thinking it is destined to early failure. The departure of the most "dirigist" ministers has surely created widespread dissatisfaction in the ranks of the Socialist Party—notwithstanding the fact that Philip has been replaced by Jules Moch, also known as a "dirigist." But more important, a considerable number of militant Socialists must now be calling for the creation of a popular front. That is the only way to defeat the Gaullists.

I realize that the Communists have done little to facilitate such a move. Since the Warsaw meeting their attitude toward the Socialists has been increasingly aggressive. I am told, however, that the party's new policy is meeting with resistance: Maurice Thorez himself is said to oppose it. One would be wrong to think of the French Communist Party as a monolith. It is almost impossible for Moscow to maneuver as it pleases a party with the numerical strength of the French Communists. Despite the frequent maladresses of the Soviet leaders, they are surely aware of the degree of political and democratic sophistication among the French proletariat.

To save the republic, all republicans are needed—Socialists, Communists, and also those rank-and-file democrats who have voted for the Radicals or even for the Christian Democrats. Although several Radical chieftains have passed over to the Gaullists, Edouard Herriot, true to character, has refused to yield. In such a democratic regrouping the Socialists of the C. G. T. can play a capital role. We must not forget that Léon Jouhaux, who will be back in Paris by early November, was the moving spirit behind the first popular front of 1935.

Who's a Warmonger?

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, October 26

THERE's a wag out here at Lake Success who, after following the debate in Committee 1 for the past week, has come to his own conclusions about warmongering. There are three kinds of warmongering, he has decided: war-fishmongering—or Billingsgate; war-ironmongering—or armament making; and war-ironcurtainmongering—or the perennial East-versus West propaganda barrage.

And if it comes to a matter of undermining the last remaining ties of friendship between us and our former Eastern allies, the Billingsgate of Dr. Bebler must be counted as more effective than the pious self-righteousness of Mr. Austin. And whereas, with Mr. Spaak gone, there is no one left to match the debating energy of Mr. Vishinsky, the overtones of propaganda are so predominant that they almost completely submerge the more cogent strains of his argument.

A psychiatrist friend of mine after reading one of Vishinsky's longer masterpieces said, "That's the talk of a man who is desperately frightened." And it may be that this determined zeal to jail Mr. Byrnes, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Forrestal, Mr. Harriman, and Mr. Churchill—to name just a few on Mr. Vishinsky's list of public enemies—stems from a deep-rooted conviction that war is being plotted by the world's most powerful, bomb-possessing nation. Other possible explanations are (1) that the Soviets and their friends are snared in their own dialectic and feel that the coexistence of capitalism and communism makes war inevitable and the blame had better be laid on the capitalist side before it starts; (2) that, seeing the imminence of the Marshall Plan, the Soviets are making a last desperate bid for Western Europe. It is also possible that they seriously consider the Marshall Plan itself the first big strategic move in the new war: certainly that is what they are saying in both the Political and the Economic Committee.

Unfortunately for the Soviet case, the very violence and intemperance of its proponents are discrediting it. Delegates are beginning to recall with Hector McNeil that back in October, 1939, Britain and France were accused by Mr. Molotov of fomenting war with Germany and that up to June 22, 1941, the Communists in the United States were calling President Roosevelt a warmonger. Nobody likes warmongers and warmongering. But most people object to the terms being used simply to denote people or nations the Soviets don't happen to like. It is the old question of totalitarian reasoning: the opposition is the enemy; the dissenter is the heretic; the fascist is the warmonger. And the only way to deal with the rascals is to put them behind bars.

In the debate, therefore, we have seen the same clash of political philosophies that has occurred before in a good many United Nations committees. It has occurred in the Human Rights Commission in the discussion of a world Bill of Rights. It has appeared in the subcommittee on the Freedom of the Press. It cropped up last week in connection with a Yugoslav resolution in the Social and Humanitarian Committee. It is the basic issue between the principle of freedom of expression and a belief in the control of opinion for the purpose of eliminating error. (And if the principle of freedom of expression, what with loyalty checks and Hollywood quizzes, is becoming more honored here in the breach than in the observance, this, in a free society, is recognized as a temporary corruption and not an accepted practice.) On this issue the Communist Party of 1947 is as rigid as the Catholic church was at the time of the Inquisition. Dr. Evatt may quote Milton's great lines:

Let truth and falsehood grapple;
Who ever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter

To the Russians this seems decadent nonsense. Mrs. Roosevelt may insist that the remedy for loose war talk lies not in the curtailment of information but in the vast expansion of information: this is tantamount to a toleration of the evil which destroys.

From a theoretical point of view the conflict is so absolute that there seems no way out but for the Assembly to decide in favor of one approach or the other. And with the democratic nations vastly outnumbering the Russian group it is quite apparent that the Soviet motion to make warmongering a crime will be defeated.

Here the United States, angered by the vicious Soviet attacks, would leave the matter. The majority of delegates, however, aware that there is far too much loose talk of war as well as dangerous misrepresentation of national policies, want a resolution against warmongering and in favor of a positive policy of "peacemongering," to use the phrase of the Canadian delegate, Mr. Ilsley. They realize that improved understanding between nations depends upon a more responsible attitude on the part of press and radio—not only in countries where freedom of expression prevails but in those where the media of information are under state control. It is almost certain, therefore, that a substitute resolution embodying some of the principles of the Australian, Canadian, and French amendments will carry.

It is rather odd that it was Mr. Austin, the American delegate, who emphasized that the prevalent war talk was symptomatic rather than causal. "Talk is a symptom," he said; "we must get at the causes, such as distress, despair, hunger, and ill health." He pointed out that the United States was firmly behind the economic activities of the United Nations and was backing the cooperative efforts of the Western European nations to find a way out of their present crisis. Mr. Austin made his speech the day before President Truman announced the special session of Congress. We thus have the interesting spectacle of the nation which is the outstanding exponent of political and economic individualism espousing the theory of the economic determination of political beliefs and indorsing economic planning to eliminate political expressions which would endanger world peace. It is quite possible, then, that implementation of the Marshall Plan may not mean simply the European projection of American capitalism that the Russians fear. Nor will it mean simply the projection of American individualistic democracy that the Americans anticipate. It may become the basis for a social democracy about which neither Russia nor the United States will be particularly happy but which the Western Europeans want. And it may succeed in cutting down both the talk and the danger of war.

The Catholic Church in Medicine

BY PAUL BLANSHARD

MOST Americans would be somewhat startled if they picked up a medical journal and read a table of contents like this:

Episcopal Principles of Therapeutic Abortion, by Bishop Sylvanus Bump, D.D.

Baptist Technique for Removing Gall Bladders, by James McCutcheon, S.T.D.

How a Methodist Nurse Should Behave in a Presbyterian Hospital, by Deaconess Matilda Little, M.A.

Jewish Ideals and the Cæsarian Operation, by Rabbi Marcus Goldberg, Ph.D.

Denominational excursions into the field of practical medicine are almost unknown among Protestants and Jews. But not among Roman Catholics. The homiletic and ecclesiastical journals of the American priesthood abound in articles by theological writers on specific subjects. Here, for example, are the titles of eight articles and discussions recently published in America's two leading magazines for priests, the American Ecclesiastical Review and the Homiletic and Pastoral Review: May Circumcision by a Jewish Rabbi Be Done in a Catholic Hospital? May a Catholic Nurse Summon a Non-Catholic Minister? Sterility Tests and Their Morality; The Use of Contraceptives When the Wife Is Sterile; May a Catholic Doctor Employed by the State Perform Eugenic Sterilization? Irradiation of the Ovaries.

The priests of the church are not only spiritual advisers to the Catholic physician and nurse; they exercise authority over them in many areas of professional life, particularly in those of birth, death, and sexual conduct. They tell the Catholic physician and nurse when life begins in the womb, what the surgeon can and cannot do concerning the destruction of the fetus, and what must be done with the child immediately after birth. In the field of sexual conduct they lay down very definite and detailed instructions not only concerning courtship, marriage, and divorce, but concerning contraception, abortion, masturbation, insemination, sterilization, sodomy, and sexual relations. Celibacy does not embarrass

"I have written these three articles," says Paul Blanshard, "as a challenge to Roman Catholics to examine the social policies of their church's hierarchy. I am convinced that (1) American Catholics are good citizens who (2) are not responsible for the undemocratic policies of their own priests in the fields of medicine and education, and (3) will some day realize that they as Americans must force a change in those policies. Am I right?" The Nation hopes Mr. Blanshard is right, and that is why it offers these challenging articles to its readers. As to the author, Mr. Blanshard attracted nation-wide attention by his exposure of Tammany graft while serving as head of New York City's Department of Investigations and Accounts under Mayor LaGuardia. During the war he was a State Department official assigned to the Caribbean, and he has revealed the misery and unrest of that region in his recent book, "Democracy and Empire in the Caribbean."

the prelates of the church in giving their advice, for they are convinced that virginity is the best preparation for sexual wisdom.

The priests of the church impose upon all Roman Catholics a ritual for the dying and a code of medical etiquette which makes the scene of death in both Catholic and non-Catholic hospitals an effective opportunity for proselytizing. They continue to exercise control over physical details after death by making cremation a mortal sin and by excluding the unbaptized from consecrated ground.

Only one phase of this priestly authority in the area of medical conduct has attracted much attention in this country, and that is the Catholic opposition to birth control. When ten distinguished doctors in Connecticut and Massachusetts were arbitrarily removed from the staffs of Catholic hospitals because they supported the right of physicians to give birth-control advice to their married patients, the dismissals excited widespread interest. (I shall discuss this situation in my next article.)

THE story of Roman Catholic medical policy is important. There are 692 Catholic general hospitals in the United States in which nurses and doctors are subject to the church's medical code. About 3,300,000 patients a year are treated in these hospitals, most of them non-Catholics. In many non-Catholic hospitals there are Catholics among the directors who exercise some veto power over medical policies, and Catholic doctors and nurses who obey the injunctions of their priests. The general public is frequently called on by bishops and other members of the hierarchy to support the church's hospitals as broad-gauge humanitarian institutions. The non-Catholic, therefore, is justified in asking certain questions about Catholic medical policy. The questions do not concern the devotion of the Catholic nursing sisters, or the ethical standards of Catholic physicians, or the principles of Catholic worship. They concern the medical dogmas which priests seek to impose upon American Catholics. I shall touch here upon four of these dogmas.

1. Equality of mother and fetus. When an American woman approaches the ordeal of childbirth, she takes it for granted that her physician will do everything humanly possible to save her life. I am sure that 99 per cent of American husbands would consider themselves murderers if, confronted with the choice between the life of a wife and the life of her unborn child, they chose the life of the child.

The Catholic hierarchy does not indorse this choice, nor can a good Catholic physician leave such a choice to the husband and father. "The life of each is equally sacred," says Pope Pius XI in his encyclical "Casti Connubii," "and no one has the power, not even the public authority, to destroy it."

Probably the best-known and most authoritative work on Catholic morals is the four-volume "Moral and Pastoral Theology" of the Jesuit priest Henry Davis, published by Sheed and Ward under the imprimatur of the Archbishop of Birmingham. Father Davis says (Vol. II, p. 138):

One of the most distressing problems which surgeons have to face is that of saving the lives of both mother and child in difficult cases of parturition. Each has a right to life and neither has a better right than the other. . . . Where induced abortion, abortus provocatus, is the procedure indicated, he [the Catholic doctor] will disregard his textbook and save the mother in some other way, and if there is no other way, he will abandon the case. In the last resort, where nothing whatever can be done to save the mother except abortion, he may not destroy a nascent life directly.

Father Patrick A. Finney in his "Moral Problems in Hospital Practice," reprinted by Herder in 1947 under the imprimatur of the Archbishop of St. Louis, is even more specific. He says (p. 60) in a series of questions and replies:

If it is morally certain that a pregnant mother and her unborn child will both die if the pregnancy is allowed to take its course, but at the same time the attending physician is morally certain that he can save the mother's life by removing the inviable fetus, is it lawful for him to do so?

Answer. No, it is not. Such a removal of the fetus would be direct abortion.

Dr. Austin O'Malley in his "The Ethics of Medical Homicide and Mutilation," published under the imprimatur of the late Cardinal Farley, stated the philosophy behind this principle:

The assertion that an undeveloped fetus in the womb is not as valuable as the mother of a family is beside the question, and in certain vital distinctions it is untrue. Any human life as such, whether in a fetus or an adult, is as valuable as another, inasmuch as no one but God has any authority to destroy it, except when it has lost its right to exist through culpable action. Secondly, the quality of motherhood is an accidental addition to a mother's life, not substantial as is the life itself. This quality of motherhood does not create any juridic imbalance of values which justifies the destruction of the rights inherent in the fetus. That the fetus may not be able to enjoy these rights if the mother dies is, again, an irrelevant consideration. . . . An innocent fetus an hour old may not be directly killed to save the lives of all the mothers in the world.

Is it surprising that younger American Catholic women are reacting against this doctrine with considerable horror? Recently when a young priest in a Massachusetts city ventured to expound the dogma of the equality of mother and fetus to an audience of young Catholic matrons he was so heckled by his infuriated listeners that the meeting was almost broken up.

As for Catholic physicians, they must pay lip service to the doctrine because it comes directly from the Pope, but in practice they use a loophole in the law which has been developed by the Jesuit casuists who control every full-term Catholic medical college in the United States. This loophole permits an indirect killing of a fetus in the process of saving the mother if an operation is necessary to remedy "an acute diseased condition." Not many Catholic physicians are so stupid that they cannot discover "an acute diseased condition." But officially they are still bound by the rigid dictum of the Holy See that therapeutic abortion is always a crime, although the courts of every state in the union recognize its legality when the life of the mother is at stake, and although the vast majority of American doctors consider therapeutic abortion under such circumstances to be a moral obligation.

The hierarchy goes so far as to direct Catholic legislators publicly that they "may not approve" of any measures designed to legalize therapeutic abortion. The words are those of Father Francis J. Connell, associate professor of moral theology at the Catholic University of America, in his "Morals in Politics and Professions," published under the imprimatur of the Archbishop of Baltimore-Washington.

2. The doctrine of the sacred head. Since the primary concern of the church at childbirth is the salvation of the soul, and since the soul of the fetus is equal to the soul of the mother, the head of the fetus as the probable seat of the soul becomes the center of moral attention in the delivery-room. All Catholic nurses and doctors are bound by strict injunction to observe the sacredness of the head of the fetus.

The negative rule is that the head of the fetus must never be operated on directly even to save the life of the mother and even if the head is that of a monster. "If craniotomy is absolutely indicated," says Father Davis (Vol. II, p. 165), "a Catholic doctor must give up the case, but he is not thereby precluded from telling those whom it may concern that other medical advice must be got, or rather may be got." Father Davis does not explain what a mother in childbirth should do when she is abandoned by a Catholic physician and no other physician is available.

The affirmative rules concerning the sacredness of the fetal head are chiefly concerned with baptism. Sister Mary Berenice Beck in her "The Nurse: Handmaid of the Divine Physician" (Lippincott, imprimatur of the Archbishop of St. Louis), directs Catholic nurses to reach the head of the fetus with the sacred water of baptism at the first possible instant in order to make sure that the soul is saved before death comes. In cases of difficult delivery the nurse is urged not to wait for actual birth. "If the head protrudes," says Sister Beck (p. 48), "it may be baptized absolutely." If the head does not protrude, the nurse may baptize what she sees, and later baptize the head conditionally to cover the contingency that she might not have reached the head the first time.

Every Catholic nurse "has a serious obligation, obliging her under pain of sin, to baptize an infant in danger of death, whether of Catholic or non-Catholic parents." This is because the fetus is not innocent but is tainted with original sin.

The water must be applied to the head [says Sister Beck]. If water is not available, baptism cannot be administered. Not much water is needed, but there must be enough so that it can be said to flow. . . . Milk, juice of fruits, oil, excretions from the body as tears, saliva, perspiration, etc., are not considered water. . . . Unbaptized infants who die are deprived forever of the sight of God (that is, are barred from heaven); hence it is important that every effort be made to baptize infants in danger of death.

The deep concern of the church for the transmission of divine grace via the head of the fetus extends even to monstrosities. Sister Beck says:

If there are two or more heads and one body, baptize one head absolutely, the others conditionally. If there are two chests but only one head, baptize the head absolutely and each of the chests conditionally.

3. The doctrine of protection against heresy. Included in the Catholic code for nurses are provisions for protecting patients against heresy. Catholic nurses are instructed not to accord Protestant or Jewish clergymen equal treatment with Catholic priests even when the hospital is a non-Catholic institution and the patient is a Protestant or Jew. One of the official purveyors of this doctrine is the leading Catholic proselytist in America, Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen. Charles McFadden's "Medical Ethics for Nurses" (Davis, imprimatur of Cardinal Dougherty), for which Monsignor Sheen wrote a foreword, says (p. 333):

The request of a non-Catholic patient for a minister of his own religion presents some minor difficulties.

The Catholic nurse realizes that there is only one true church of Christ, and she firmly believes that the Roman Catholic church is that church. She cannot therefore regard any other church either as the church of Christ or as the true religion in its entirety. For these reasons she may neither encourage nor assist any person in the practice of what she is convinced is a false religion.

The Catholic nurse, therefore, may not summon the official of any other religion for the express purpose of having him minister to members of his church. To do so would be a direct encouragement and aid to another in the practice of a religion which she believes to be false.

The Sheen-McFadden gospel is not one of reciprocity. Catholic nurses are instructed (p. 203) to baptize dying non-Catholic infants stealthily if it cannot be done openly, thus bringing them within the blessed fold of the church:

If a certain medicine were absolutely needed to save the physical life of a child, a doctor or nurse would give it, even though the parents were unwilling. The attitude of such parents would be unreasonable. . . . When the unreasonable attitude of the parents is evident, the nurse should quietly baptize the dying child without knowledge of the parents.

4. The doctrine of ectopic pregnancy. The knottiest obstetrical problem worrying American priests in recent years is that of ectopic pregnancy, and in the ecclesiastical journals they discuss it with solemn ferocity. One of the main reasons for the anxiety is a sweeping decision by the Holy See in 1902.

An ectopic fetus—that is, one conceived outside the womb, in the fallopian tubes—if allowed to continue its natural growth, is likely to kill both the mother and itself. Even if it is removed by an operation in the later stages, the mother's life is always endangered and the child is frequently deformed. Usually the fetus dies before or shortly after "birth." The one way to guarantee the survival of the mother is the surgical removal of the fetus as soon as the abnormal condition is discovered.

In view of the papal ban on all therapeutic abortion American priests have asked: Should the life of the mother be sacrificed in such cases to permit a problematical survival of an abnormal fetus for a few hours? Until last year the weight of Catholic authority favored sacrificing the mother. Father Finney in his "Moral Problems in Hospital Practice" (p. 135) says:

Question 35: In a case of ectopic pregnancy which has been diagnosed as a case of unruptured tubal pregnancy is it lawful, before the term of viability, to remove the unruptured tube with the living fetus as a means of forestalling the danger to the mother's life upon the rupture of the tube?

Answer. No, it is not lawful. Such a removal is a direct killing of the fetus and is therefore forbidden.

The Congregation of the Holy Office gave essentially the same answer on March 5, 1902. But, for once, American and British Catholics have rebelled. Perhaps some of them dared to ask themselves what an American jury might think about the problem. When the life of a Catholic mother is sacrificed for the life of a normal fetus, a jury might accept the priestly mathematics involved as religion, but it might use an uglier word if the life of the mother was sacrificed in a case of ectopic pregnancy for a hypothetical one-one-hundredth of a normal life-prospect. No clear-cut case of such a death has ever come before an American jury, and it never will now, for the Jesuits have begun a strategic retreat from an untenable moral position. They are "reinterpreting" the papal doctrine to fit the American conscience.

Father Davis, in his above-mentioned book, did not venture to defy the Holy See openly on this policy, but he published the written opinions of scores of Catholic physicians to the effect that "tubal pregnancy is not only a pathological condition but is far more dangerous than cancer of the uterus." American priests began to quote this opinion cautiously, and finally the Homiletic and Pastoral Review of October, 1945, in answer to a question about ectopic pregnancy made the flat admission:

Medical men today are quite commonly agreed that tubal pregnancy constitutes a pathological condition and is as much a threat to the mother's health as a cancerous uterus. The theologians of the past century who held that it was gravely sinful to remove an unruptured tube containing a living fetus, because such a procedure is direct killing, were right in their principle but wrong in their facts. . . . It is not direct but indirect killing.

Even the Sheen-McFadden book gave its blessing to this "interpretation," and thus far no excommunications have taken place. Some ecclesiastical scholars will undoubtedly discover by special research in the near future that the edict of 1902 was never intended to prevent the surgical removal of an ectopic fetus. Meanwhile, the admiration of the observer for the hierarchy's skill in adjusting itself to a changing world is modified by one disturbing question: How many Catholic women died between 1902 and 1945 while their priests were "right in their principle but wrong in their facts"?

This whole story of ectopic clericalism illustrates the hierarchy's technique of medical control. When an American Catholic wants to know what is morally permissible in the field of medicine he gets his bishop to forward a question to Rome to the Congregation of the Holy Office, a committee of cardinals and their celibate associates, headed by the Pope. The Catholic people of the United States have nothing to say about the membership of this committee or its policies. It is chosen and guided entirely from above, and of course it never includes a woman or an American doctor. Yet its decisions are binding on pain of excommunication on every Catholic doctor and nurse in the United States.

[The second article of this series, to appear next week, will discuss the position of the Roman Catholic church on birth control, marriage, and divorce.]

Korean Diary

BY HUGH DEANE

Seoul, Korea, September 25

ON JULY 19 Lyuh Woon-hyung, the most respected liberal leader of South Korea, was shot down on the streets of Seoul. Writing of his murder—and his long struggle for Korean independence—in The Nation of September 6, I said that perhaps like Sun Yat-sen he had died at the right time: he was "temperamentally a moderate, and it was hard for him to see his friends going to the right or the left." Since his death the division within the people has sharpened, and the repression of the left has become even more severe. The terrorism practiced by the rightist police, with the support of the American occupation, is clearly revealed by a chronological summary of the events of the last two months.

HUGH DEANE is Far Eastern correspondent for the Allied Labor News.

July 24: Cho Pyung-ok, head of the South Korean police and member of the Hankook Democratic Party, controlled by the notorious Syngman Rhee, told a group of visiting American editors, "It is a bitter fact that a group of political and social organizations in South Korea, inspired by the north . . . are executing a plot to destroy what the South Korean Interim Government is trying to build up. . . . It would be contrary to common sense to treat them on an equal basis with the other group, which is patriotic and pro-American."

July 25: Terrorists attacked a meeting of 1,200 Seoul Electric Company workers as it was dispersing and seriously wounded three. Police arrived and carried off seven truckloads of the workers. They had voted to attend the People's Front rally and had demanded reinstatement of 375 workers fired after the March general strike.

The New York Times reported, "The North Korea radio has been demanding 'physical attacks' upon Kim Koo and Dr. Syngman Rhee, rightist leaders, in retaliation."

tion for the assassination of Lyuh Woon-hyung." This report was based on a curious mistranslation by official United States monitors. According to South Korean newspapers, the broadcast had urged that the reactionaries be dealt a "fatal blow."

July 26: United States G-2 began to release reports of violence, actual or threatened. By August 14 it had reported some thirty instances, in half of which leftists were held responsible. Considering the bias of both the carefully screened G-2 personnel and the Korean police, their major source of information, this proportion is remarkable. Among the incidents noted were these:

About thirty members from both the rightist Kwangbok Young Men's Association and the General Youth League for Rapid Realization [or Acceleration—H. D.] of Korean Independence attacked the Kwangju Normal School dormitory last week and beat two teachers and one student. Students . . . have since formed a "Self-Defense Body."

A group of rightist terrorists who are alleged to be from the Northwest Korean Youth Association recently invaded an art exhibit which was under the sponsorship of the Taejon leftist Artists' Alliance. The vandals tore down and destroyed all the paintings. None . . . were apprehended.

July 27: Fifty thousand people carrying banners of the People's Front climbed South Mountain to celebrate the reconvening of the U. S.—U. S. S. R. Joint Commission. This was destined to be the last authorized political assembly of the left. Major General A. E. Brown and Colonel General T. F. Shtikov, chiefs of the American and Soviet delegations to the commission, addressed the gathering. General Brown explained that the American "concept of democracy" and the "right of the individual" forbade the exclusion of "certain large rightist parties" from consultation. A Korean speaker who followed him said: "General Brown spoke of individual rights. But do we have such rights in South Korea today? In South Korea there is brutal terrorism and oppression of the people." This man was arrested by police as he stepped from the rostrum, before the eyes of the Soviet general. General Brown had left when it started to rain.

The meeting broke up in a monsoon downpour. As the crowd thinned out, terrorists waylaid them in the alleys and beat them up, saying, "You have been to South Mountain. We know because you are soaking wet."

July 27 to August 1: The workers paid the penalty for daring to go to South Mountain. About 350 girl workers had managed to get out of the Kyungbong textile factory (run by Kim Sung-soo, chairman of Rhee's Hankook Democratic Party) to go to the meeting before the police locked the gate. When they came back, the management fired nine ringleaders. Eight hundred girls then threatened to strike if the nine were not taken back. The management called in a hundred or more terrorists from the Great Korea Federation of Labor—supreme adviser, Syngman Rhee—and let them invade the girls' dormitory; fifty-four girls were injured, four severely.

At the Seoul Electric Company thirty-two men and seven women were loaded into a truck and taken to Won Hyun Palace, headquarters of Rhee's General Youth League for Korean Independence, where they were beaten. When workers at the plant gathered in protest, the police dispersed them and arrested six, charging that they planned to "sabotage the transformer." The beaten workers were afterward fired, along with eleven others.

July 28: A G-2 report described how other People's Front meetings had been broken up:

In Yonan . . . the police chief announced that he had arrested forty-two students attempting to organize a left-wing meeting. In Paekchon . . . police announced the arrest of forty students for attempting to organize a leftist meeting. In Kangning no meeting occurred, possibly because of the presence in jail of 200 left-wing leaders. In Chochiwon . . . an orderly pro-commission meeting was held by 700 Communists. In Ochwon . . . police broke up an unauthorized meeting of 5,000 leftists. . . . A group of 3,000 refused to disperse. Police broke it up, killing five and making several arrests.

Colonel J. N. Robinson, assistant chief of staff for G-2, told me that since April terrorism had increased steadily from one or two incidents weekly to three or four daily. In his opinion the left had formerly been primarily responsible, but since spring the rightists had been most often guilty. He said that the leftists were now on "good behavior." In a discussion of G-2 reports on Communist threats to use violence against Americans, Colonel Robinson said that up to that time not a single American soldier had been attacked for political reasons.

August 2: Hong Jeung-sik, general secretary of the People's Front, and two other People's Front leaders were summoned to police headquarters for a conference and jailed. Three days later the police announced that they were charged with violation of General MacArthur's Proclamation 2, issued September 7, 1945, which declares that any person who "does any act calculated to disturb public peace and order . . . shall upon conviction . . . suffer death or . . . other punishment." One of the men arrested was alleged to have "misinformed" the public in a magazine article.

August 5: The police announced the discovery of a Communist plot in the Seoul radio station. Fourteen employees had been arrested and the informer was in protective custody. On August 12 James W. Browitt, American adviser to the station, told me that the Communists had had a three-point program—working propaganda into the programs, spying on American personnel, and causing mechanical breakdowns during rightist broadcasts. A police official charged that the reds planned to blow up the station, "if worse came to worst."

August 6: Rhee's Society for Acceleration of Korean Independence congratulated the police for efficient "maintenance of law and order."

August 11 to 15: Large-scale arrests throughout South Korea, coupled with intensified terrorism, drove the left underground. The Americans had in effect given the police a blank check in conferences of high officials. One American official said later, "G-2 did not know how far the police would go and frantically tried to find out what was going on. But the line was to back the police whatever they did."

All offices of leftist political parties, trade unions, the farmers' union, and similar groups were raided and closed by the police. Roughly 2,000 arrests were made; about half were released within a few days. A few arrests were also made by the American Counter-Intelligence Corps.

Most of those arrested were leaders or staff workers of the twenty-four parties and groups affiliated with the People's Front. A great number of key leftists escaped, however, thanks to long-standing precautionary measures. Many liberal teachers, writers, artists, newspapermen, and lawyers were rounded up, among them the co-chairman and general secretary of the Civil Liberties Union; Shin Nam-chul, former professor of philosophy at Seoul University; Che Chong-wan, mathematician; Pak Choon-yung, principal of Hansung Middle School; An Yong-il, theatrical producer; and Yu Chin-oh, a poet who had just completed a year in prison for reading a subversive poem at a mass-meeting.

During this period right-wing terrorists in Seoul and elsewhere searched homes, beat up leftists and suspected leftists, confined and tortured selected individuals in private prisons, and raided leftist offices and newspaper plants. On the fourteenth a group of leftist newspapermen were arrested as they left a Soviet press conference. By the fifteenth about half the leftist press had suspended publication. On August 13 Kim Kok-tong, member of the central committee of the centrist Socialist Democratic Party, was kidnapped. His body was found in the gutter on the fourteenth.

After August 15 arrests continued on a lesser scale; terrorism subsided to the high level which had prevailed before the eleventh. By the nineteenth several leftist papers were able to resume publication.

August 12: The South Korean Interim Assembly was urged by the late Major General A. L. Lerch, military governor, to pass the pending election law "as soon as possible," even if it had to disregard the criticisms of the draft law made previously by Brigadier General C. G. Helmick, then acting military governor. The assembly quickly passed the law, disregarding all but one of Helmick's criticisms.

August 13: The legislative assembly received a request from General Helmick that Ordinance 88, pertaining to the press, be amended to provide for cancellation of licenses of newspapers publishing reports which were false or calculated to agitate the people. (In fact, two leftist newspapers in Pusan had just been suppressed on such grounds.)

August 15: The second anniversary of Korea's liberation was officially celebrated at Seoul Stadium. Rightist youth-corps members booed and jeered both General Shtikov and Civil Administrator Ahn Chai-hong, moderate rightist and associate of Kim Kiu-sic.

August 20: Cho Pyung-ok, the police chief, told me a plot involving the entire People's Front had been discovered, directed from North Korea. "Of course we can prove little connection with North Korea; naturally they keep these things secret." He cited various acts of leftist terrorism: seventy-eight policemen in all had been killed, 60 in the Taegu riots of last October, and 494 rifles had been stolen.

August 22: After a statement by the Soviet delegation had protested against the large number of arrests in the previous fortnight General Hodge explained them to the foreign press. The disclosure of the plot to "blow up" the Seoul radio station, he said, had led to the uncovering of a broader conspiracy "of a revolutionary nature." Only that day a police raid had unearthed a cache of weapons. (As far as I could learn, the only weapons found that day were dug up in the backyard of a house belonging to a member of the centrist Socialist Democratic Party. They were Japanese weapons, deteriorated to the point of uselessness, and had apparently been there a long time. According to the Socialist Democratic Party, they were discovered some time ago by a woman digging in the garden. A servant had told the police about them.)

The Communists, General Hodge declared, were instigating riots and interfering in the grain collections "to cause starvation and so create unrest." He expressed surprise that the Soviet Union should protest, since these activities "were directed from North Korea."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Grapes Without Wrath

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Westfield, New York, October 22

A LARGE sign at the entrance to this trim, attractive little town near the shores of Lake Erie tells the traveler he has arrived at the "Grape Juice Capital of the World." The boast is supported by the location here of three plants devoted to the manufacture of this beverage and the headquarters of the Welch Grape Juice Company, the pioneer in this field, which it still dominates. Moreover, Westfield is the geographical center of a grape-growing belt stretching from near Buffalo into eastern Ohio. A favorable combination of soil and climate has made the narrow coastal plain between Lake Erie and Chautauqua Hills one of the best and most extensive vineyard areas in the United States.

A few wine grapes are raised, but the district is, or was, a stronghold of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. When grapes became a leading crop here in the last half of the nineteenth century, its influence helped to persuade growers to concentrate on the Concord variety, from which the best unfermented juice is made. This attracted to Westfield in 1896 Dr. Thomas Bramwell Welch, a fanatical dry, who started his business with the object of providing a non-alcoholic substitute for communion wine.

Today Dr. Paul Welch, a member of the family, is chairman of the Welch Grape Juice Company, but a large majority of the shares were acquired a few years ago by J. M. Kaplan, a New York City business man. Under his guidance, and with new capital he has provided, the company's three plants in this area, as well as four others in Michigan, Arkansas, and Missouri, have been enlarged and modernized. Simultaneously, the management has contracted an alliance with a large local grape-growers' cooperative—an experiment which deserves attention as an attempt to place relations between farmers and food processors on a more stable and friendly basis.

More often than not those relations are strained by the inability of the two sides to see eye to eye on the question of fair prices. Most fruit and vegetable crops that are canned, bottled, or preserved are harvested in a short season and must be disposed of immediately if they are not to spoil. Farmers believe, sometimes with reason, that processors take advantage of this situation to secure undue profits by buying cheap and selling dear. Processors retort that theirs is a risky business: they must lay out cash for raw material at harvest time and recoup it gradually over the following twelve months. If they misjudge demand for the finished product, or if market conditions worsen during that period, they may be broken by inventory losses.

THE Welch plan, which was put into effect in the summer of 1945, seeks to reconcile these opposing points of view by spreading the risks and sharing the profits. The arrangement is as complicated as it is unique. Three master agreements have been signed by the Welch Company and the National Grape Cooperative Association, which now has nearly two thousand members in the Erie belt, mostly owners of small and medium-sized properties. In addition to grapes they cover tomatoes and other fruits grown by members.

The first agreement provides for the lease by the company to the association of its four plants in the area (one is used only as a warehouse and receiving center) for a period of twenty-one years; the second, for the employment of Welch's by the association to manage and operate these plants for the same period; the third, for the appointment of the company as sole distributor of the association's products. The association pays as rent a sum equal to 3 per cent of the net sales price of all products processed. It further agrees to produce fruits and vegetables in sufficient volume to enable the plants to operate as nearly as practicable at full capacity, to pay all taxes and similar charges, and to maintain the plants in good repair. The company, for its part, undertakes to advance such funds as the tenant needs to fulfil these conditions.

The management agreement gives the company full authority to operate the plants, to determine the kind and amount of production, and to decide what expenditures are necessary for maintenance. Finally, as sales agent, Welch's agrees to use its best efforts to create demand for the association's products, including use of the widely advertised Welch label to the fullest advantageous extent. In turn the association undertakes to produce only the kinds, qualities, and quantities of goods approved by the agent. From the proceeds received the agent is entitled to deduct all selling and other distribution costs, all excise taxes, a ratable share of overhead expenses, and a commission of 7 per cent of net sales (defined as aggregate invoice price with deductions only for returns, damage allowances, and lawful discounts). As a safeguard against unduly inflated sales, the agent agrees that the total of deductible items is not to exceed 27 per cent of net sales.

To sum up: the association, in effect, pays 10 per cent of the proceeds ultimately derived from the grapes and other products of its members, who contract to sell their entire crop through the association, to secure the use of Welch's capital, management skill, and label. It receives, for distribution to its members, 90 per cent, less manufacturing and selling costs.

THE plan, it is claimed, offers substantial advantages to both parties. As the company advances only part of the cost of raw material, spreading the balance of payments over the year as the finished products are sold, it is able to finance a larger turnover without a proportionate increase in liquid capital. At the same time its risks are reduced because inventory can be valued on the basis of the first partial payment made to the growers. Finally it is assured of the tonnage needed to keep its plants operating efficiently. The growers, for their part, share the risks of market changes but in return get a certain market for all they produce, the benefit of the company's selling organization, and a share of the profits.

So far the arrangement seems to have worked out to the satisfaction of both sides. For their 1945 crop the growers received advances of $127 a ton and a final dividend of $13; for the 1946 one, $135 and $27.50. When they compare such returns with an average price of $40 paid in 1940, growers feel they are doing well. For the crop now being picked $75 a ton is being paid on delivery—a sum agreed on between the directors of the association and the Welch management. While this is less than in either of the two previous years—a reflection of uncertainty about market conditions in 1948—none of the growers I have talked to had any complaints to make. They seemed fairly confident that later payments would bring total returns to a much higher figure. Meanwhile the advance more than covers growing costs estimated to range between $35 and $60 a ton.

Of course, the recent happy experiences of the grape-growers cannot be ascribed wholly to cooperation à la Welch. This venture was launched at a moment when prices were generally rising and when the demand for semi-luxuries like grape juice was particularly good. Processors striving to keep up with this demand were competing for tonnage and providing for the growers the kind of sellers' market that is every farmer's dream. These conditions continue, but they are unlikely to last forever, and we have yet to see how this capitalist-cooperative alliance will hold together in a period of declining prices. However, when I put this point to Hall Clothier, president of the association, as he worked in his vineyard, he replied, "Then the cooperative will be more necessary and more valuable to us than it is now."

The growers' optimism seems to be based in part on the strong impression made upon them by Mr. Kaplan's personality. A man who combines boundless energy and great resourcefulness with a progressive business outlook, he believes that the effects of a possible general recession can be offset by broadening the market. His aim is to lower unit profits on a larger volume so that grape juice can be priced more competitively in relation to other fruit juices. The agreement with the growers designed to secure a greater and more dependable tonnage is one means to this end; another is reduction of processing costs by the use of more efficient labor-saving equipment. Thus in the past two years the company has installed in its various plants forty-four huge stainless-steel tanks to take the place of the thousands of five-gallon glass containers in which the juice used to be stored until it was bottled. These tanks save an enormous amount of handling and have many other advantages.

Such policies are beginning to show results for consumers as well as producers. At a time when prices generally are riding a non-stop elevator Welch's has announced a reduction in the prices of its grape juice and preserves. For instance, it is now listing a case of twelve quart bottles at $4.50, down 60 cents from 1946, and only 12½ per cent more than the price in 1940, when raw material, labor, and other costs were much lower. Here is a record which challenges a good many other processors of farm products.

THE National Grape Cooperative Association is the largest growers' organization in the Erie belt but not the only one or the oldest. There are, in fact, three completely independent producers' cooperatives operating their own plants. Some members of the National told me that they expected these groups would ultimately join them. However, when I talked to T. R. Skinner, manager of the Westfield Planters' Cooperative Fruit Products, he told me that although they had received a number of feelers in this direction, his members were not interested.

Mr. Skinner assured me that the Welch plan had not attracted away supporters of his cooperative or served to reduce its tonnage. In fact, he said, there is a waiting list of candidates for membership, for the 125 growers who own Planters are able to supply all the grapes the factory can handle. This cooperative last year paid out $150 a ton, which is rather less than National Grape's distribution. However, a surplus of $42 a ton was held back in a revolving fund to provide working capital. As the fund is replenished from the proceeds of future packs, all or part of this sum will be released and distributed to members. The balance sheet of Planters certainly shows solidity. Started in 1935 with a capital of $45,000, it now owns plant and equipment valued at $277,983, after depreciation, and total assets exceeding $1,000,000.

Some at least of the independent cooperators in the belt are decidedly suspicious of the National Grape set-up. They regard it as a very fancy façade behind which Welch exercises the real power and carries on very much as before. The association, they point out, nominally hires the company to process and sell its products, but in fact its directors have no voice in deciding operating or selling policies. All the same, these critics concede, the plan may work out satisfactorily as long as the independent cooperatives can provide competition and a yardstick. But should the independents falter and agree to join the Welch family, the company would achieve something like a monopoly and the growers would be at its mercy.

This seems to me a reasonable position to take, even though I have been very well impressed by the good intentions and good faith of the present Welch executives. For twenty-one years is a long time, and continuity of management policies cannot be guaranteed. On the other hand, there is no evidence, at present, that the company needs or aims at a monopoly. Under the influence of good prices grape culture in the belt is recovering from the low it reached a few years ago. Old vineyards are being improved by increased use of fertilizer and more spraying; new vineyards are being planted. Thus it should be possible in any good crop year for both the Welch Company and its cooperative competitors to obtain the tonnage they need for efficient operation.

More threatened, perhaps, are the smaller private packers, but some of them at least seem to have seen a red light and are now introducing profit-sharing schemes of their own. Nor is the influence of the Welch plan likely to be confined to this district. Its principles are being applied by the company in its operations in other parts of the country, where its rivals may also be expected to sit up and take notice.

There is at least a chance, it seems to me, that the spread of this profit-sharing technique will help to bring stability to a notoriously unstable branch of industry. Growers and processors of innumerable foods have a community of interest which they have often forgotten in a search for the fleeting profits of scarcity. The first needs an assured market for his whole crop, the second a dependable supply so that he may secure the benefits of continuous capacity operation. A profit-sharing alliance is a good way to secure these objectives, provided both sides remember they have a silent but influential partner—the consumer.

Next week I. F. Stone will make a full report in The Nation on the Un-American Committee's all-star fiasco in Washington.

In the Wind

OPEN THE MAIL," said the Wind. "Okay," said the Candle. "This is from Chicago: 'Gentlemen: Both the Candle and the Wind should flutter at the knowledge that pages from The Nation bearing stories of starvation in Europe, race riots in the United States, trouble in the United Nations, and other minor diversions, have been selected as an appropriately sporty background for a couple of show-windows of ties in the Store for Men of Marshall Field and Company here. The sales talk that goes with the ties and The Nation reads, 'Lines, lines, lines . . . crisp, clear-cut, and well-defined.'"

"THIS," SAID THE WIND, "is from Japan—from Hugh Deane. See page 469: 'The censors here have prohibited publication of the second half of Edgar Snow's 'Battle for Asia,' and the publishers have melted down the plates. The first half was published some time ago. 'Red Star Over China' also cannot be published; it has been held up seven months. Such parts of Snow's books as have been published have been instant best-sellers.'"

"AND MELVILLE CANE, of New York, has sent us the following chef d'oeuvre," replied the Candle, extraneously:

How much Hartley,
How much Taft
Figured in the final draft?
Fifty-fifty? Mostly? Partly?
Who worked smartly?
Taft or Hartley?
Who was helmsman of the craft?
Who was fore and who was aft?

"BRAVO!" CRIED THE WIND. "Do you think that 'it may be necessary to listen to cries of fascism in order to get rid of the termite Communists who use racial equality . . . to destroy the foundations of the Republic'?"

"Not quite," answered the Candle. "Who does?"

"Bank Trends, a news-column release from Washington News Features, U. V. Wilcox, editor."

"Oh," said the Candle. "Well, I have heard of an easier way to avert 'communistic and socialistic trends.' Clive W. Haas of Big Timber, Montana, vice-president of the Rocky Mountain Telephone Association, says it can and must be done by expanding telephone facilities in rural areas."

"I'M SURE HE'S RIGHT," said the Wind. "Almost as right as Millard C. Faught of the Small Business Economic Foundation, who wants everybody to know that 'as things stand, we as a nation have the last free-enterprise team on the field. It's ninth inning, bases loaded, and two out. If we fan out now, the whole Free Enterprise League gets disbanded for good. What a time to hit one over the fence!'"

"HERE'S A FINAL NOTE of good cheer, and then let's get out of here," said the Wind. "Up in Halifax, Nova Scotia, Charles Stewart, chief steward of Lightship No. 5, was jailed for a day for 'wilful insubordination.' Steward Stewart attempted to force Captain Louis Duquet 'to accept ham and eggs for breakfast when the skipper ordered steak'"

The Fight for "P. R."

BY GEORGE H. HALLETT, JR.

WHAT was slated to be an off-year election in New York City has turned out to be quite a lively surprise. With no officers to be voted for except a few judges, two district attorneys, and legislators to fill half a dozen local vacancies, more people have wanted to vote than in the mayoralty election of 1945.

Explanations differ, but all are agreed that the most important issue is the abolition or retention of proportional representation, familiarly known as "P. R." This method has been used in the last five municipal elections for the selection of city councilmen. It is being attacked with hysterical vigor by the regular organizations of both major parties and as vehemently defended by an array of minor-party, civic, labor, and veteran groups ranging all the way from the Commerce and Industry Association to the Communist Party.

A similar battle is raging in Cincinnati, where the controlling but chastened Republican organization is trying to get rid of a strong good-government opposition in the city council by abolishing P. R. The little New York seashore suburb of Long Beach has a miniature version of New York's battle, with both major party organizations trying to repeal P. R. against a stout civic and labor defense; and Boulder, Colorado, which has used P. R. for thirty years, is voting on a repeal question for the third time. On the same day five Massachusetts cities—Worcester, Pittsfield, Fitchburg, Medford, and Revere—are voting on petition proposals for the adoption of P. R. along with the city-manager plan of government, and eight cities in other states are holding P. R. elections for members of their city councils.

A new struggle for political rights comparable to the woman-suffrage movement seems to be well under way. Proportional representation is already accepted in principle in many of the most civilized countries and has gone far enough here to be recognized as a major threat by old-style politicians throughout the nation.

The more usual methods of electing representatives in this country give all the representation in each district, or at large, to the most numerous organized group. When the strength of the largest party is spread evenly over the entire area, it may win all or nearly all the seats even under the district system, as when the Republicans completely monopolized the city council of Philadelphia for more than twenty years and when the Democrats elected sixty-four aldermen out of sixty-five in 1931 in New York City. If this situation becomes established, competition dwindles, the inner circle of the dominant group feels free to nominate docile henchmen, and popular elections are a mere form without substance.

Proportional representation attacks the evil at its roots. It accepts the principle stated by the eminent Swiss publicist Ernest Naville as long ago as 1865, that "in a democratic government the right of decision belongs to the majority, but the right of representation belongs to all." As its name implies, it gives representation to every substantial group of like-minded voters in approximate proportion to the group's voting strength.

The form of P. R. used in this country, Canada, Australia, and Ireland—where it has been used for national as well as local elections since 1920—is based on a preferential ballot which permits the voter to express his order of choice among the candidates, or as many of them as he wishes to mark. No primaries are needed; candidates are nominated by petition. Several members are elected together, either at large as in Cincinnati or in a large district as in the New York City boroughs.

A minority quota, either fixed as a definite number of votes (75,000 in New York) or calculated each time as a definite fraction of the total, is taken as the basis of election. Any group of voters large enough to poll this quota is sure of representation. A larger group may fill up more than one quota and elect proportionately more members, but each particular voter helps to elect only one—the first of his choices who turns out to have a chance of election with his help. The lowest candidates are dropped one by one, and as each one goes out, the ballots which have been counted for him are transferred to the credit of the next choice of the particular voter among the candidates still in the running.

Under this plan there is no longer a possibility of a political monopoly. The present New York City Council consists of twelve Democrats, five Republicans, two Liberals, two American Laborites, and two Communists. Even the Democrats and Republicans on the council are a free choice of the voters instead of hand-picked selections of district leaders. The council is a real deliberative body, very different from the rubber-stamp Tammany Board of Aldermen which preceded it, and it has dealt constructively with many vital local problems.

But the major party strategists are unhappy about P. R. because it has curtailed their powers. Though they have not been above making frequent deals with radicals for their own purposes in district elections, they are seizing on the presence of the two Communists in the council as the excuse for a hysterical appeal to throw out P. R. The ruse may or may not work. The choice is between a Tammany dictatorship and good, representative government.

Del Vayo—Vambery of Hungary

THE corridors at Lake Success have been enlivened lately by the presence of a man whose conversations bring a note of high spirits and humor to those usually cheerless surroundings. Though he represents an unpopular cause, delegates who have known him for a long time have no fear of compromising their reputations by being seen in his company. His name is Rustem Vambery, and his immediate mission is to obtain Hungary's admission into the United Nations. I sometimes wonder whether his own government realizes how fortunate it is to have Professor Vambery as Minister to Washington and champion of its cause before the international organization.

The Hungarian envoy is too well versed in world affairs to underestimate the value of old-fashioned diplomacy, but he enjoys the liberty provided by the new diplomacy to speak his mind without restraint. He manages to be a forthright defender of his country's interests without giving up an ounce of independence or critical judgment. His statement to the press the day he presented his credentials to President Truman was perhaps the wittiest and most outspoken recently made by a foreign diplomat.

Vambery does not pretend that Hungary is a model of democracy; he considers it nonsense to talk about "public opinion" after twenty-five years of Admiral Horthy. On the other hand, he believes it is unjust to ignore the achievements of the new Hungarian regime, which in two years has eliminated much of the chaos left by occupation and war.

In December of 1944 a coalition government was set up in Hungary in which Communists predominated. The following November, elections were held in which the generally conservative Smallholders' Party won a smashing victory. Naturally, the results met with the approval of the men who were then laying the groundwork for a Western bloc, and the election was hailed in Washington and London as a model of democratic franchise. However, when the elections held in August of this year produced different results, the United States and Britain denounced them as an outrage to democratic opinion. Actually, neither election was an example of democratic purity. They were simply the kind of elections one must expect in countries where the free play of parties does not exist and never has existed.

When politicians and columnists and radio commentators speak of Eastern Europe, they forget the factor which in the past has been common to most of these countries: the unbridgeable gap between a mass of impoverished, hunger-ridden peasants and an almost medieval privileged class of landed proprietors. Between these two strata an industrial proletariat, the most advanced and revolutionary element, slowly emerged, and, after the liberation, formed the core around which coalition or national-front governments were built. Inevitably, this core was largely Communist, and the governments became minority regimes which for a long time to come will bear little resemblance to Western parliamentary systems.

Foreign reporters forget something else. In the years between the two world wars several attempts were made to plant democratic methods in Eastern Europe, and except in Czechoslovakia they failed miserably. They brought no real improvement in the situation of the masses, nor did they even limit the privileges of a feudal aristocracy that was able to manipulate the new constitutional machinery for its own benefit and continue to rule by caprice.

Progress toward normality and a more democratic atmosphere in all these countries is also impeded by the worsening of relations between the West and the East and the endless talk of war. In the Balkans, as in Germany, reactionaries speculate on the imminence of war and in the measure that they see war draw nearer become bolder in their intrigues. This in turn leads the left minorities in power to be more intolerant and less discriminating in their repression. Another factor working in the same direction is the agitation carried on from abroad against the new regimes. No fewer than fourteen former Hungarian envoys are now in foreign countries working actively against the Budapest government. Several of them, together with fellow-reactionaries from neighboring states, have foregathered in the hospitable atmosphere of Washington.

With six opposition parties represented in the Hungarian parliament, it is difficult to substantiate the charge of a "one-party dictatorship." True, Hungary has a political police. But what is the FBI, pray tell? Its methods are still restrained, by Eastern European standards, but the widening purge in Washington gives a hint of what can be expected if political tension increases.

What is clear, as Ambassador Vambery has emphasized, is that the internal situation in Hungary constitutes no valid basis for refusing it admission to the United Nations. To oppose Hungary's membership on the ground that changes brought about in the last government crisis were not "in accordance with the principles of international law" is completely absurd. Constitutional law might be a criterion, but certainly not international law, which touches in no fashion whatsoever the internal structure of national governments. In any case I am tempted to ask the delegations which opposed Hungary's admission but accepted Yemen, when the last elections took place in the Imam's absolute monarchy.

Even more hypocritical is the argument that if Hungary and certain other countries of Eastern Europe are accepted into the United Nations, admission cannot be refused to Franco. I am sick of this leveling zeal. Not so long ago in Washington, at an off-the-record talk on Spain before an audience composed largely of government employees, I was asked: "Can the speaker establish a difference between the Tito regime and the Franco regime?" "At least one," I answered. "Tito came to power by fighting the Nazis; Franco through the help of the Nazis." If anyone in the U. N. is so firmly convinced that Hungary and Franco Spain are on a par, let him have the honesty, at least, to get up on his feet and dispute with Argentina's Dr. Arce the honor of pleading the fascist dictator's cause.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Jameses

THE JAMES FAMILY: A GROUP BIOGRAPHY. By F. O. Matthiessen. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.75.

THE JAMES FAMILY" is the climax of the many recent works on the subject, superseding, I should say, all but R. B. Perry's infinitely rich "The Thought and Character of William James." It is a marvel of comprehensiveness, a wonderfully full record of a family that peculiarly deserved just such a memorial. The Jameses were not only very conscious but very communicative. They exercised both faculties in a vast correspondence, for they were great travelers. Fortunate as well as talented, they were in a position to know almost all the important figures of their time. But they were never simply reporters: the observation of people and places and the appraisal of books and plays and paintings were always for them a form of confession, a means of identifying themselves in the complex international scene that had replaced the small, sufficient American scene of their childhood. An anxious sense of self, a fateful sense of nationality pursued them almost constantly, charging with a high value whatever they wrote.

"The James Family" is intended as a voluminous document on the minds, and to a lesser extent the lives, of this vivid circle. Mr. Matthiessen includes letters and fragments of autobiography as well as examples of the more formal writings. These materials he arranges in such a way as to show the Jameses in all the variety of what they most prized: their relations—relations to each other, to friends, to famous men, to the United States and Europe, to philosophy, art, politics. And he has interspersed his excerpts with lengthy passages of editorial comment. He has done his job so thoroughly that anyone who, like the present reviewer, has a special interest in the Jameses will read the book in a constant state of pleasurable recognition. One expected such famous items as the elder James's narrative of his conversion to Swedenborg, his brilliant letter to Emerson about the Boston Saturday Club, the letters illustrating the endless family debate over the question of Europe versus America, Henry's account of the curious injury to his back, the children's letters to and about their "sacred old Father" at the time of his death—surely the high point, these latter, of American epistolary writing. But alongside these familiar things one is always encountering items which one had long cherished as personal discoveries.

I will give a single example. Mr. Matthiessen devotes several pages to the varied family response to Turgenev, whose work they began to read some years before Henry James became personally acquainted with him in Paris. William leads off by declaring to Henry in a letter of 1869 that although Turgenev is "solid" and possesses "style," "his mind is morbid"—presumably the Russian is too melancholy for William, who reads novels and will continue to read them largely for inspiration. Shortly thereafter young Henry James publishes in the North American Review a much more subtle statement of a similarly divided view of Turgenev. But in 1874 the elder James addresses to Turgenev a letter of homage which is so attractive a document of the man and the period that I am delighted to find it included in Mr. Matthiessen's book. "You sink your shaft sheer through the world of outward circumstance, and of social convention, and show us ourselves in the fixed grasp of fate, so to speak, or struggling vainly to break the bonds of temperament. Superficial critics revolt at this tragic spectacle, and pronounce you cynical. They mistake the profound spirituality of your method." In short, as Mr. Matthiessen points out, the elder James was quite equal to a pessimism from which William and Henry shrank. His theological system, crazy and atavistic though it was, lifted him above mere gentility, delivered him from the inveterate high-mindedness not only of his age but of his two brilliant sons, even though it may have worked to keep him from anything like their great accomplishments.

But Mr. Matthiessen is extremely impartial toward all members of the family. He fully appreciates the elder James without falling into the absurd ancestor worship which has led certain recent critics to discover the father image everywhere in the work of the sons. Even more important, he is not victimized by his own theme, the family pattern. That pattern, he makes clear, involved as much diversity as uniformity. In one very vital matter, however, I think that Mr. Matthiessen has been over cautious: he avoids any psychological approach to the family. And this is a little peculiar, for the Jameses themselves, as distinguished from, say, the public-minded Adamses, were specialists

IN THE CAMP THERE WAS ONE ALIVE

Flakes pour to the black dead
At Lasen, by the wire.
The child, in his charred cave,
Watches the shaking fire

Struggle to him in torment
Till, stumbling, the shades sink back Into his helplessness; his shaking Limbs shrink to nothing, crack

Under the beams that pin him.
He hears, beneath the hiss
Of snow, a step on snow, the vague
Murmur of many voices.

They have come; and he calls to them
In gladness—It is the dead.
They speak softly, he understands:
Nothing, and inches his head

Back over to them; but he sees
Nothing, he hears nothing. He moans
In his last loneliness—and the voices
Ring in his ears, the stones

Are flung from the hammering feet
Of the dead who cry
The child's name over and over.
He laughs out in joy

And wrenches with all his strength
Against the timbers, cries:
"I'm coming." The voices are fainter,
The footsteps die as he dies.

RANDALL JARRELL

in intimate experience. They had a heritage of psychic crisis as the house of Atreus had a heritage of bloodshed, and they were intensely aware of it. To the implications of so much emotional distress Mr. Matthiessen is very cool. And as a further small instance of his indifference to the inner relations of the family, he fails to include the statement by the youngest son, Robertson, to the effect that as a child he had felt himself a "foundling" in that ostensibly most devoted of family groups; instead Mr. Matthiessen merely pronounces the unfortunate Robertson a case of self-pity. No doubt he was, but in any integral view of the James family Robertson's fate is immensely symptomatic: his extreme sense of estrangement was a measure of what William and Henry had likewise to confront and overcome. In some of the richest pages of "A Small Boy and Others" Henry James confessed to having felt, if not a foundling, at least a very anxious little outsider in the family circle; and the tragedy of exclusion was to figure deeply in his novels. Of all this Mr. Matthiessen makes strangely little in his otherwise admirable volume.

F. W. DUPEE

The Machinery of Society

ADMINISTRATIVE BEHAVIOR. A Study of Decision-Making Processes In Administrative Organization. By Herbert A. Simon. The Macmillan Company. $4.

BOTH the exasperated veteran of bureaucracy and the confused and irritated novice should find solace in this calm and relentless dissection of the operating machinery of society, whether public, local and national, or private, both commercial and voluntary. Professor Simon does not lay down the law. He merely shows what to expect at the present stage of social evolution when citizens have to contend with bureaucracy or are drawn into bureaucracy on an increasing scale. He does not write for everybody. His ambitious attempt to discuss the sociology and the practical science of administration is tailored to the reading habits of the academic man who needs a framework for research and teaching. But that is no reason why the book should not become a best-seller in this age of widespread college education. The inclusion of material from military administration should add to its appeal for our veterans. They probably still need some help in digesting past experience while orienting their academic learning to the practical necessities of a managerial society.

The new generations should welcome the book for two additional reasons, neither of them explicit in it. Professor Simon shows the elements of administration common to business, government, and volunteer organization. He fits in the profit motive. He considers the possible difference in administrative problems and techniques between totalitarian and democratic communities, alleging insufficient knowledge in the first and suggesting adjustments in administrative organization in the second. In the process he demonstrates, however, that much would be gained if, in public affairs, contending parties had the knowledge and the will to distinguish administrative implications of the agenda. In this perspective the book reads like a running commentary on United Nations discussions at Lake Success during the summer and fall of this year. But Professor Simon has clearly not intended to make such possible generalizations more than incidental to his book. If the reader wants to refer back to the book for its value in the broader perspective, he will have to add considerably to the index under the headings of democracy, totalitarianism, private enterprise (profit, commercial, non-profit, reform, and religious organizations), socialization, technology, and even public relations, all topics dealt with in the text. Suitably enlarged in this manner, the index will show the reader that Professor Simon has a perspective on society that points beyond an ideological structure old enough by now to be interred in the history books.

The second reason why this book is valuable to new generations—and to everybody needing encouragement about public affairs—lies in the evidence it provides of a community of people in our midst who are attacking the operating problems of our society in a systematic manner without emotional, ideological, or historical bias. Undoubtedly a pioneering work in the range and logic of its presentation, Professor Simon's book acknowledges a broad debt to public servants, academic teachers, and business men, who are shown in the notes to be helping in the development of a science of administration. Living philosophers are not excluded. Again, however, the index fails the reader. Perhaps it is debatable whether the index should reinforce Professor Simon's acknowledgment of a debt to the Public Administration Review and other periodicals that have recently begun to function as writing laboratories in the field. But John Dewey, who is mentioned many times in the text, is missing in the index, while Freud, who is mentioned only once, is there. BJARNE BRAATØY

Out of the Resistance

A FINE OF 200 FRANCS. By Elsa Triolet. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.75.

HERE are three long short stories ("short novels," the American publishers call them) whose characters move against the backdrop of the German occupation and the Resistance. The first story, "The Lovers of Avignon," follows a detective-story technique, and there is an element of surprise for the reader when he discovers that Juliette, the beautiful stenographer, who up to a certain point in the story has ambulated mysteriously and incomprehensibly through the French countryside, is gathering data for the Resistance. ("I've always been fond of Juliette Noël," Elsa Triolet tells us in one of her charming asides to the reader; "I find her extremely charming and attractive.") And small wonder that Juliette should be in love with one of the leaders of the maquis: "Riding breeches, boots, a blouse without braid, unbuttoned. . . . A large body, whose movements were so abrupt one would expect him to overturn things. But he wasn't like that at all. He had the grace of a horse who takes an obstacle cleanly. The head of an archangel, somber, fallen, with burning, prominent eyes beneath bold eyebrows. . . . The tropical heat in the room seemed to emanate from him." But why go on? Here are Charles Boyer and Ingrid Bergman turned to flesh and blood before our very eyes.

The second story, "Private Life or Alexis Slavsky," in spite of interminable descriptions of Lyon, its houses, furniture, and inhabitants—which are easily skipped—is by far the best in the book; but the effort to connect and interweave the life of the heroine in "Notebooks Buried Under a Peach Tree" with that of the characters of the previous story seems a little forced. She is at any rate a fascinating creature, whom music—as her "Notebooks" tell—"always stirred more deeply than liquor or men" and who "sometimes dressed like an elegant woman, sometimes like a choir boy, with extravagant make-up." She is caught and executed by the Gestapo, having joined the Resistance, that everybody's Purgatory where sins are burned to dross. Lady Brett was never like this, and the Notebooks are dug up from beneath the peach tree by Jean, the One-Man-She-Ever-Really-Loved.

The translator is faithful to the French original and certainly knows French well. He remains shyly anonymous, so only two slight mistakes prove that he hasn't been in France during the past few years: le car is not a train but a motor bus which runs between provincial towns; ne pas desserrer les dents means to shut up, not to utter a word, and not "Henriette clenched her teeth."

Unfortunately, American readers will judge contemporary French writing by this collection of Elsa Triolet's stories; she has written much better ones. The fact that this volume won the Goncourt prize explains the choice of the publishers.

By George Gamov. The Viking Press. $4.75.

PROFESSOR GAMOV, a well-known theoretical physicist, here entertains the lay reader with illuminating discussions relating to numbers, the square root of minus one, space and time, atom smashing, genes, entropy, and almost anything else that comes into his fertile mind. Most of it is entertaining; much of it is understandable; some of it is too deep for the type of reader to whom the author wishes to appeal.

Racial Mores in Brazil

THE BRAZILIANS. By Hernane Tavares de Sá. The John Day Company. $3.

SENHOR TAVERES DE SA offers a warm and convincing image of his country, and the abundant detail he sets down concerning custom and convention adds up to something more than a brilliant travelogue. Having read it, one feels that one has learned how Brazilians make their private and public decisions.

Perhaps the most fascinating section of the book is the one which deals with the color problem. In the main the author follows Gilberto Freire's analysis. What Freire in his recent book did not make clear, however, is that the encouragement of miscegenation has been the conscious policy of Brazilian governments. The Brazilian color problem, it is said, is really one of class. A woman who marries a Negro or an Indian does not sacrifice her "white supremacy," for there is little racialism among the broad masses. But she does accept a lower standard of living and therefore often shrinks from a mixed marriage. In a land with a colonial history where office and good employment have hitherto been reserved for whites and where illiteracy is common, colored labor is ill rewarded. The sexual motives which rule in the United States actually work in reverse, according to the author. The census discloses that many women declare themselves to be colored when they are not, apparently because of the tradition that Negroes are more gratifying sexual partners than white women. So runs the argument. It is not entirely convincing when set out with the brevity imposed upon the author. For example, one notes that Senhor Tavares de Sá admits that the mixing of strains has been largely due to extramarital intercourse. That the government's policy is called "whitening" suggests that the idea of white superiority does exist. Nevertheless, the author's statement of visible fact, that racialism produces no such embittered tension, must be unreservedly accepted.

There is no extensive survey of politics in "The Brazilians," but the author's account of recent events brings into focus all that he writes concerning economic and cultural potentials. Following an extremely sympathetic portrait of the Communist leader Prestes and an admission that the party is a very powerful force, Tavares de Sá says that the army's revolt against Vargas was not due to the fact that he had permitted elections but to his deal with Prestes. Vargas and his machine meant to utilize Prestes and his great popular following. The generals feared that Prestes would outwit the dictator and so prepared their coup, whereupon the Communist leader withdrew his support. Dutra, the victorious candidate, was the representative of the old machine and the generals. The present regime, which naturally rests upon the army, is now suppressing the Communist Party, and the liberals are still without cohesion and without a solid program.

If this is so, what is the future of Brazilian democracy to be? There is a good survey of problems which that democracy must face in this very readable and useful book, but there is no confident answer to the larger problem.

Drama

JOSEPH
KRUTCH

COMMAND DECISION (Fulton Theater) is, I think, quite the best play so far to come out of World War II. Inevitably, therefore, it has been compared with "What Price Glory?" but the two are as different as plays dealing with war in the field could very well be. "What Price Glory?" was a brilliant cartoon intended to shock and getting its effects by bold strokes and crude colors. Its cynicism and its sentimentality were both of the most abandoned sort, and it quite frankly sacrificed everything to theatrical effect. "Command Decision" also has, to be sure, plenty of drama as well as a certain amount of mere theatricality, but essentially it is sober—as much more sober than the Anderson-Stallings melodrama as the prevailing reaction to the war just past is more sober than that of the twenties to World War I. Indeed, if a future historian ever compares the two plays he will probably be able to sense from them alone the real difference between the two post-war epochs. To the authors of "What Price Glory?" the conflict had been a gaudy binge upon which they looked back in the true spirit of a morning after. That, they were saying, was my last and biggest wild oat. It was fun in a way, but we'll never go there any more. "Command Decision," on the other hand, is a picture of a preposterous yet imperative enterprise almost unbelievably grueling and tragic at the same time that it was inescapable. What is the use, it seems to ask, of saying that it must not happen again? We could not prevent it this time, and, God help us, we should quite possibly be unable to prevent its happening again.

The three acts take place in the office of a general in command of an air squadron which operates against Germany. The general is convinced that precision bombing, at the moment on trial, is our only hope. He knows that the tremendous losses he is taking when he sends his bombers out beyond the range of fighter protection are, by the cold calculus of military logic, entirely justifiable. But newspapers and Congressmen count only the cost and prefer relatively safe little sorties which sacrifice little and accomplish nothing. Even the military higher-ups, sensitive to public opinion, will not share his responsibility. He is on his own, and so he must himself make the decision, which is not only to send brave men to their death but also to face the probability that he will be relieved of his command and sacrificed to public opinion in the guise of a butcher.

To its central theme the play keeps, for the most part, with grim insistence. A correspondent wanders in and out; there is an official visit from Congressmen and high brass; there are also a few references to the pleasures of the soldier off duty which played so large a part in "What Price Glory?" But in the main the tone is sober, and few concessions are made to the supposed need for color and comic relief. The author, William Wister Haines, seems to know how a command post actually operated, and he is determined to reveal its workings. Indeed, there are moments when the play almost suggests one of those film "documentaries," like "Target for Tonight," which were quite as much informative as they were dramatic. Hence, though drama is by no means lacking, one gets continuously the feeling that truth to fact is as important to the author as theatrical effect. Somewhat similarly, the play also tends to stick pretty close to its specific problem. It does hardly more than suggest that this specific problem is a typical one, and that to answer it is to answer the general problem raised when we must fight a war in the interests of those values which war in itself completely negates.

Nevertheless, there is, I think, no doubt that the author does unobtrusively suggest just that and no doubt what his attitude is. If the general was right—and the author obviously thinks he was—when he sacrificed his men to an enterprise which, in the long run, would save lives, his decision answers also the larger question. Once war has been accepted, then, for the time being, only the logic of war is valid. We may be fighting it in the interests of antithetical institutions. We may have embarked upon the most inhuman of enterprises because we hope some day to reestablish the security of humanity. But we cannot, even so, make war humane, and we would simply be condemning ourselves to defeat if we tried even to temper it with humanity. In war no considerations are legitimate except those which ask to what extent a sacrifice contributes to victory. The enemy of ruthlessness must himself be ruthless. A monstrous paradox? Of course it is. A dangerous gamble against the chance that the temporary may become the permanent and that the time when we can return to another way of life will never seem to have come? Obviously it is also that. But is there any alternative? The author, so it seems to me, is saying that there is not.

Paul Kelly contributes a grim, restrained, and effective performance in the role of the general, and there is also a very good portrait in a different key created by James Whitmore as the general's sergeant, "Command Decision" probably will and certainly deserves to be a hit, but since the comparison has already been made, candor compels me to admit that it is, nevertheless, unlikely to be remembered as long as "What Price Glory?" That is partly for the simple reason that so vigorous a cartoon figure as Captain Flagg is, however regrettable, more memorable than so sober a portrait as that of the General Dennis in the new play. It is also, perhaps, because we need to be pretty close to the time when World War II was still news in the making to be as interested as "Command Decision" expects us to be in what I have already called a kind of documentary film.

"Under the Counter" (Shubert Theater) is an amiable if not very robust farce with music imported from England. Its chief asset is the low comedienne Cicely Courtneidge, who has a way with her.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

BEN SHAHN'S gift, though indisputable, is rarely effective beyond a surface felicity. What his retrospective show at the Museum of Modern Art (through January 4) makes all too clear is how lacking his art is in density and resonance. These pictures are mere stitchings on the border of the cloth of painting, little flashes of talent that have to be shaded from the glare of high tradition lest they disappear from sight.

Shahn first came to notice as a "socially conscious" painter, working in that routine quasi-expressionist, half-impressionist illustrative manner derived from Cézanne, Vlaminck, and other precubist French artists, examples of which year in and year out fill the halls of the Whitney, Carnegie, and Pepsi-Cola annuals and the showrooms of Associated American Artists (Bohrod, Brook, Blanch, Bouché, Dodd, Pène du Bois, Sterne, etc., etc.). Shahn appears to have been momentarily successful within the very narrow limits of this style: thus in the gouache "Walker Greeted the Mother of Mooney," a real instinct for pictorial unity imposes itself on tawdry color and banal drawing. But his real originality, such as it is, emerges only with the entrance of the influence of photography, a medium he has practiced in addition to painting. It was the monocular photograph, with its sudden telescoping of planes, its abrupt leaps from solid foreground to flat distance, that in the early 1930's gave him the formula which remains responsible for most of the successful pictures he has painted since then: the flat, dark, exact silhouette placed upstage against a receding empty, flat plane that is up-tilted sharply to close the back of the picture and contradict the indication of deep space. Chirico is felt here.

Some striking pictures issue from this formula. They are all in tempera, which lends itself best to Shahn's precise contours and extremely simple color sense; among them are the "Handball" of 1939, the "East 12th Street" of 1947, the "Ohio Magic" of 1945. The influence of the photograph, with its startlingly irrational unselectivity of detail, is also applied to advantage in the "Self-Portrait Among Churchgoers" of 1939.

On the whole Shahn's art seems to have improved with time. The later pictures become more sensitive and more painterly. That his "social consciousness" has at the same time become less prominent does not, in my opinion, play much of a role here; it is simply that Shahn gains better control of his medium as he goes along. Yet there has been a certain loss of vigor. Nothing improves upon or repeats the shock of "Handball." There is an attempt to strengthen and vary color, but to little avail. Shahn, more naturally a photographer than painter, feels only black and white, and is surest of himself when he orients his picture in terms of dark and light. All other chromatic effects tend to become artificial under his brush.

This art is not important, is essentially beside the point as far as ambitious present-day painting is concerned, and is much more derivative than it seems at first glance. There is a poverty of culture and resources, a pinchedness, a resigna-

THE EDUCATION OF T. C. MITS

This amazing, engaging, enlightening and thoroughly gay little book gives you the rudiments of modern logic and shows you what it means to you. tion to the minor, a certain desire for quick acceptance—all of which the scale and cumulative evidence of the present show make more obvious. Yet Shahn has a genuine gift, and that he has not done more with it is perhaps the fault of the milieu in which he has worked, even more than his own.

Although Pepsi-Cola's "Paintings of the Year" annuals have improved, at least by omission, under Roland McKinney's direction in the last two years, they continue to pay diminishing returns as an effort to promote American art. It is good to see new talent outside New York being encouraged, but when this talent is as mediocre and as timid as the Pepsi-Cola shows reveal it to be, what's the use? Does it matter that twenty or thirty more young painters west of the Hudson and north of the Sound have adopted the manner of Alexander Brook and become eligible for commissions to illustrate Lucky Strike advertisements?

This year's exhibition at the National Academy of Design (through October 31) makes a decided retreat in so far as it confines the quota of abstract paintings to two or three—and very bad ones at that. The tendency seems to run even more strongly than before to a populist modern art that, without going back all the way to conventional academicism, will not make things too difficult for the lay observer. The fact that the most ambitious and original American painting of the moment lies almost entirely in the direction of the abstract is disregarded. The reason for this becomes apparent, however, when we look at the list of jurors. Most of them are painters themselves and members of an academy with a vested interest to protect. None of them have gone farther than Vlaminck and Hartley, and it is only to be expected that they should discourage their juniors from attempting to do so. It is too bad that the Pepsi-Cola Company, whose intentions seem sincere, has let itself become their instrument. Doesn't it want its shows to be representative?

This year the first prize of $2,500 was awarded to Henry Kallem of New York for his Klee-ish "Country Tenement," which seems a good and almost a fresh picture when seen in color reproduction in the catalogue. It turns out, however, that this reproduction has by its very unfaithfulness—which steps the colors up at least three tones in key, converting the grays into whites, the violets into lavenders, and the reds into vermilions—greatly improved a painting whose original is rather muddy and timid, even if well drawn. Perhaps Mr. Kallem will be instructed by this enlightening accident and take more chances—in which case he would have to forgo Pepsi-Cola prizes for a while.

RCA VICTOR has issued another group of records of performances by famous singers of the past. One (15-1010; $2.50) offers the baritone Battistini in his 1907 performance of arias from "La Favorita" and "Martha" and enables one to understand the superlatives used in describing the quality of his voice, the ease of its production, and the style of its use. Another (15-1014) similarly documents the descriptions of the power and beauty of the soprano Emmy Destinn's voice when she first came to the Metropolitan, with a 1908 performance of Un bel di from "Madama Butterfly." On the reverse side is a 1914 performance of Suicidio from

"La Gioconda," in which the voice has lost some of its beauty but the singing has acquired magnificent authority in style. I had to reduce the speed of the motor below 78 to bring Un bel di down to its correct key; and I notice that in the H. M. V. catalogue the two Battistini recordings are also marked "below 78." The surfaces of the Destinn record are quiet; those of the Battistini a little less so.

The record (15-1011) with the contralto Louise Homer's 1909 performance of Schubert's "Die Allmacht" reproduces the grand style of her singing and the richness of her lower tones, but not the beauty I recall of her high ones. And my copy distorts her loud tones in the fine 1905 performance of an aria from "Les Huguenots" on the reverse side. Also, surfaces are bad.

The one (15-1012) with the contralto Ernestine Schumann-Heink's 1906 performance of an aria from "Lucrezia Borgia" and her 1907 performance of Ardit's "Leggiero Invisibile" reveals a voice remarkable not for sensuous beauty but for the power and flexibility that lend themselves to extraordinary bravura in vocal and musical style. Surfaces are poor.

And finally the one (15-1013) of the tenor Charles Dalmorès's 1912 performances of arias from "Carmen" and Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" reveals a powerful voice which is used with a lot of exaggerated nuances of tone and changes of pace in the first piece, but with simpler phrasing in the second. Surfaces are quiet.

Still having to postpone detailed comment on Blitzstein's "The Airborne" until I have the necessary space, I now merely report my lack of respect for it (which leads me to regret that at a time when RCA Victor hasn't the plant, materials, and labor to record or issue all the great art it should, or even to keep already existing recordings of great art available, it wastes what is involved in the production of a seven-record set on this piece of musical journalism), and the fact that the performance by the New York City Symphony and Robert Shaw's chorus, with Charles Holland, tenor, Walter Scheff, baritone, and Mr. Shaw as narrator, all under the direction of Leonard Bernstein, seems good and is excellently reproduced (Set 1117; $8.25).

RCA Victor offers better value in the set (1141; $4) containing the Royal Hunt and Storm and the March from Berlioz's "The Trojans" and the Overture to Borodin's "Prince Igor," performed by Beecham with the London Philharmonic. The quiet opening and closing sections of the Royal Hunt and Storm have some of the details in Berlioz's music that bring tears to one's eyes with the intensity of their exquisitely wrought loveliness; the Borodin piece is very fine; the performances are excellent; and they are reproduced with spaciousness and richness, though with some overweight of bass and underweight of treble. In my copy there are occasional wavering pitch and occasional noisy surfaces.

Another Victor set (1135; $5) offers Wagner's early and interesting "Faust Overture," his lovely "Siegfried-Idyll," and his dreadful Ride of the Valkyries, performed by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony. The performance of the "Idyll" is relaxed, tender, and characteristic in its plastic modeling, which in the overture produces powerful organic coherence and a hair-raising climax. The recorded sound is magnificently spacious and rich, and a trifle brash; one side in my copy wavers in pitch; and the surfaces are not bad with the Brush pickup, but are extremely noisy with the new Astatic QT.

On a Victor single disc (11-9653; $1) is Stokowski's latest orchestral performance of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, full of the manipulations of sonority and pace that make hash of this great work, and excellently recorded. And on another (11-9654; $1) is Morton Gould's "Minstrel Show," which I don't find enjoyable, and which is excellently performed by Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony and well recorded.

As for the set (1128; $5.25) of "Henry V," it offers some fine passages from the play, beautifully spoken—but as prose rather than as poetry, with lines and parts of lines sliced out—by Laurence Olivier, and extensive passages of Walton's music for the film, which I don't consider worthy of the space that could have been used for fine passages in the play that are omitted.

Letters to the Editors

An Arab Reaction to the Palestine Supplement

Dear Sirs: Your special supplement on Palestine and the Middle East was an education in itself, especially for Arab readers. Thus Egyptians, whose country is still occupied by foreign troops, will be very flattered to learn that they dream of founding an empire stretching from the Persian Gulf to the Atlantic, and Syrians and Lebanese, who have shown their attachment to their republican institutions, will be delighted to learn that they will probably soon have a Caliph-King.

As an agriculturist, Dr. Lowdermilk may be entitled to say that the Jewish colonists "have done the finest work I have seen on four continents," though if he had looked a little farther north, in Lebanon, or south, in Egypt, he would have seen quite as good a use of the land with much smaller capital resources and far less publicity. As an agriculturist, too, he may be more interested in the fate of the land than of its Arab inhabitants. But he cannot be so innocent of economics as to ignore the cost of Jewish agriculture and its financial failure. As an example of this, Mr. Kaplan, treasurer of the Jewish Agency, recently stated that although the Jewish colonists received during the war advances of $72,000,000 from the Jewish Agency, they still stagger under debts of $60,000,000 and their income hardly covers the interest on those debts.

But the most interesting article of your supplement was surely that of Professor Laski, for it shows how even an outstanding intellectual Socialist can let himself be carried away by narrow aggressive nationalism and forget the noble principles for which he formerly stood. After vigorously denouncing British and American imperialism he goes on to point out that the sovereignty of the Middle East states is a "hypocritical pretense" and—presumably as a homeopathic remedy—to suggest that they should be deprived of what sovereignty they have and their resources put under a commission appointed by the United Nations—that is, by those same great powers he denounces.

Professor Laski does indeed anticipate some resistance to his plans but thinks they will only be émeutes, whose repression "would be nothing more than a big police operation." It would be really humorous, if it were not tragic, to see Professor Laski taking over, for the benefit of Zionism, not only the aims and methods but even the jargon of that imperialism he denounces.

The whole argument of your supplement rests on three assumptions: first, that the establishment of a Jewish state is such a desirable object that any amount of injustice it involves is justified; second, that, to quote Professor Laski, "such deep disagreement divides the Arab states that they would not effectively cooperate"; third, that only Russia can help the Arabs and that the last thing the "feudal Arab rulers" wish is to seek aid from Russia.

The first point has often been discussed, and there is no need to refute here the iniquitous fallacies on which it rests. As to the second, the Arabs have sufficiently reaffirmed their solidarity, especially as regards Palestine, and have enforced a boycott of Jewish goods whose efficacy is fully admitted by the Jews themselves. However, it is probable that you and others will only begin to take Arab solidarity seriously when it shall have proved itself by armed resistance to aggression.

As to the third point, it cannot be too often stressed that Zionism is opposed by all Arabs—rulers and people alike—and that no Arab would refuse aid from any quarter if that offered the sole avenue of escape from Zionist imperialism backed by the Western powers. However, it is by no means a foregone conclusion that Zionist propaganda will continue to stifle the conscience of the Western powers and prevent an understanding between the Arabs and the Americans, which the Arabs sincerely desire and which would be of such benefit to both sides.

Without the Mufti Cooperation Can Exist

Dear Sirs: The delegate of San Salvador to the U. N. has suggested that an Arab-Jewish commission should come together and seek a basis for mutual cooperation and understanding. It was obvious that the Arab Higher Committee would reject any suggestion of this kind.

As I pointed out in my letter to The Nation about two months ago, the Arab Higher Committee has not the slightest legal standing and besides has no right to speak in the name of all the Arabs in Palestine, as it represents only the feudal families of the effendis and a few reactionary elements among the Arab Christians and other bazaar politicians who fish in troubled waters.

The fact that many Arab notables are being murdered by the followers of the Mufti and that many others have fled the land, seeking refuge in neighboring countries, is sufficient evidence that there are Arab leaders who favor an understanding with the Jews, particularly in that part of Palestine which has tentatively been allotted to the Jews by the partition plan of the majority report of UNSCOP.

The simplest thing to do is therefore to appeal now to the Arabs of that area to arrange their affairs themselves with the Jews, leaving out the Arab Higher Committee altogether.

But it is doubtful whether anything can be achieved if the Mufti is allowed to continue his political activity; moderate Arabs fear his terroristic acts, and they know that he commits them with the tacit consent of the British authorities.

Now is the psychological moment to demand his surrender as a war criminal. He violated the right of asylum and flew to Lebanon to defy the United Nations; the Egyptian government betrayed its pledge not to allow him to mix in politics. King Farouk himself is responsible; it was on his word of honor that the Mufti was allowed to stay in Egypt. The Lebanese and Saudi Arabian governments should be warned that they must not allow him to be splintered away and then say that he "escaped" without their knowledge.

It is also absolutely necessary to eliminate from the State Department all the reactionary elements hampering the activity of the United States government. A pro-Arab functionary like Wadsworth, who is known for his help to the Arab effendis, as you have pointed out so ably and rightfully, has already done much damage to the prestige of the United States, and will do still more if left in his post.

With the Mufti Murder Exists

Dear Sirs: The slaying of Sami Taha, chief of the Arab Workers' Society, on September 12 by a hireling of the Grand Mufti has aroused me sufficiently to submit to you certain facts regarding the Mufti that I feel might be important. It is possible that I may be the only American who knows these facts.

As a special agent of the Counter-Intelligence Corps in the Africa-Middle East Theater, I was at one time attached to British Intelligence as an interrogating officer. I remember the capture of a German parachute mission, dropped in Palestine in February, 1945, which consisted of at least two Germans and one or two Arabs. On this occasion I was told of the Grand Mufti's direct role in this and other missions by the interrogating officers. Working closely with the Abwehr (German Army Intelligence), the Mufti had helped in the recruiting, training, and instruction of the Arab members, who were to assist the German members in their sabotage and espionage objectives and to transmit information by wireless to Germany. One specific order to this February group was to increase in every possible way the split between Arabs and Jews in Palestine.

My fellow-officers had also interrogated (I observed a portion of one of the sessions) a number of other Arabs who had come into the Near East through Turkey from Germany and who had been recruited and instructed by the Mufti to act as agents in the Near East and send information through Turkey to Germany.

Unfortunately, I was never assigned to any of the above cases; if I had been, I would have a much larger picture of the Mufti's activities. British Intelligence, of course, has many files of positive and incriminating evidence regarding the Mufti. These missions, had they been successful, would have caused great damage and disruption in the Middle East, which was a fighting zone and then later a very important training

Mr. Ickes's Words— and Deeds

Dear Sirs: Miss Lopinsky's letter, in the October 4 issue of The Nation, referring to my article Fish and Politics, requires a rejoinder.

She cites a purported record to show that Harold L. Ickes as Secretary of the Interior was concerned with ending the salmon monopoly in Alaska. Although there are more than 400 fish traps in Alaska, Mr. Ickes did nothing to restore control of the bulk of these to Alaskans until January 31, 1946. This was thirteen days before he sent his letter of resignation to President Truman. One wonders whether he was trying to toss a hot potato to his successor or attempting to make "a record" on the eve of his departure.

From 1939 until 1946 Governor Gruening continually agitated for return of fish-trap sites to Alaskans. Secretary Ickes gave him not one scintilla of support. Suddenly, thirteen days before his resignation, Mr. Ickes issued orders limiting company ownership of trap sites. Why did he not do this earlier? He had had full control of the Alaskan salmon industry from 1939 on.

I have lived in both the West and Alaska, the two regions most associated with Mr. Ickes's Interior Department. I served nearly two years in Alaska during the war. My considered opinion of Mr. Ickes is that his deeds often were at variance with his words. He could advise the Navy Department what to do with helium, and he could tell the Commerce Department what to do about the automobile industry—but when it came to the Interior Department challenging the Alaskan fish monopoly, that was a different question.

I also think it is pertinent for readers of Miss Lopinsky's letter to know that she is an associate of James Curry, a Washington lawyer and former Ickes employee, who is trying to collect damages for certain Indian tribes under rules set down by Mr. Ickes while he was Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Curry is to receive 10 per cent of what the Indians collect. This could well run to several million dollars.

This letter need be no longer. Mr. Ickes through his syndicated column is showing himself clearly to the American people. Of late his two main targets have been David Lilienthal and President Truman, and one of his heroes has been Senator Taft.

Newsprint Control Through Postal Laws?

Dear Sirs: I have read with considerable interest about the praiseworthy efforts of Senator James E. Murray to protect the paper supply of the smaller publishers. In that connection I should like to make a suggestion which may be helpful.

The postal subsidies allowed to publishers are based largely on the theory that the dissemination of information to the citizenry should be encouraged. It is, of course, true that an informed electorate is essential for truly democratic processes, and to the extent that publishers help to enlighten our people, the subsidy is warranted. It is apparent, however, that most of the large publishers have little or no interest in public enlightenment. Their primary function is the sale of advertising space for profit, with bits of gossip, scandal, news, or information thrown in to allure readers.

Under no theory can a subsidy for advertisers be justified. Such a subsidy to the most privileged economic class is an unfair drain upon the average taxpayer through postal losses. Moreover, a good deal of the advertising is done because Uncle Sam pays much of the cost through reduced income taxes. Both of these subsidies tend to promote a great deal of socially wasteful advertising, the cost of which is passed on to consumers as well as to the government.

I suggest that existing postal laws be amended so as to require every publisher to furnish monthly a report of the percentage of space used during the previous month for commercial advertising. The subsidy provision should continue to govern only for the space used for news and educational matter, the rest to be billed at the ordinary mailing rates.

I believe that this simple proposal would be fair and appropriate and would gain public favor in a short time.

A Medal for Ecker

Dear Sirs: Last week the Joint Committee for Equality in Housing wrote to Mayor William O'Dwyer of New York, asking for an appointment to see him. As of this date, the audience has not been granted. The committee has therefore decided to publish its letter and has so informed the Mayor's secretary. The letter follows:

Honorable Sir: The New York Times of September 30 reports that you will be a speaker at the One Hundred Year Association dinner on October 30 for Frederick H. Ecker, chairman of the board of directors of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. At this dinner it is planned to award Mr. Ecker a gold medal for his "achievements" in the field of better housing.

Unfortunately, Mr. Ecker has gained such a deplorable reputation for his outspoken stand in favor of segregation in housing that it would be a slap at all fair-minded citizens for the Mayor of New York City to accord Mr. Ecker the honor of his presence. You must be aware that in the controversy about the Stuyvesant Town housing policy Mr. Ecker took a most unequivocal stand backing Jim Crow. Only last spring he insisted on a proviso in a contract with the United Nations secretariat which permits his company to practice its express policy of segregation in housing U. N. personnel.

We are aware of your policy of equality for all, and no act on your part should exacerbate, even inadvertently, this shameful insult to the U. N.

In behalf of the Joint Committee for Equality in Housing we believe that you should publicly refuse to attend this dinner, and some of us would appreciate an opportunity to discuss this matter with you. Will you kindly notify us when it will be possible for us to see you?

The committee continues to hope Mayor O'Dwyer will not see fit to attend the dinner. In any event, it will hold a protest demonstration against the "honoring" of Mr. Ecker, Thursday night, October 30, in front of the Waldorf Astoria Hotel, in which the dinner is being staged.

A New Charter for Freedom

IN THE cold war that some have already proclaimed, the case for the West rests on its championship of "certain inalienable rights" of man. Unless the United States, which in effect speaks for the West, holds on to those rights, cultivates them, assures their exercise, and protects them against all comers, it will have no case at all in the eyes of the world, and its power to persuade will vanish. Nothing could be more timely, therefore, than the report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, a document of such uncompromising boldness that it at once exposes the "moral dry rot" in our midst, provides the most specific steps to clean it out, and displays before the world that corrosive self-criticism which is democracy's saving grace, its boundless advantage over dictatorship.

Eleven months ago, President Truman, foreseeing the wave of intolerance that invariably follows a great war, appointed a committee of fifteen, headed by Charles E. Wilson, president of General Electric, to investigate the dark corners of the Republic and to recommend measures for their illumination. He asked for concrete results, and now he has them. Rarely has a government commission made so broad and variegated a study of American life. It found much to be proud of, and it records the belief that "in no other nation have so many people come as close to this ideal [of freedom and equality] as in America," but, in line with its function, it necessarily focused its attention "on the bad side of our record on what might be called the civil-rights frontier." Here it found a "pervasive gap between our aims and what we actually do," and the 173 pages of the report* are filled with examples of "moral erosion," some blatant and violent like lynching, others "continuing, quiet, omnipresent practices which do irreparable damage to our beliefs." Despite a marked decline in lynchings over a period of twenty years, "it is still possible for a mob to abduct and murder a person in some sections of the country with almost certain assurance of escaping punishment for the crime." And this "is merely a striking form of the broad and general immunity from punishment enjoyed by whites . . . for less extreme offenses against Negroes." J. Edgar Hoover told the committee of a particular jail where "it was seldom that a Negro man or woman was incarcerated who was not given a severe beating, which started off with a pistol whipping and ended with a rubber hose."

The temptation is strong to go on citing from the report, which proceeds from a discussion of such violent blasphemies against the basic creed of the nation on through the whole sordid story of disfranchisement, discrimination, and segregation—it shows clearly how "the 'separate but equal' rule has not been obeyed in practice"—down to seemingly little but galling outrages such as Washington's annual marble tournament in which segregated contests yield two victors, the white boy being automatically designated champion and the Negro child runner-up. The quota system in schools of higher learning, directed against Jews, and sometimes Catholics, as well as Negroes, comes in for a good share of attention. So does discrimination in employment, "the war-time gains of Negro, Mexican American, and Jewish workers" being "lost through an unchecked revival of discriminatory practices." Restrictive covenants in the field of housing, shabby discriminations in the armed forces, and a dozen other expressions of abysmal prejudice are reviewed, all tending to make second-class citizens of Negroes everywhere, and of Jews, Mexican Americans, Orientals, and other minorities in various sectors of American society. Government itself comes in for sharp treatment, not only for its laxness in the enforcement of law, but for its own discriminatory practices and for the dangerous looseness of its current procedure in protecting itself against disloyal employees. The capital city, ironically, is found to be "a graphic illustration of a failure of democracy."

THE recommendations for bridging the gap between the nation's theory of equality and its discriminatory practices fit roughly into administrative, legislative, and educational categories. The committee would greatly strengthen the now weak and understaffed Civil Rights Section of the Department of Justice, give it the service of regional offices, and create under the FBI a special unit of investigators trained specifically for civil-rights cases. Similar systems are recommended for the various states. A permanent Civil Rights Commission is suggested as an adjunct of the Executive Office, and Congress is urged to establish a joint standing committee on the subject—presumably with a different personnel from that of the Un-American Affairs Committee, whose mayhem on civil rights is regrettably ignored in the report.

* Being published this week as a pamphlet by Almon and Schuster, under the title "To Secure These Rights." There will be a special introduction by Chairman Wilson. The price is $1. The report was also printed in full in last Sunday's week-end PM.

The President's committee scorns the rationalization that prejudice cannot be eradicated by law. On the contrary, the report says, "the achievement of full civil rights in law may do as much to end prejudice as the end of prejudice may do to achieve full civil rights." Its proposals for legislation include everything liberals have been demanding for many years, and some that few of them have ever thought of. Among the most urgent, if obvious, are those calling for a complete overhauling of the archaic and ineffective civil-rights statutes, a federal anti-lynching law, either Congressional or state action to abolish the poll tax, laws to protect the right of qualified persons to take part in primaries, local and national suffrage for the District of Columbia, federal and state fair-employment-practice acts, the outlawing of restrictive covenants, and state fair-educational-practice laws to prohibit discrimination in the admission and treatment of students in other than denominational schools.

More novel than these is the proposal, opposed by a minority of the committee, to withhold federal funds from all institutions—schools, public-health services, housing projects, and the like—in which segregation is practiced, though "a reasonable interval" would be allowed for "adjustment to such a policy." The minority believes no less in the elimination of segregation "as an ultimate goal" but opposes the imposition of a federal sanction.

On the thorny question of "political extremists, the committee, taking special cognizance of the Canadian espionage trials, recognizes the government's duty to rid itself of disloyal workers, but asks for due process with specific rules of evidence, a bill of particulars, the right of the accused to confront witnesses, and other judicial safeguards, and it rejects conviction by mere association. Outside the sphere of government, it adheres to the traditional libertarian position for complete freedom in the market-place of ideas, but it would discourage political double-dealing by requiring all groups that "attempt to influence public opinion to disclose the pertinent facts about themselves through systematic registration procedures." Federal taxing and postal powers would be used to compel such organizations to report the names of their officers, the sources and disbursement of their funds, and their organizational purposes. Those who use first-class mail for large-scale mailings would be required to file disclosure statements similar to those now in force for second-class mail, and, as a further curb on irresponsible propagandists, no mail at all would be carried that did not bear the name and address of the sender.

Individual recommendations in the committee's report may be argued. Some will be regarded as politically impossible, others perhaps as tactically unwise. But the committee was not appointed to play politics or devise strategy; it was directed to make a searching study of a grave weakness in American society and to propose correctives. This it has done magnificently, and with a sense of history. Twice before, it points out, the nation found it necessary to review the state of its civil rights—in the period from 1776 to 1791 and in the era of the Civil War. The first self-examination yielded the Bill of Rights; the second, the Reconstruction amendments. Now the time has come for a third advance: morally, because the country "can no longer countenance these burdens on its common conscience, these inroads on its moral fiber"; economically, because "it can no longer afford this heavy drain upon its human wealth, its national competence"; and politically, because "the final triumph of the democratic ideal is not so inevitable that we can ignore what the world thinks of us or our record."

President Truman hopes the report, significantly titled "To Secure These Rights," will prove "an American charter of human freedom in our time." In part, that depends on him; in greater part, it is up to Congress; but, above all, it is up to the country. However much of the charter it succeeds in having enacted, it can, by the very act of fighting for it, clear the air of the poisonous vapors generated by the political hysteria of the moment.

The Shape of Things

MR. THOMAS'S TRAVESTY IN WASHINGTON was called off last week—siny dye, as the chairman put it—but its after effects are still being registered. The hearings were in the spirit of fascism, and the faces of the Un-American Committeemen wore the look of fascists. Americans should study both proceedings and faces—this week's newsreels provide an instructive exhibit—so that they may recognize the stigmata. What the hearings meant, politically and legally, is discussed on pages 492 and 494 by I. F. Stone and Robert W. Kenny. Mr. Kenny who, with Bartley C. Crum, is acting as counsel for the subpoenaed Hollywood witnesses, sets forth his reasons for holding that the Thomas committee is unconstitutional. His analysis explains the refusal of ten of the witnesses to answer questions as to whether or not they were Communists and provides the legal grounds for his appeal to Speaker Joseph W. Martin, Jr., to nullify the citations for contempt brought against them for refusing. If Kenny's request is rejected, as seems probable, the constitutional issue will be promptly pressed in the courts, and eventually the Supreme Court will have an opportunity to decide whether an "inquiry" of the sort conducted by Mr. Thomas and his colleagues is permissible under the Bill of Rights. The problem is a legal one, but the issue is political, as I. F. Stone clearly demonstrates and as was proved in action by the mob that broke up the protest meeting of the Progressive Citizens of America in Independence Square in Philadelphia last Saturday. If the ghost of Benjamin Franklin was on hand for that rowdy attack, he must have wondered how far his country has advanced since he helped frame the constitutional guaranties under which the protest meeting was held.

IN THE PAST WEEK, SENATOR TAFT HAS BEEN attempting to establish a party line which, if accepted by his fellow-Republicans, promises to turn the special session of Congress into a bitter partisan battle. In regard to Europe, the Senate leader and Presidential aspirant has indicated he is willing to vote limited assistance, but he told a Boston audience that he considered "the Marshall Plan, in its present form, beyond all reason." Like many other Republican members of Congress, Mr. Taft obviously believes that the schedules of requirements drawn up by the sixteen European nations at their Paris conference last summer are hopelessly inflated and represent a bargaining position. Most students of European economy, on the other hand, believe the Paris report actually underestimates American assistance needed for recovery. Under pressure from State Department officials to pitch their requests as low as possible, the European experts made a number of assumptions in regard to recovery prospects which many economists consider unrealistic. Nevertheless, Mr. Taft has no qualms in proposing that Europe's needs in 1948 can be met by a grant of $4½ billion, little more than half the amount requested by the Paris committee. Administration officials working on the European recovery plan have been dismayed by this suggestion. They point out that it is in the next twelve months that the foundations for recovery must be laid. Europe's plans for increasing its own production are dependent on the early receipt of adequate supplies of food, raw materials, and equipment. In fact, if Taft's views prevail, all hope of early European recovery will be at an end; what we shall have is another temporary relief scheme.

ONE REASON WHY THE SENATOR IS INTENT on shaving every possible dollar off foreign aid is his determination to pass a tax-reduction bill during the special session. Mr. Taft has been telling his audiences that a cut in taxes is one way to check the rise in prices. His reasoning on this matter is not easy to follow. In his speech at Boston on October 28, he declared: "Today the tremendous income of the people . . . produces a demand much greater than production can supply and has inevitably forced a rapid increase in prices." Exactly! But surely it follows that a reduction in taxes, by increasing disposable income, will add to demand and strengthen the upward pressure on prices. Mr. Taft's theory, we gather, is that a tax cut will tend to lower production costs and so induce business men to lower prices. This could happen if the tax cut applied to corporation profits, though we very much doubt that it would so long as the supply of most goods remains inadequate to meet demand. But, in any case, we understand that the tax bill which the Republicans want to pass is intended to reduce personal income taxes, which can hardly be said to be an important factor in business costs. Is it conceivable, for instance, that if a tax cut raised Eugene Grace's take-home pay by $30,000, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation would be encouraged to slash the price of steel? Come, come, Senator, you know better than that, and you shouldn't insult your audiences by assuming that they don't.

HOOVER ONLY ENVISAGED ONE CHICKEN IN every pot and a car in every garage. The sponsors of a new radio program are dedicated to the proposition that there must be three compacts on every dressing table—one tailored model, one for dressier daytime wear, and one for evening, to suit various "apparel moods" and "color accents." The announcer drew a harrowing picture of how you'd feel if, when you were all dressed up, you brought forth an old compact or one not perfectly suited to your aforementioned apparel mood. "Accessorize," he pleaded, "with discrimination." The new program is a quiz with Groucho Marx officiating. Instead of Four Marx Brothers we now have one Marx Brother and three compacts. This tendency has great possibilities. According to the law of diminishing Marx Brothers, on the day when every woman in the world has three compacts—and the clothes to go with them—even that Fifth Marx Brother, Karl, who asked the original $64 question, may have disappeared from the boards.

TAKING OVER THE CHAIRMANSHIP OF THE Democratic National Committee, Senator J. Howard McGrath announced that he had no "magic formula for success," a point that he immediately proceeded to prove. Instead of lustily wading into what is certain to be a desperate struggle, he chose the soft approach of the conciliator, and he drew the inevitable blank. The Southerners of his own party, long disgruntled over the abolition of the two-thirds rule which used to give them a veto power far out of proportion to their strength, have been agitating for extra convention votes for all states that went Democratic at the last election. McGrath proposed at the committee meeting to give them each a bonus of four votes. More important, he prevented the committee from issuing a blistering attack on the Republicans' conduct of the Eightieth Congress. The subcommittee on resolutions had drawn up a fighting statement charging the G. O. P. with having blocked every decent measure of social welfare, "placed partisan politics above love of country," and "sacrificed the welfare of the people . . . in favor of pandering to the wealthy few at the top." McGrath told the committee to tear up the resolution. It was "a little too bitter at this time," he said, and would endanger Republican cooperation with the President's emergency program for European aid. The results of his kid-glove approach, which was obviously distasteful to retiring Chairman Bob Hannegan, were discouraging. The Southerners complained bitterly that four extra votes were not enough, and the Republicans sensed only weakness in the new leader of their opposition. Senator Taft bluntly replied that politics would not be suspended for the special session, and G. O. P. Chairman Reece blasted McGrath as a "millionaire Rhode Island Red." All of which proves once again that, compared with the way of appeasers, the way of transgressors is a flower-strewn path.

THE COUNCIL OF ECONOMIC ADVISERS, IN ITS report to the President on the domestic effects of a foreign-aid program, admits frankly that financing European needs on an adequate scale will place some strain on both the physical and the financial resources of the United States. On the other hand, it points out that the strain will be a diminishing one, since, at the levels of new foreign aid under discussion, the export surplus will be less than in the past year, while domestic output of goods can be expected to expand. The report stresses the fact that "failure to authorize new aid programs would be likely to spell industrial paralysis for some countries, with the possibility of serious social disturbance and political reorientation. It is . . . impossible to calculate the impact of such a development on our own long-run economic situation. It might impose the necessity for increased military expenditure and would, without doubt, impair the outlook for a stable and peaceful world economy." The committee concludes, therefore, that the Marshall Plan conforms with vital American interests. But, it insists, it is essential to offset the inflationary effects of a foreign-aid program by bold government measures. Among the steps it recommends are continuation of present taxes, reduction in other government expenditures, allocation of scarce commodities such as steel, retention of export controls, and the enlargement of government powers to check credit expansion. The committee evidently fears that such measures may prove insufficient, but, while it suggests that "at least minimum powers for a more frontal attack upon these price increases should be made available," it fails to throw light on the strategy and tactics to be employed.

AMERICA'S PROPOSAL THAT THE PARTITION of Palestine be carried through by July 1 and that Britain meanwhile continue to administer the country is not popular in London. The United States plan would leave Britain in charge during a period in which British officials expect violent disorders as the result of a decision sure to be rejected by Arab leaders. That they will accept such an obligation is hard to believe; their general position is pretty well summed up in the remark of an unnamed Foreign Office spokesman quoted in the New York Times on Sunday: "I am inclined to take the view," he said, "that a British soldier is no more bullet-proof than a G. I." The British answer has not been made as this comment is written, but the attitude of Mr. Creech-Jones last week, before he left for home, seemed unyielding. The Colonial Secretary stuck firmly to the view he had presented in the Assembly: Britain would accept any Palestine solution that was acceptable to Jews and Arabs; it would not bind itself to help enforce a solution that was unacceptable to either group; it was determined to withdraw its forces "soon," in any case. American officials take a different view: Britain should be willing to carry the responsibilities of the mandate until a new system, approved by the United Nations as successor to the League, has been installed. Behind this insistence, one can detect the further desire to avoid any method of implementation that would require the use of either American or Russian troops. *

PERHAPS A WAY OUT MAY BE FOUND through the Russian proposal calling for termination of the British mandate by January 1, the early withdrawal of troops, and the immediate appointment by the Security Council of a commission which, during an interim period of not more than one year, would serve both as administrative authority and agent for the implementation of the partition plan. This scheme would relieve Britain of the responsibility it has so firmly declined to carry and give the Council the authority it should assume. What it leaves out is the critical issue of enforcement. A U. N. commission cannot by itself insure an orderly transition, especially if the Arabs finally refuse to accept partition. To impose that plan, some force will certainly be required, and we doubt greatly the wisdom of leaving the job to the Jewish army, acting alone. Assuming British withdrawal, it seems evident that some international armed force will be essential if disorder is to be prevented. In the absence of a permanent U. N. police force, we suggest that the subcommittee consider the establishment of a small interim force made up of contingents contributed by three or more "disinterested" member states to act under the authority of the Security Council.

X-RAYING DE GAULLE

The Grand Inquisition

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 31

IT WOULD be easy to be cute about the pratt-fall with which the House Committee on Un-American Activities ended two weeks of hearings on the movie industry. No such inquiry is complete nowadays without the disclosure of some attempt to steal the atom bomb. By sophisticated standards the atom-bomb sensation produced by the committee was a dud; the ties between it and the film industry were of Rube Goldbergian tortuousness. Unfortunately, relatively few readers of newspapers will get beyond the flaring headlines which link Hollywood with atom-bomb spying.

It would be difficult to imagine a more far-fetched example of slander by association. A Soviet consul in San Francisco is alleged to have "offered" money to an oil-company scientist in 1942 to obtain information on some secret radiation work at the University of California. This scientist went to a faculty member, who in turn approached J. Robert Oppenheimer, later but not then in charge of the atom-bomb project at Los Alamos. Oppenheimer is said to have declared that he regarded such attempts to obtain information as treasonable. There is no allegation that any information was supplied. All this occurred in San Francisco.

How was it linked to the film industry? At this point the plot, as told by Louis J. Russell, a committee investigator, really thickened. The first scientist in the chain was a dinner guest two years later of Mrs. Louise Bransten, who stands accused of having helped to get Gerhard Eisler out of a concentration camp in France, of having aided many Communist causes, and of having given a dinner for Manuilsky, chief delegate of the Ukraine, during the San Francisco conference. Mrs. Bransten is alleged to have been helped in the Eisler rescue by a former State Department employee who knew John Howard Lawson and Herbert Biberman, two of the film writers cited for contempt in the film inquiry. The presumed clincher is that both these writers had also been dinner guests of Mrs. Bransten.

Even the committee investigator, Russell, who is not paid to be judicious, did not charge that anyone in the film industry had any part in trying to steal atom-bomb secrets, if any such attempt actually was made. That it was made is highly doubtful, unless the FBI and the Department of Justice are also in cahoots with Moscow. Russell said he gave this story to the Justice Department more than a year ago, and it took no action. Certainly it must have made an investigation, but scientist no. 1 in this Charlie Chan chain was allowed to leave for England recently to work for the Shell Oil Company. Would he have been allowed to leave if he had tried to obtain atomic secrets for the Russians? But for every newspaper reader who examines the dispatches closely enough to ask himself that question, there will be ten thousand who glance at the headline "Film Reds Linked to Atom-Bomb Plot," and turn to the sports pages with the feeling that something will have to be done about these reds.

The literate and the thoughtful must not deceive themselves. The committee is succeeding in its objectives: to build up an impression that Communists have penetrated everywhere; that they menace the prize national possession, the atom bomb; that something drastic will have to be done about them; that the peril warrants dismissal of appeals to constitutional rights as legal pettifoggery, if not treasonable jesuitry. The state of mind being created is a kind of plot-and-persecution system akin to paranoid obsession and like paranoia impervious to correction by rational argument. The creation of this state of mind is the necessary preliminary for the emergence of a full-scale fascist movement garbed as militant Americanism. It is in this perspective, and not as some kind of unfortunate Congressional aberration, that one must view this latest in the long series of "hearings" by the Thomas committee and its predecessors. What the committee needs above all is attention, and the attention-getting potentialities of the movie star and the film industry are so much richer than anything else in American life that if there were no reds in Hollywood the committee would have to plant some.

AS SHEER spectacle, whether for the sophisticated or the unsophisticated, the movie hearings were the most superb performance yet put on by the committee. Outside the huge marble-walled caucus room of the old House office building on Capitol Hill a long line waited daily for a glimpse of the glamorous folk in attendance. "My wife," I heard a poorly dressed man plead with the policeman on duty downstairs, "wants to have a look at Humphrey Bogart." Within the guarded hearing-room the scene matched Hollywood's best in productions. On the right sat the ponderous moguls of the industry, with their handsome gray-haired counsel, Paul McNutt. A million dollars in movie names were scattered through the intent audience. In the front rows left sat perhaps the most affluent-looking group of alleged "reds" in modern history: earnest men, mostly young—only rich America could provide its alleged revolutionaries with such sleek clothes and Sulka ties. On the aisle, out-dazzled both by their clients and by McNutt, sat Bob Kenny and Bart Crum, the determined counsel of the accused screen writers. The rows of press tables in front of them were crowded with stellar by-lines, hemmed in by Klieg lights. And on the high bench presiding was the Grand Inquisitor himself—the bald, stout, red-faced apoplectic-looking J. Parnell Thomas. One could not imagine a more perfect piece of casting for his role.

THE first week's hearings were largely taken up with the lunatic fringe of the right, Hollywood's Liz Dillings, male and female. The second week was different. From the moment strong-faced John Howard Lawson hitched up his pants over a rather capitalistic paunch as he strode to the witness stand, it was clear that the committee was in for a fight. Lawson's stentorian voice, aided by a microphone, out-shouted both Thomas, no dulcet tenor, and Thomas's gavel, which broke the first day under the pounding he gave it. The committee is accustomed to quiet crucifixions and docile answers to loaded questions. One screen writer after another declined to give Thomas the pleasure of watching the victim squirm, and ten were finally cited for contempt. The key question, "Are you a Communist?" brought neither denial nor affirmation nor even a flat refusal to answer, but an insistence on shouting the committee down. At one point Thomas asked a witness almost pleadingly, "Can't you answer yes, no, or maybe?" and two witnesses were even allowed to read their statements.

"The committee is determined," Thomas said at the beginning of the inquiry, "that the hearings shall be fair and impartial. We have subpoenaed witnesses representing both sides of the question." But the nearest the "accused" got to presenting their side, except for the reading of the two statements, was the chance to answer "yes" or "no" when they were asked about membership in the Screen Writers' Guild and the Communist Party. Their counsel, laying the groundwork for what will be a crucial test of the right of Congress to investigate in the sphere of ideas, were given no chance to cross-examine witnesses or rebut charges against their clients, and at one point were threatened with indictment for conspiracy if they had advised their clients not to answer. On each of the ten cited for contempt the committee released a voluminous dossier. These dossiers showed that the committee's investigators are constant readers of the Communist Party press: most of the information in them came from the Daily Worker, the rest from other party papers. That few of the "accused" could qualify as Republicans is hardly news. The dossiers were made up of numbered counts like an indictment; each purported to represent an "affiliation" with the Communist Party, but many of them could be brought forward against other leftists and liberals who are by no means party-liners. Aid to Spain, defense of one of a long list of leftists from Tom Mooney to Gerhard Eisler, a 1931 speech against the criminal-syndicalism laws, praise of Marx and Engels, membership in Consumers' Union or the P. C. A., showing "an active interest in the Soviet Union," and signing an ad in 1945 calling for breaking relations with Spain were among the "counts" in these indictments, which could set precedents for wider dragnet proceedings.

But the most striking feature of the hearings and the dossiers was the almost complete absence of allegations concerned with what was supposed to be the business of the inquiry—Communist propaganda in the films. The committee claims to have a list of complaints but seems hesitant to make it public. The hesitancy becomes clear when one notes the character of the only two films to which the "dossiers" object as communistic. One is "Blockade," the Lawson film about the Spanish civil war, which was covertly pro-Loyalist; the other, "The Brotherhood of Man," which Ring Lardner, Jr., helped to write for the Automobile Workers' Union. This was based on the pamphlet "The Races of Mankind," by Ruth Benedict and Gene Weltfish. It is significant that among those cited for contempt are men who have written or produced those few movies which give the Negro a break and attack anti-Semitism: for example, Edward Dmytryk and Adrian Scott, who were responsible for "Crossfire."

THIS inquiry must be fought by all men of good-will. The constitutional issues go to the very fundamentals of what may truly be called Americanism. If a Congressional committee can investigate ideas in the movies, it can investigate them in the press. The purpose is to terrorize all leftists, liberals, and intellectuals; to make them fearful in the film, the theater, the press, and any school of advanced ideas the Thomas committee can stigmatize as "red." In the films, as the transcript shows, the committee is out to give the moguls of the industry no rest until they not only take from the screen what little liberal and social content it has, but turn to making films which would prepare the way for fascism at home and war abroad. There were two revealing moments in the producers' testimony. Jack Warner, explaining the "subtle" methods of "red" screen writers, said, "They have the routine of the Indians and the colored folks. That is always their setup." And when Louis B. Mayer said he was going to start making some "anti-Communist films promptly," Thomas leaned forward with a grin and asked, "These hearings haven't anything to do with the promptness, have they?"

"Congress Shall Make No Law..."

BY ROBERT W. KENNY

Washington, October 29

IT IS becoming increasingly clear that the conduct of the Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities cannot be authorized under the Constitution, that the House resolution by which it was formed is void, and that the provision of the Federal Administrative Procedure Act which embraces the resolution is invalid.

I intentionally separate the conduct of the committee from its purported authority, although I believe that the Constitution forbids any legislation which might seek to legitimize such conduct and that the purported authority for the conduct is not in fact valid. But even when we consider the conduct and the law separately, we arrive at the conclusion that what is being done violates one of the freedoms secured to the individual by the Constitution. In making the separation I am unnecessarily conceding ground to any defense of the committee which might be offered. I do not think that a court would consider separately the purported authority and the conduct of the committee.

All of us know that although the committee was ostensibly established for the purpose of proposing legislation, its real purpose is to intimidate all persons who hold radical or even liberal political opinions. It seeks to destroy the will to differ. Its methods of intimidation vary. Usually it publicly denounces its chosen victims as reds and thus injures or destroys their economic security. If the victims are wage-earners, their employers are prejudiced against them. If they are professionals, they lose favor with their clients.

In the case of the motion-picture industry, the committee has publicly marked some twenty persons for destruction—twenty persons in an industry which employs over 30,000. But twenty executions can still a city: all the inhabitants will be intimidated. It is not necessary to be sure that the chosen victims belong to any particular political category. The Nazis have shown that hostages may as well be selected by lot as by any other method.

THE procedure in the hearing-room might conceivably be defended if the committee were genuinely seeking facts for the purpose of proposing legislation—although this is questionable. At its whim it holds hearings in secret. Counsel may be admitted, but his right to speak is strictly curtailed and often denied, as is the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses or to make a statement in his client's defense. The entire hearing is aimed at the committee's press release. This, not legislation, is the committee's real purpose. No court could blind itself to this fact, and I do not think the courts will. Even after secret hearings the witness, on leaving the building, has sometimes been greeted by headlines furnished in advance by the committee. Opinion cannot be suppressed by legislation, but it can be intimidated by publicity. The purposes and the methods of the committee are all of a piece—but not of a piece with the Constitution.

The First Amendment to the Constitution forbids the passage of any law "abridging" freedom of speech or of the press. The amendment, couched in language which denies power to Congress ("Congress shall make no law . . ."), recognizes an existing right of the people; you can "abridge" only what already exists. The little area of individual freedom walled in by this amendment is identical with that exposed for inquiry and legislation by the resolution and the "law" under which the committee acts. "Propaganda activities" lie precisely within the area which Congress must not touch.

Our Supreme Court has held that justification for the power of Congressional inquiry cannot be sought in English parliamentary precedents, since the House of Lords, unlike Congress, is a court as well as a legislative body. Although Congress exercises some judicial powers, as in impeachments and in passing on the qualifications of its members, its power—outside of these specified exceptions—is legislative only. Inquiry, properly a function of a judicial body, can be exercised by Congress only as a necessary incident of its legislative power. Where it can make no law, it has no power to inquire. The present inquiry, therefore, since it is within the area proscribed by the First Amendment, is unconstitutional.

It is worth while to ask whether the word "un-American" adds anything to Congress's powers. Although Congress can pass no law abridging propaganda activities, could it nevertheless pass a law abridging un-American propaganda activities? Apart from the fact that the meaninglessness of the word "un-American" is enough of a hole to sink the statute in, it is clear that the use of the word adds nothing to the power of inquiry. If any one area more than another was the prime concern of those who insisted on the First Amendment, it was the area of politics and political controversy. The right to agitate for what is not, at any given moment, popular is precisely what is protected by the First Amendment—including, I dare say, the right to agitate for an amendment altering any part or the whole of the Constitution. Far from aiding the law, the word "un-American" nails down the self-condemnation it already carries.

TURN now to the resolution itself. There are those who argue that its words and intent have been perverted by the committee. Is this so? Can the committee now be "reformed" by rewording the resolution? I do not think so.

The resolution establishing the House committee was first passed in 1938. The committee's conduct has not altered substantially in the decade since the resolution was made law. If the meaning which the various committees on un-American activities have accorded the resolution over the years were different from what Congress intended, Congress could have changed the law in any one of four sessions. It has not done so.

The bare language of the law is plumped out by the history of the committee. There can be no doubt that the resolution itself violates the First Amendment. It is true that this situation presents new questions to the courts. But it is also true that much law yet remains to be made concerning the power of Congressional inquiry. The scope of that power, the occasions for its exercise, and its limiting circumstances have been the principal problems presented to the Supreme Court. Many of the abstract questions of power have been settled, usually in favor of Congress. But the question of the rights of the individual when affected by the exercise of Congressional power has yet to be presented—and has yet to be settled. The powers of Congress are not absolute. The Bill of Rights, like the federal system, is a limitation of the powers granted to Congress. The first ten amendments were framed to preserve the rights of individuals, but they are meaningless unless they also restrain the powers of government. This is elementary constitutional law.

The power to compel disclosure, particularly in secret session, is a most drastic power. Justice Sutherland and others have said that the right to be let alone is one of the most precious of all rights, next only to life itself. Freedom of choice in political questions is the staple of our democracy; without it America would not be America. The right of privacy, our Supreme Court has said, is one of the rights protected by the Fourth Amendment. The secret of the confidential character of communications in privileged relationships, and other areas of inquiry when they relate to political opinion have traditionally been beyond the power of government agencies. It is inconceivable that these rights, singly or together, are not a limitation on the power of Congress to inquire, whether for legislative or other purposes.

J. Parnell Thomas

PERHAPS the clearest injunction against the committee can be found in the Fourth Amendment, which assures to the people the right "to be secure in their persons . . . against unreasonable searches." Although this amendment is usually invoked when illegally procured evidence is used in criminal cases, our courts have held that it is applicable as a defense against any arm of the federal government. They have held that what constitutes an "unreasonable" search presents a judicial question. Little if any extension of previous decisions would be required to include protection against compulsory disclosure under the right of the people to be secure in their persons.

Lawyers and judges are familiar with the type of case in which the facts themselves are so eloquent that they dictate the law, even in the absence of precedent. The situation presented by the conduct of the un-American Activities Committee is that kind of case. Lawyers, judges, and scholars may differ about the reasons to be given for the conclusion; I think there can be little dispute about the conclusion itself. In my opinion, no official body in the past two decades has brought so much discredit on Congress as this committee. The injury done to decent people has been all the worse because it has been done under the cover of law.

In the light of the committee's history, its effects on the American scene, and the suffering it has caused in private lives, I do not think there can be any doubt about the decision that will ultimately be handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Sexual Code of the Roman Church

BY PAUL BLANSHARD

NOBODY knows exactly where the elaborate sexual code of the Roman Catholic church came from. It has developed by accretion over a period of nineteen centuries until today it is probably the most important part of Catholic moral philosophy. Perhaps it ought to be called an anti-sexual code, because the primary emphasis has always been upon the sin rather than the joy in sex. It would be unkind to suggest that even priests interpret the universe in terms of their own frustrations, for, after all, Freud's wisdom was not available to the early popes who clamped celibacy upon a reluctant clergy.

The anti-sexual emphasis of early Christianity came partly from the Orient, where certain ascetic cults glorified celibacy and masochism. These cults spread westward at about the time that Paul and his associates were building the early church. Paul himself was notably anti-sexual, and his followers carried his teaching to such an extreme that by the third century Origen achieved victory over his lower nature by castrating himself. The church has now repudiated castration both for monks and for choir boys, but it still exalts virginity as man's noblest condition. Cardinal Gibbons went so far in his "Faith of Our Fathers" as to suggest that Jesus chose his closest disciples on the basis of their virginity and when he went to heaven chose a special band of 140,000 virgin angels for the same reason.

From primitive beginnings the Catholic sexual code has expanded until today it covers every aspect of sexual life. The Catholic moral manuals in their specific descriptions go far beyond any novel ever banned by the effort of Anthony Comstock or John Sumner. They boast that there is no sexual sin which a competent priest is not prepared to handle in confessional, and for every sexual situation they contend that there is a specific Catholic answer.

If, for example, a Catholic girl is raped, the priest instructs her that she may remove the male sperm by mechanical means within the first ten hours and still remain a good Catholic, but she may not, married or unmarried, perform a similar act under any other circumstances without definite risk of hell. If, after being raped, she fails in her efforts to remove the sperm, "once conception has taken place, nothing may be done" ("Medical Ethics for Nurses," by Charles J. McFadden, Foreword by Fulton J. Sheen, Davis, imprimatur Cardinal Dougherty, pp. 136-37).

If a non-Catholic woman is converted to Catholicism and her husband deserts her after refusing to accept her creed, the converted wife may remarry a good Catholic with the church's blessing under the so-called Pauline Privilege, but every other form of divorce is a mortal sin (ibid, p. 54). At the same time nullification of a marriage is obtained far more easily in the Catholic than in the civil courts.

If a Catholic doctor is asked to test the potency of a husband who seeks medical advice in establishing a family, he may direct the man and wife to have intercourse and then remove the male sperm for testing immediately afterward, but if he should secure such spermatozoa for his microscope slide after masturbation by the husband, both doctor and husband are guilty of mortal sin (Decree of the Holy Office, August 2, 1929).

One can imagine the astonishment and bewilderment of Jesus if he returned to this mortal sphere and heard members of the Roman Catholic hierarchy expound these tortuous and detailed sexual regulations as a basic part of his teaching. The Biblical evidence is absolutely clear that Jesus never said anything specific about birth control, large families, sexual perversion, masturbation, or sterilization. He never established a celibate priesthood or directed believers not to marry unbelievers. His most distinctive contribution to sexual ethics was one contemptuous sentence spoken to a group of Pharisees in the presence of the woman taken in adultery: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her."

Since the church has developed its own techniques for plucking selected precedents out of history, this shortage of divine authority in sexual matters has not greatly embarrassed the Catholic hierarchy. Today, as the hierarchy gains strength in the genial and tolerant climate of America, the sexual code is being asserted with increasing aggressiveness. Sometimes it is dressed up with all the latest clichés of science by earnest young Catholic Ph.D.'s who write theses supporting the sexual views of

PAUL BLANSHARD, as head of the Department of Investigations and Accounts under Mayor LaGuardia, conducted a striking exposure of Tammany graft. During the war he was a State Department official assigned to the Caribbean, and he has recently brought out a book, "Democracy and Empire in the Caribbean." His first article in this series, on the medical policies of the Catholic church, was printed in last week's issue; the third, on the church's attitude toward education, will appear next week.

St. Thomas Aquinas. More often it is imposed upon unsophisticated congregations by half-educated priests with a confidence which amazes Protestants and Jews, who can find no warrant for these doctrines in the Scriptures.

Birth Control

THE Roman Catholic sexual doctrines which have excited the most opposition in the United States are concerned with marriage, divorce, sterilization, venereal disease, and birth control. Of these five the doctrine on birth control is now drawing the heaviest fire.

Just why Pius XI finally slammed the door on all kinds of contraception as late as 1930 is hard to understand. Before that the ecclesiastical utterances on the subject were very hostile but not absolutely conclusive. The aged Pius had just piloted the Vatican to a Concordat with Mussolini, and perhaps he felt that the future belonged to dictatorships in both the moral and the political field. At any rate, he announced in his famous encyclical "Casti Connubii" that birth control is "against nature" and that "any use whatsoever of matrimony exercised in such a way that the act is deliberately frustrated in its natural power to generate life is an offense against the law of God and nature, and those who indulge in such are branded with the guilt of grave sin."

Pius used as Biblical authority for this position the story of Onan in Genesis xxxviii, which relates how Judah ordered his second son, Onan, to marry his brother's widow and "raise up seed" to him, and how Onan, not wishing to give his brother credit for paternity, "spilled [it] on the ground" during intercourse, whereupon God slew him.

As soon as Pius XI gave the signal, the celibate theologians of almost every nation in the world jumped into the fray against the rising birth-control movement. It would be hard to imagine a worse thing for the hierarchy to have done if it wished to win the friendship of intelligent non-Catholics in the United States. The strength and prestige of the opposition were completely miscalculated. Since the days when Margaret Sanger first went to jail, birth control has become so respectable that almost all well-to-do people in the United States, Catholic and non-Catholic, practice it to some extent. In fact, if the Catholic opposition, acting as a pressure group, did not block legislative reform in many states, the idea of birth control as a human right would be almost universally accepted in this country. The Planned Parenthood Federation of America lists 584 centers in the country which give not only contraceptive advice to married couples but valuable aid in overcoming infertility. Some six states include planned-parenthood counseling in their public-health services, and most scientists regard child spacing as essential to family happiness. In a world whose inhabitants have doubled in the last century and may soon total five or six billion, the eugenists see no solution to the population problem unless human beings learn to regulate their reproduction.

Intelligent Catholics know all these things and are rebelling against the church's attitude. The birth-control clinics of the Planned Parenthood Federation in nearly every part of the United States are used by Catholic women in about the same proportion as by non-Catholic women. At least three national public-opinion polls have demonstrated that Catholic women do not follow their priests on this subject. When the Ladies' Home Journal asked its women readers in 1938 if they believed in the right to disseminate birth-control information to married couples, 51 per cent of the Catholic women polled said yes. When Fortune posed a similar question in 1943, 69 per cent of the Catholic women said yes. A Roper poll in Connecticut reported that 54.9 per cent of the Catholic women voting said yes.

This defiance by Catholic women has driven the priesthood into a corner. In self-defense it has resorted to frantic vilification of the birth-control movement. Twisting the plain medical facts about birth control, it has pretended that contraception is likely to cause cancer, that it destroys the health of married women, and that it is a form of abortion. It has so intimidated the legislature in many states that there can be no scientific dissemination of birth-control knowledge to the masses of the people, who need the information most.

When Look magazine in its issue of April 1, 1946, published a sober factual review of the clinical work of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, the top-ranking layman of the Archdiocese of New York under Cardinal Spellman wrote a reply, published in the issue of May 6, in which he accused the federation of advocating "education in animal functions completely divorced from morality and ethics," and declared that such education meant training people "to be sexually promiscuous with least risk of pregnancy or venereal disease." "The planned-parenthood program," he wrote, "assumes that the cure for beastliness is to teach juveniles how to get away with acting like beasts." This philippic against an organization with which some of the most respected bishops and rabbis of the country were associated aroused violent criticism among Catholics.

Faced with this type of response from within the church, the hierarchy found a tiny loophole in the papal encyclical of 1930, and two years later came forward with a Catholic "birth-control" formula sponsored by the very prelate who had directed the New York City police to break up a Margaret Sanger meeting (Courke and Walsh, "The Sterile Period in Family Life," imprimatur Cardinal Hayes). The hierarchy's "discovery" was the "rhythm method," a formula based upon the theory that conception takes place during eight days a month, midway between menstrual periods, and that if intercourse is carefully limited to the sterile periods, pregnancy is avoided. This method is without sin because it is a "natural" method. Whether it is "natural" or not, it is certainly an unreliable method of birth control. Moreover, the "rhythm" theory puts the church in a ludicrously paradoxical position, with the priests in one breath condemning the arguments for child spacing and in the next using those arguments to support planned intercourse in the Catholic pattern.

But reason and logic now play a decidedly secondary role in the Catholic war against birth control. The Pope has spoken, and the political prestige of the hierarchy is at stake. The specious distinction between scientific and "natural" birth control must be defended as divine and eternal because the Holy See has indicated that it is a doctrine in the field of "faith and morals." Who would venture to suggest that it was only an unfortunate mistake by an old man who had never been married and had never studied medicine?

The front-line trenches in the birth-control battle are in Massachusetts and Connecticut, the only two states in the union which make it illegal for a doctor to give birth-control information to his own married patients. Although only about 40 per cent of the people of Massachusetts are Catholics, the hierarchy has so terrorized the legislators by threats of pulpit pressure on voters that men who practice birth control themselves are afraid to stand on their feet and fight for a revision of the antiquated law.

In 1942, when the Massachusetts birth-control forces proposed a referendum on a revision of the law which would permit doctors to give contraceptive advice to their patients, they encountered one of the most fantastic campaigns of misrepresentation in the history of American politics. For many Sundays, from almost every Catholic pulpit in the state, priests fulminated against birth control as murder, and on the Sunday morning before election circulars were distributed at church doors saying that the proposed revision of the law would legalize abortion.

The referendum was defeated, but by a margin of only about seven to five in spite of this campaign, and the liberals have now started a new drive for revision which will probably lead to a vote in the fall of 1948. The opening gun was fired in the church's counter-offensive when four leading Protestant and Jewish gynecologists were discharged from the courtesy staff of the Catholic hospital in Springfield because they favored a revision of the state law. In Connecticut six doctors were similarly discharged, and the hierarchy temporarily defeated the drive for revision by holding the state senate in line after the birth-control forces had captured the house.

Venereal Disease

THE church's position on venereal disease is somewhat less dogmatic than on birth control, but its unrealistic attitude has been for years a major obstacle to the development of a sound national program of education. Only last June it was the Catholic War Veterans who blocked the continued distribution by the army of match-books which contained printed information on the control of venereal disease. Last November the American Ecclesiastical Review published the following official statement in its question-and-answer column for priests (p. 389):

Question. Would a husband ever be justified in using a condom when having relations with his wife—namely, if his only purpose is to protect his wife from a disease with which he is afflicted, and there is absolutely no possibility that she will ever again become pregnant? Could he argue in such a case that what he is doing is no sin inasmuch as he is not preventing conception?

Answer. . . . Even if his only purpose in performing the act in this manner is to protect his wife from disease, he would still commit a grave sin, for a good end does not justify the commission of an intrinsically evil act.

The hierarchy, of course, officially combats venereal disease, but in practice it still acts on the assumption that the whole subject is a nasty one, not suitable for general public discussion. So it consents to health examinations before marriage but opposes any "teeth" in health-examination laws. "The formal prohibition of marriage which would inevitably follow in such a law from the fact of an unfavorable certificate . . . must be rejected on grounds of principle as well as opportunism," says Raoul de Guchteneere in his "Judgment on Birth Control" (imprimatur of Cardinal Hayes, p. 99). Only the church has the right to say that people shall or shall not marry. "The legal obligation to obtain a certificate of good health before marriage . . . implies a disguised form of the abuse of civil power, of its intrusion into a territory of which it is not the sole arbiter."

Dr. de Guchteneere reveals the Catholic philosophy which lies behind this part of the sexual code by saying:

The value of progeny is not to be measured by physical qualities but lies entirely in the high dignity of that supernatural destiny which is common to all. Even the marriage of the feeble-minded is forbidden only on the ground of their inability to make a valid contract and not on account of the possible quality of the offspring.

This same philosophy explains the Catholic opposition to sterilization laws. The hierarchy says that the state can hang or sterilize a man if he has committed a crime but that it cannot morally cooperate even in voluntary sterilization of the insane or feeble-minded in order to protect society against unfit progeny. In the twenty-seven states which now permit some sterilization of the unfit the church's moral manuals instruct Catholic judges flatly to defy the law. Father Francis J. Connell, associate professor of moral theology at the Catholic University of America, says in his 1946 textbook, "Morals in Politics and Professions" (imprimatur, Archbishop of Baltimore-Washington, p. 33), after declaring that no Catholic judge could ever approve mercy killings, "Similarly, in those states which now prescribe or permit eugenic sterilization for certain types of defectives and criminals no circumstances can justify a judge in giving a decision that the law should be put in operation."

It would be interesting to bring a test case in some American court some day to determine whether a Catholic judge, sworn to enforce the law of his state without reservation, could obey this ecclesiastical edict and still observe his judicial oath.

Marriage and Divorce

THE marriage and divorce codes of the hierarchy are well known to most Americans, but they deserve some mention because many persons do not realize how sweeping and dogmatic they are. To the hundreds of thousands of young Catholics throughout the world who married hastily and not too wisely during the war period the church says in effect: you may never remarry and start life over again. The prohibition against the marriage of divorced persons is carried so far that a Catholic social worker may not, under threat of excommunication, advise a divorced Catholic woman to marry her lover even when she is living in sin with him openly and both are eligible for marriage under the civil law. Father Connell, in a chapter on Catholic social work in his book cited above, puts it this way (p. 169):

For even though her position is at stake, the social worker may not give advice that will directly induce her client to violate the law of God. Similarly, when the social worker finds a couple living together unmarried and incapable of entering marriage because of some impediment of divine law (but permitted to marry by civil law) she may not suggest a civil marriage, even as a mere formality to obtain civil effects. Indeed, in the United States, where the Third Council of Baltimore inflicts a censure of excommunication on a Catholic who attempts remarriage after a civil divorce, a social worker might so concur in the commission of this sin by her counsel as to incur herself the same penalty.

This edict is handed down by a hierarchy which permits nullification of marriages in its own courts on grounds which would be regarded as too flimsy for consideration in the courts of any state of the Union.

Probably the most offensive item in the Catholic sexual code for non-Catholics is the rule on mixed marriage. Although the church belongs to a number of "tolerance fronts," the hierarchy declares that in all ordinary cases it is a sin for a Catholic to marry a Protestant or a Jew and that such a marriage is null and void unless a special dispensation is granted, and even then the non-Catholic party must sign the following oath or its equivalent:

I, the undersigned, not a member of the Catholic church, wishing to contract marriage with N. N., a member of the Catholic church, intend to do so with the understanding that the marriage tie cannot be dissolved except by death, and promise her on my word of honor that she shall enjoy free exercise of her Catholic religion, and that all the children of either sex born of this marriage shall be baptized and educated in the faith and according to the teachings of the Roman Catholic church (Father John A. O'Brien, "The Faith of Millions," Preface by Cardinal O'Connell, p. 290).

Father O'Brien adds that "the Church forbids her children to attempt [sic] to contract matrimony before the minister of a heretical sect. Those unworthy members who deliberately and wilfully violate that solemn law the Church punishes with excommunication."

For most Americans there is something distinctly unsporting in taking advantage of the high exaltation of young love to impose upon one of the parties in marriage a proselyting agreement. It is not surprising that young Catholics are rebelling against this use of marriage to obtain "converts" and to establish Catholics as a separate class in a tolerant American community. Recent studies by priests show that mixed marriages are increasing at a startling rate in spite of ecclesiastical pressure, and that a very large proportion of mixed families are permanently lost to the church.

Nor is it surprising that increasing numbers of Catholics regard the narrow sexual code of the church with horror and disgust, and refuse to believe that it has any necessary place in their faith. The Catholic author Harry Sylvester, in his recent novel "Moon Gaffney," has a liberal Catholic say: "I think what I mind is the relish with which the clergy, many of whom do not understand the meaning of their own chastity, tell their people they must fill three-room flats with children on their $28 a week." Mr. Sylvester has probably put his finger on the core of the problem. But the solution is another matter. Catholic laymen have no control over doctrinal matters in the church today.

Many laymen believe that a married priesthood might help the situation, and the abolition of celibacy has often been suggested. Such a reform is not unthinkable. Celibacy is a disciplinary requirement, not a dogma, and it does not apply now to the Oriental section of the Roman priesthood. But this natural remedy for sexual fanaticism encounters one great economic obstacle: how much would it cost? Catholic education is based upon the celibacy of its teaching nuns, and the whole educational system of the church might collapse if its teachers were allowed to live a normal life.

Liberation, Limited

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, November 1

THERE'S an interesting figure around the corridors, lounges, and committee rooms at Lake Success these days. He's a thin, lanky individual in clerical collar and the robes of a priest of the Church of England. He has an ascetic, scholar's face but more than an academic fire in his eye. He looks a bit lonely in the cheerful group that inevitably gathers in the delegates' lounge after the rancorous committee debates. I've heard him described as a crackpot. But the Reverend Michael Scott, who has lived in South Africa since 1926, strikes me as being one of those too infrequent crackpots who take seriously the Sermon on the Mount, the Bill of Rights, and the Charter of the United Nations.

You see, he has come all this way to present a petition from a tribe of natives, the Hereros, in Southwest Africa who claim they don't want to be annexed to the Union of South Africa but instead want the territory brought under the United Nations Trusteeship Council. They claim their lands have been forcibly taken away from them. They don't like the Union government's native policy. And they would like the United Nations to send out an inquiry commission to see for itself. Scott is not greatly impressed by South Africa's claim that the majority of the native peoples just can't wait to be annexed. Nor does he appear moved by the erudite legal arguments which attempt to prove that there is nothing in the Charter compelling South Africa to convert its old mandate into a trusteeship. He has a regrettable habit of slipping back to that phrase of the Charter which declares that in territories which have not yet attained a full measure of self-government the interests of the inhabitants are paramount.

It cannot be said, however, that the natives whom the Reverend Michael Scott represents have been without their effective spokesmen. India has been valiantly fighting their battle—as it has fought the battle of colonial peoples everywhere against those imperial powers whose penitence for past sins and yearning for reform have been encased in a hard shell of vested interest. The Soviet Union, perhaps for other reasons, has also taken up their fight. And in committee, at least, the Indian resolution, which stated that the last Assembly's request to South Africa to bring its mandate under the Trusteeship Council conformed to "the clear intention of the Charter," was carried. But it received only a small majority, and in the plenary session, where a two-thirds' majority was required, the watered-down Danish version was the best that could be put through. So it is hoped that the Union of South Africa—without any legal or moral pressure from the United Nations—will accede to the Assembly's twice-repeated request. But it is doubtful whether Michael Scott's Hereros will see hide or hair of a U. N. commission for a while.

In Indonesia the story is slightly different. Here India, the Philippines, Australia, the U. S. S. R., and Poland have been leading the fight. Last week Colonel Hodgson of Australia made the surprising admission that perhaps Russia was right and the two sides should get back to their original ante-bellum lines. Of course, the thing that punctured the apparently impeccable case of that brilliant persuader, Van Kleffens, was the report of the consuls on the spot. Obviously slanted to favor the Dutch, the report, nevertheless, recorded the fact that the cease-fire order given by the Security Council had been interpreted in different senses by the two parties. The Indonesians had thought it meant to stop firing. And they had stopped. The Dutch believed it permitted mopping-up operations. And they had mopped up. But even this evidence was not sufficient to break old-school-tie solidarity, and gentlemen imperialists don't tick off one another. The American resolution, concealing its reprimand in the politest phrase, again urged everybody to stop shooting and called attention to the Council's committee of good offices now on the spot. Even Colonels Hodgson and Romulo thought it was the best possible under the circumstances. But Mr. Gromyko and the Indonesian representative were hardly satisfied.

ANOTHER former colonial people, the Koreans, who have suffered under a tougher brand of empire, will apparently have to whistle for their independence for some time to come. For the Thirty-eighth Parallel, dividing the Soviet world from the Western world, cuts their peninsula in two. The Soviet proposal for immediate withdrawal of all occupation forces would probably guarantee a Soviet Korea—which, thanks to American ineptitude in the south, may come anyway. Mr. Manu-ilski's boast that 99.2 per cent of the people in the Soviet zone support the provisional government provides a fairly clear definition of the kind of democracy that prevails north of Thirty-eight. And the north is apparently well equipped with fighting forces. The American proposal, which by the end of the week had been carried in principle, that a U. N. temporary commission supervise free elections before March 31, 1948, has been rejected by Russia. If it is pressed to the Security Council another veto seems certain.

Perhaps that phrase in the Charter should be slightly revised. The rights of the inhabitants of territories which have not yet attained a full measure of self-government should be paramount except where such rights interfere with the internal political problems of interested states, or where existing imperial claims are not yet liquidated, or where the big-power struggle entails holding a line.

What Rome's Election Meant

BY MARIO ROSSI

Rome, October 20

NEWS of the formation of the Belgrade bureau linking the Communist parties of nine European nations, Italy included, reached this country in time to play a big role in Rome's municipal election. Although the ostensible issues were purely local—to elect, from lists of candidates presented by thirteen parties, eighty municipal councilmen, who in turn would proceed to choose a mayor—the contest was really fought, as is usually the case in Western European elections, over a political ideology rather than a platform: its focus was the most burning question in Italian politics today—communism versus anti-communism. Popular feeling was polarized toward the two extremes, practically nullifying all political parties in between. On one side was the Popular Front (Blocco del Popolo) of the Socialist, Communist, Actionist, and Demo-Labor parties, claiming the support of the masses; on the other, the Christian Democratic Party, claiming leadership in the defense of “Christian civilization” against the “red peril.”

There is no doubt that the Christian Democrats won. De Gasperi's party polled about 100,000 more votes than in last year's municipal election, while the Popular Front declined somewhat in strength. A comparison of the two elections may be useful for a better understanding of the present political alignment. A year ago the issues were not much different. Then, too, the chief problem was communism, but the position of the Christian Democratic Party was less clear. While collaborating in the government with the parties of the left, the Christian Democrats were then trying to establish their connections with the right. But De Gasperi was fearful of the repercussions that might follow a break with the left, and the bourgeoisie—according to reliable information, the Vatican too—expressed its discontent with him by showing a preference for a more extreme anti-leftist party. Thus Giannini's Uomo Qualunque front received more votes than the Christian Democrats. De Gasperi learned the lesson of that election, and understood that he could not stand ideologically with the right and still collaborate with the left: the moment would come when both right and left would let him down. By playing up the Communist bogey and taking advantage of the split within the Socialist Party, he was able to make an about-face and form a Cabinet whose life depended on Uomo Qualunque support in Parliament.

The right was better pleased with De Gasperi when this year he found it profitable to become the champion of anti-communism in Italy. The Uomo Qualunque front, moreover, had been weakened by a split in its ranks, which led to the formation of two new ultra-nationalist parties, the Italian Social Movement and Patrissi's Nationalist Movement for Social Democracy. Both are made up of former Fascists most of whom were freed from jail by a much too lenient amnesty; their propaganda follows closely the Fascist slogans of the period preceding the March on Rome. Benedetto Croce's Liberty Party has been practically wiped out, and severe losses were suffered by the Monarchists. Other losers were Pacciardi's Republicans and Saragat's Social Democrats. The parties right of center won forty-five seats in the Municipal Council as against thirty-five for those left of center. Saragat's followers are counted as left, but they might very well go along with the Christian Democrats or weaken the left by abstaining from voting.

THE election took place in an atmosphere of fear—fear of reaction and fear of communism. It is truly tragic that the influence of international power politics prevented the rise of a party democratic enough to assure independence of foreign interests and progressive enough to satisfy the masses' craving for social justice. Risorgimento Liberale, organ of the conservative Liberal Party, was right when it said: “Italians cannot be satisfied with a choice between red totalitarianism and what sooner or later would become black [clerical] totalitarianism. A non-clerical democracy should be a third alternative . . . and this undoubtedly represents the deepest aspiration of the majority of the Italian people.”

Only the atmosphere of fear explains the success of the neo-fascist Italian Social Movement. “There is no doubt,” commented the Socialist deputy Calosso, in Saragat's Umanità, “that from an electoral point of view fascism is stronger today than in 1919 and could again find the proper ground for violence and propaganda. . . . The present election reveals a situation that might easily lead to fascism and reaction.” De Gasperi, however, is much too busy fighting the left to be disturbed by neo-fascism. And his attitude is understandable if one remembers that the first aim of Christian Democracy is to defend the position of the church, which always managed to get along with fascism. To the Christian Democrats anti-communism is not a matter of expediency but of religious principle. In this election they again found inspiration in the Vatican's official organ, Osservatore Romano, which described the formation of the new Comintern as a long step toward war. Osservatore Ro- miano has been conducting a subtle and unrelenting campaign against Russia and Russian satellite countries, especially Yugoslavia, in connection with the recent trials of Catholic clergymen. The Vatican argues that while the Pope is trying to do everything in his power to bring peace, the Communists, under orders from Moscow, are building up the material and spiritual conditions that lead to war.

IT WOULD be difficult to say to what extent the Rome vote is a preview of next spring's general election. It must not be forgotten that Rome is traditionally very conservative. Its inhabitants include about 70,000 priests, monks, and nuns, whom the Osservatore Romano had reminded for weeks of their duty to vote; and about 100,000 civil servants, always inclined to cast their ballot for whoever is in power.

The victory of the Christian Democrats, in which they received as many votes as the four parties of the left combined, will undoubtedly be followed by an all-out anti-left drive. And the left, unless it changes its tactics radically, may find itself in trouble next spring. The recent wave of strikes was a political blunder, identifying it with disorders and lawlessness. Another blunder of major proportions was Nenni's motion of "no confidence" in the De Gasperi Cabinet, when it was clear that one way or another the Premier would manage to obtain a majority. It simply allowed De Gasperi to make a show of strength from which he greatly profited.

A serious crisis in the Socialist Party was caused by the party executive's approval of the Warsaw declaration, which was taken as a further proof of acceptance of Communist leadership. After the ensuing dispute the party secretary, Lelio Basso, backed down and declared to the Corriere di Milano that there existed areas of disagreement with the Communist declaration. He said that Socialists do not identify the Truman Doctrine with the Marshall Plan. Nor do they share the Communist intention of causing the Marshall Plan to fail; on the contrary, they believe that Italy can contribute to the success of the plan by remaining independent of both the United States and Russia. A series of articles in Avanti, unsigned but in Nenni's style, tried to explain why the American people cannot possibly want war and advocated that Italy, instead of taking sides in the struggle between the great powers, should seek a basis of agreement with both. Obviously the Socialists are embarrassed and will be obliged to clarify their position. On their decisions may depend the outcome of the next general election and thus the fate of Italian democracy.

Sidney Webb and the Fabians

BY KINGSLEY MARTIN

London, October 25

THE 1880's were a watershed—a period from which many social movements flowed. Victorian complacency had been effectively broken down, and with the beginning of big business and the imperialist search for new markets, socialism began to emerge. The particular form which British socialism took was in no small measure due to the work of the little group of Fabians of whom Sidney and Beatrice Webb became the energizing center. Together with Bernard Shaw, Graham Wallas, Lord Olivier, and others scarcely less distinguished, they read Karl Marx's "Kapital" and rejected Communist theory. They also parted company with the moral and religious branch of the Socialist movement which, mainly through the influence of the Independent Labor Party, formed its other wing.

They were an extraordinary little body of intellectuals. Webb, like Jeremy Bentham, examined all the tangle of British institutions of his day—legal, political, economic, and social—explained how they worked, tested them all by the standard of utility, and proposed constructive remedies. The Webb partnership carried out an immense body of solid research into British institutions. One of the most famous of their books, the "History of Trade Unionism," was later acknowledged by Lenin as a classic. The other side of their work was practical. They were unashamedly opportunistic: that was what Fabianism meant. They thought the old ruling class of England hopelessly inefficient, and they sought to substitute a responsible and scientifically trained body of elected persons. They hoped to penetrate the middle classes, not to rouse working-class passions. They trusted to persuasion, reason, and permeation. They believed that socialism would come, but that it must be evolutionary; their motto was the "inevitability of gradualness."

If gradualness was inevitable, they had to find its instruments where they could. At their house in Grosvenor Road they entertained and weighed up promising young Liberals like Lloyd George and Winston Churchill. They were friends of Haldane and Balfour, and it was Webb who drafted the Balfour Education Act of 1902. A few years later Mrs. Webb was appointed a member of the Poor Law Commission, and through the work they put into it, she and Sidney used what would otherwise have been a commonplace royal commission as the instrument for exposing the evils of a class society and for proposing innumerable practical reforms which are being completed only by our present government.

Other incidental activities were the founding of the London School of Economics and of the New Statesman in 1913. The Webbs also played an important part in bringing about that fusion of the Socialist and trade-union movements which is now the Labor Party, and having created the Labor Party, they proceeded, by their methods of writing, organizing, lecturing, and exerting personal influence, to give it the body of doctrine which is still today the orthodoxy of British socialism.

By 1924 enough of the middle classes had been permeated with socialism to enable Labor to take office, though in a minority position. Webb was president of the Board of Trade. In 1929 in Labor's second minority government Webb became Colonial Secretary. He had begun his career nearly forty years before as a civil-service clerk at the Colonial Office! He went to the House of Lords as Lord Passfield. He was not a successful minister. He had given innumerable effective lectures in his life, but his voice was insufficiently audible in that august chamber, and he had compiled so many admirable memoranda for other people that he was not accustomed to the job of final decision and policy-making which falls to the minister rather than to the civil servant.

After 1931 he was greatly disillusioned by the Labor split and disaster, and he and Mrs. Webb retired to Passfield Corners to spend the rest of their crowded lives completing their researches and in particular studying the Soviet Union. They were determined to study socialism in action. "Old people," they remarked, "are always absorbed in something, usually themselves; we prefer to be absorbed in the Soviet Union." They visited the Soviet Union; with the help of translators they read innumerable documents and books; they interrogated visitors to Russia of any nationality who could be induced to visit them in their home. At this period it was a remarkable and somewhat exhausting experience to spend the weekend at Passfield Corner. The visitor returned to London feeling that he had enjoyed an intellectual feast of the highest possible quality; given a strong digestion, the stimulus and nourishment would last for many days.

The Webbs always said that the English climate was the best in the world, because it was "never too hot or too cold to work or to walk." They did both tirelessly, and they had no desire to do anything else. They were never interested in the arts. Indeed, Bernard Shaw has often said that in the early days of their association the Webbs regarded him as a totally impossible person, an artist who refused to be fitted into any classification. So they put him into a special category of "sprites." They were prepared, in other words, to recognize that there were strange people who could not be dealt with as consumers or producers or people in need of some special form of state aid.

Unlike Sidney, who was the most simple and single-minded of people, Mrs. Webb was always interested in religion and in the complexities of human character. She asserted in her brilliant autobiographical volume, "My Apprenticeship," that she would have liked to write novels. But their concentration on social problems is well illustrated by two authentic stories. For a short time Lowes Dickinson, philosopher and poet, joined the Fabian Society. He told me that he left because Mrs. Webb said that "marriage is the wastepaper basket of the emotions." The other story has been repeated recently in the House of Lords. The Webbs on one occasion went to a performance of "Parsifal." When asked whether he enjoyed it, Sidney said with some enthusiasm that he had enjoyed the evening immensely because he was fortunate in sitting behind Lord Samuel and was able to have an "interesting conversation with him during the interval about the incidence of sickness during pregnancy." Such stories naturally accumulated round the Webbs, who did in fact live very much in that atmosphere of simple living and high thinking which H. G. Wells satirized in his caricature of them in "The New Machiavelli." It was therefore a surprise to many people to learn that when they were courting in Epping Forest they read together not government reports but the works of Wordsworth, who was always Sidney Webb's favorite poet.

It is a common delusion to think of the Webbs as inhuman. On the contrary, Mrs. Webb was very human indeed. She could lose her temper and show claws that could scratch. She was a fascinating mixture of aristocratic superiority, intellectual impatience, and puritanical morals. She was the most brilliant woman of our time, strikingly beautiful in appearance, swift in apprehension, and, like Sidney, utterly devoted to the public good. She was always interested in people and the play of politics, and her diaries when they are published will be full of inside stories and penetrating studies of her younger contemporaries. But in contrast to Mrs. Webb, who came from a wealthy family and never really got rid of upper-class prejudices, Sidney seemed devoid of class and was the most reasonable mortal who ever lived.

He was in fact infinitely kind and above the petty spites and jealousies of public life. I should say that his outstanding quality was his disinterested generosity: he wanted to see his ideas put into practice and never cared who got the credit. All his life ideas for political and social improvements bubbled from him like water from a well. It was a refreshing and energizing stream, which by its quality of sweet reasonableness has been the most potent and valuable influence in British politics for the last forty years.

mano has been conducting a subtle and unrelenting campaign against Russia and Russian satellite countries, especially Yugoslavia, in connection with the recent trials of Catholic clergymen. The Vatican argues that while the Pope is trying to do everything in his power to bring peace, the Communists, under orders from Moscow, are building up the material and spiritual conditions that lead to war.

Del Vayo—Inter-American Reaction

A STRONG wind of reaction is blowing across Latin America. As World War II drew to a close, everybody hoped that the hour had struck for the economic and political liberation of that great area of the Western Hemisphere where the Four Freedoms are just a rhetorical expression. Many of these countries needed only new capital and the reform of their oligarchic structures to release tremendous potentialities and create new, prosperous economies. Millions of poor devils, euphemistically classified as workers and farmers, looked to the Allied victory as the beginning of a new era; in 1944 freedom seemed close at hand. Today fascism is rapidly reconquering in Latin America part of the power it lost in Europe. A careful study of developments in the countries to the south over the past two years reveals—with a few honorable exceptions—a steady retrogression.

It is unnecessary to review the familiar cases of Paraguay and the Dominican Republic—little comic-opera dictatorships set against a backdrop of blood and buffoonery. No one is surprised at the frauds and repressions perpetrated by the second-rate caudillos of these countries, for theirs is an old story dating from before the war.

But what about a country like Chile, whose liberal tradition has been the pride of the Americas and where only a year ago the election of Gabriel Gonzalez Videla seemed to have brought to power—as I said at the time—a man capable of producing a presidential record comparable with that of the Mexican Lázaro Cárdenas? In a strike against the mining companies, whether Chilean or American, I would have expected Gonzalez Videla to nationalize the mines—not to declare war on thousands of workers whose average wage is less than a dollar for an unbroken eight-hour day. He has sent an army to protect the United States-owned copper mines at Chuquibambilla and Potrerillos in northern Chile; he has set up military tribunals to try strikers throughout the mining region; he has exiled strike leaders to remote regions; and according to latest reports, he is preparing to ask Congress to lift the parliamentary immunity of deputies and senators of the Communist Party, which only a year ago participated in the government. A special cable to the New York Times on October 23 reported that "activity against suspected Communists has been intensified since the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia."

The latest word is that the President has asked the other Latin American countries to follow Chile's example and break with Russia. One would have expected such a move from Perón—but never from Gabriel Gonzalez. I am sorry to have to write these words, for he has been a most devoted supporter of the Spanish Republican cause and an excellent friend of mine for years. The only explanation I can find is that the temporary insanity that has seized so many public men here and in Latin America has caught even such a militant radical as Gonzalez Videla.

Brazil, at least, was able to find a plausible pretext—an unfriendly article about President Dutra in the Moscow Literary Gazette—for breaking with the Soviet Union. But the Chilean government did not even wait for a pretext; it simply severed diplomatic relations with Russia, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia, charging that certain labor groups in Chile were acting on orders from Moscow. Why Czechoslovakia was included remains a mystery; the only possible explanation lies in the theory of puppet states so dear to the typewriters of North American journalists. One of these days some ill-tempered editorial writer for Pravda will apply the theory in reverse and affront the dignity of the Latin Americans by describing the agility with which some of them adapt themselves to the political moods of Washington.

The coincidence between the policies of the United States and its good neighbors cannot be ignored. The anti-Soviet trend existed, it is true, in a number of countries, but it did not become official policy until the Inter-American Conference in Rio de Janeiro. There, according to reliable sources, plans for an anti-Communist offensive throughout the Western Hemisphere were thoroughly discussed at a meeting behind closed doors that was not reported in the press. This was logical enough. The military coordination of the Western Hemisphere for an eventual third world war would naturally be complemented by the political organization of a new "anti-Comintern" south of the Rio Grande. But it is disturbing that two countries of the importance of Brazil and Chile should have initiated the break with Russia. In spite of greater tension between the United States and Russia, in spite of the Truman Doctrine and the whole policy of containment, Washington has not gone to such drastic lengths. It would be ironical if one day the situation should improve and the Latin American states be forced to a sudden undignified scramble to restore relations. (I happen to be one of those who believe that at the coming Foreign Ministers' Conference in London the tension will relax.)

It is even more disquieting that leaders like Gonzalez Videla, Haya de la Torre, whose Aprista Party in Peru approved Chile's action, Grau San Martín, now bitterly hostile to the Cuban Communists with whom he had until recently excellent relations, and other leaders of Socialist or progressive middle-class parties have succumbed to the hysteria of the right. For in the end, if the present epidemic spreads, it will not be these men but rather such colonel-dictators as Rafael L. Trujillo and Juan Perón who will assume dominance in Latin America. The mistake of the European democrats who accepted Franco out of fear of Stalin will be repeated all over again in this hemisphere. It is the old mistake of believing that Socialists, liberals, and conservatives can together forge a coalition against communism which will result in a democratic victory. Such a plan would make sense only if liberal and Socialist forces could play a decisive role. But the experience of the last two decades proves that in such an alliance the crystallization of power is always around the extreme right, and the victor is always reaction.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Too Much Money

THE basic cause of an inflationary rise in prices, such as we are now experiencing, is an increase in the supply of money without a corresponding increase in the supply of goods. Consequently, while inflation may be curbed by price controls, provided that there is widespread public cooperation in their enforcement, a real cure can be effected only by reducing the supply of money or by increasing the supply of goods or both.

For the past year we have, as a nation, been pinning our hopes on the second alternative. In the summer of 1946, when the debate over OPA was raging, the N. A. M. told us in full-page advertisements that the sole obstacle to a great expansion in production was the price-control system. Once free markets were restored, so the argument ran, production would zoom and competition would take care of prices. It is now a year since the OPA was junked, and the cost of living is 23 per cent higher than it was in mid-1946 and still climbing rapidly. Along with the rise in prices there has been a tremendous increase in profits for most industries but nothing like a commensurate increase in output. This is clearly shown by the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production (1935/39=100), which stood at 189 in January and reached a peak of 190 in March. In September it was 185, only 5 points above September, 1946.

We cannot blame labor troubles for this lag in production, for there have been few of importance in the past nine months. And while there is much talk about low labor productivity, such evidence as exists on this subject indicates that output per man-hour is on the up grade. We are forced to assume therefore that some industries, at least, have about reached output limits on the basis of present plant and available supplies of man-power and raw materials. The last of these factors seems to be a particularly troublesome bottleneck. For instance, numerous plants using steel as a raw material are unable to get large enough supplies for full-time operations, and their lag in output slows down production elsewhere. Thus the freight-car industry in recent months has been delivering less than half the units it is equipped to turn out, and lack of freight cars is forcing many coal mines to shut down two or three days a week.

While the supply of goods has been limping, the supply of money has bounded forward. This is not, as Senator Taft implied recently, mainly the result of high wages; it is due largely to a rapid growth in private borrowing. A report recently issued by the Institute of Life Insurance shows that personal indebtedness now stands at $45 billion compared to $32.7 billion in 1944. Of this increase $7.5 billion is accounted for by non-farm home mortgages—a reflection of the acute housing shortage. The remainder is represented by a rise in consumer credit, which at $10.9

billion has practically doubled. This jump has occurred despite the fact that until now the Federal Reserve Board has imposed checks on instalment selling. Its authority to do so expired on November 1, another victim of the Republican drive to abolish all controls. That undoubtedly means added fuel for the inflationary fires.

Still more serious in its implications is the rapidly mounting volume of credit which the banks are extending to industry. "Since the middle of the year," Chairman Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board declared a few weeks ago, "total loans and investments of commercial banks have been expanding at a rate equivalent to \$10 billion a year. If this should continue it would provide an inflationary force more than double the anti-inflationary effect of the prospective surplus in the federal budget." The traditional means by which a central bank combats credit inflation is raising interest rates, and in the past few months there have been cautious moves in this direction. The Reserve Banks have stopped buying ninety-day Treasury bills at $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent—the rate at which they were pegged throughout the war—and this has led to a slight hardening of short-term money rates and to a modest fall in the price of long-term government bonds. But the manipulation of interest rates is a two-edged weapon. Encouraging them to rise far enough and fast enough to exert a real influence on credit would mean additions to the already heavy cost of carrying the national debt. And, more immediately, it would force a sharp fall in quotations of outstanding government bonds and so impair the financial position of the banks, which have a large part of their assets invested in such securities.

In their last annual report the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board asked Congress to provide it with greater powers over the investment and loan policies of member banks. They wished to be able to limit the amount of investments and longer-term loans which each bank may make and to check the sale of short-term governments—the device used by the banks to swell reserve deposits and so increase their basis for making longer-term private loans.

At the time the report came out Congress was busy depriving the Federal Reserve Board of its limited power over consumer credit; so it is hardly surprising it ignored this new request. Moreover, the banking community lost no time in making it clear that it was hotly opposed to quantitative controls of bank portfolios.

We have now reached an inflationary stage when the refusal of this medicine may lead to an operation of a painful nature. The authorities have the power to raise reserve requirements in the New York and Chicago districts to 26 per cent, or by some $1.2 billion in New York alone. Since the New York banks have no excess reserves at this time, such an increase would force a large-scale realization of investments, causing a wide break in government-security prices. A further result would be the calling of many commercial loans, which would force the borrowers to dump inventories on the market as a means of raising cash. Obviously the authorities will be reluctant to take a step of this kind, which might easily swing us from violent inflation to violent deflation. But if Congress refuses to provide them with other tools to limit credit expansion, they may be compelled to use dynamite.

The Intimate Robinson

UNTRIANGULATED STARS. The Letters of Edwin Arlington Robinson to Harry de Forest Smith (1890-1905). Edited by Denham Sutcliffe. Harvard University Press. $5.

ALREADY at twenty-eight," says Robinson's distinguished French critic Charles Cestre, "he was in full possession of the qualities of content and of form which put him in the first rank of American poets." This early maturity has hitherto been a mystery only slightly dispelled by Robinson's brief account of his apprenticeship, "The First Seven Years," and by passages from his letters to Gledhill printed in the "Selected Letters" and in Mr. Hagedorn's biography. Now we have abundant information in this first major collection of Robinson's early letters. To the most intimate friend of his youth, later an inspiring teacher of Greek at Amherst, the poet unlocks his mind and heart. He permits us to date the composition of many poems appearing in his first three volumes and to watch the development of his craftsmanship through early drafts. Better still, we observe how the major themes of the poetry grew out of the ordeals of the poet's life.

These 158 letters to Harry de Forest Smith have been fortunate in their editor. Reared in a Kennebec River town near Robinson's Gardiner and formerly a teacher at Harvard, where Robinson passed two student years which were the greatest experience of his youth, Mr. Sutcliffe has been admirably prepared to explore allusions in ample notes and to provide an introduction that promotes sympathetic understanding of the poet and the poetry. Only in one respect does his interpretation seem to stray from the evidence of the letters. He represents Robinson's young manhood as too somber, disregarding the unfailing play of boyish humor and the moods of exaltation when his writing was going well. It is not common to find a scrupulous annotator of a text in difficult handwriting so sensitive to the large issues of biography and of social and literary criticism. These letters, Mr. Sutcliffe observes, fail to support the conception of the young Robinson as a self-conscious rebel in literature, in religion, in economics and politics. Charles Eliot Norton seemed to him the only great man at Harvard; and Norton's vivid illustrations of how the America of the nineties was stifling art started his gradual movement toward social criticism.

In the years after college his instinct was to escape into the Bohemia described in the alluring pages of "Pendennis" and "Tribly," or even to become an expatriate like Henry James, whom he greatly admired; yet the family and material ties that bound him to uncomprehending Maine made him a poet, as Mr. Sutcliffe acutely observes. The clash of his ambition with his environment is the dramatic core of these letters.

Written for his friend's eyes only, sometimes with injunctions that they be burned, they are a faithful, often week-by-week report of the state of Robinson's mind and heart from the bewildered years between high school and college through a period of growth and frustration until Theodore Roosevelt directs national attention to his neglected verse. Printed in their entirety, mingling the trivial with the important, they take on accents of unconscious nobility in crises. There is a cry from the depths of the poet's soul when his disappointment in love is followed immediately by news of Smith's approaching marriage, which threatens the only intimacy upon which he could lean in moments of discouragement. But he surmounts this trial by catching a vision of his uniqueness as an artist, born for a purpose transcending personal passion. Two years later the tragic death of his mother puts to a severer test the belief in the spiritual meaning of the universe which he had been building up as a protection of his art against the largely unconscious materialism of the time. The letter beginning in a matter-of-fact tone with, "How long do you think a man can live in hell?" and moving through an utterly convincing description of that hell to renewed spiritual affirmation may find a place in American literature comparable to that of Carlyle's Everlasting Nay and Everlasting Yea in English.

These letters illuminate Robinson's literary apprenticeship. They tell who his models were, including Frenchmen and Greeks who have hitherto only been guessed at. We follow the gradual shift of his taste from romancers like Blackmore, Black, and F. Marion Crawford, in whom he found escape from an uncongenial environment, to the realists and naturalists, who taught him that there was "poetry in all types of humanity—even in lawyers and horse jockeys—if we are willing to search it out." The letters do not support the theory that Robinson was a prose writer who strayed into verse. The short stories over which he toiled immediately after Harvard were a compromise with the pressure to prove that there was money in writing. Poems kept interrupting them until he surrendered himself to poetry. His poems were so much a visitation from outside himself that he casts aside false modesty in speaking of them. He avows that he has originality and "the Hellenic spirit"; he appraises the qualities of his style and indulges in minute self-analysis which prepares us for his later psychological poems. The pride of the young genius comes out in disparagement of popular taste. But pride is tempered by humility before the ideal of perfection: "I may never get it, but I can climb and make myself believe that I shall." EMERY NEFF

New Business for Business

OR FORFEIT FREEDOM. By Robert Wood Johnson. Doubleday and Company. $2.50.

THE alternative implied in the title of this pleadingly earnest book is suggested on the fly-leaf: "People must live and work together. . . ." It is spelled out in detail in a volume that is keenly intelligent in its analysis of the American economy, somewhat wishful in its recommendations, and probably obnoxious to most of the industrialists it is intended to reach. For although Mr. Johnson has some critical and convincing things to say about certain trade-union practices, it is on business that this prominent industrialist places the chief blame for the probability that our whole economic system is now "staggering" toward collapse." Indeed, he writes, "most basic ills of our business system stem from business itself; labor's power has developed too recently to have much historical importance."

With a record as chairman of the board of Johnson and Johnson, vice-chairman of the War Production Board, chairman of the Smaller War Plants

Corporation, and a brigadier general in army ordnance, Mr. Johnson cannot even remotely be charged with cherishing hopes for socialism. On the contrary, his overriding concern is to "get the system of private enterprise going, and get it going now," before "some other system is forced upon us—not by revolutionaries from Europe [Thomas committee, please note] but by popular demand." Salvation, he thinks, will not come from government—he does not believe that "bureaucrats will do what free men have not done"—but can come only from business itself, and only when business is ready to "discard some long-held and deeply cherished doctrines that violate present-day facts."

Chief among these offending doctrines is Adam Smith's principle of "Laissez faire, laissez passer," out of which grew a "code of business freedom that bordered on nihilism." When Herbert Spencer "welded Smith's economics to Darwin's theory of natural selection," the new industrial barons received philosophical "authority for competition as ruthless and impersonal as that waged by weeds and wild beasts." Greed, exploitation, strike-breaking, lockouts, injunctions, the perversion of government, and all the other sordid aspects of a rampant capitalism followed naturally. The great depression of the thirties and the popularly supported measures of the New Deal brought this era to an end, Mr. Johnson believes, though a few rugged individualists continued "to make themselves offensive as well as ridiculous."

But now business is committed to an error far greater than the social immorality of rugged individualism. It has failed to realize that "the laws of scarcity have been repealed." The preservation of the free-enterprise system, Mr. Johnson says, depends on the recognition of two premises: "that people can have the things they need, and that people intend to get them." This leads to an examination of America's potential production, the plight of the underpaid, the present anarchic method of determining prices, and the causes of labor dissatisfaction that go beyond the question of wages and hours.

Mr. Johnson sets up as his goal a nation of voluntary full production, with business preserving its independence by the mature rendering of "full service" to the community, with a pricing system that starts with the customer's ability to pay, with labor-management relations that rest not on suspicion and belligerence but on a generous acceptance of the workers' need for dignity, security, and "satisfaction in the job beyond the pay for doing it." In all these matters Mr. Johnson is specific, and his book, though of less than 300 pages, is filled with concrete proposals and suggested techniques, all informed with the knowledge of a man to whom meeting a pay roll is no novelty.

Nevertheless, there is a trusting quality about the volume that suggests Utopia rather than reality. While Mr. Johnson's voice of sweet reason calls for abundance, the steel industry wilfully curtails production in anticipation of a crash which its very conduct can only hasten; while he talks of a sane voluntary pricing system, the cost of living staggers the nation; while he cogently demonstrates the evils of underpaying millions of Americans, the business lobbyists maintain a steady pressure against any significant change even in the minimum-wage laws. As Mr. Johnson says, his proposals will either come voluntarily or they will be forced. It is well for him and other enlightened business men to plead for the voluntary method. And it is just as well for those of lesser faith in the social conscience of industry to turn to what seems to me the deeper problem of the times: how to impose government controls that achieve Mr. Johnson's objectives and still do not forfeit the freedoms that make life worth living.

ROBERT BENDNER

Still Life

PORTRAIT OF EDITH WHARTON.

By Percy Lubbock. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.

IT IS probably not the happiest combination of circumstances that brings a real gentleman to depict a real lady, and if there is anything that stands out very clearly from Percy Lubbock's delineation of Mrs. Wharton, it is that the subject and the author answer very well to that description. With what infinite grace and elegance the author stalks his prey, like a pedigreed pussycat glutted with cream and so well cared for that it can afford to pity the victim, to play with it, and let it escape with hardly as much as a scratch on its sleek surface! Not that there is much excuse for comparing Mrs. Wharton to a mouse. Even all Mr. Lubbock's wonderful circumlocution cannot disguise the fact that if he had really caught up with her, and if she had been in a position to do so, she could have fought back and almost certainly have won.

And the circumlocution is wonderful: what magnificent rumbling periods—though they are, on occasion, inclined to die away with an arch little wheeze—what soft and glancing blows, and what provocative hints at a loving and deep understanding of a woman it must have been very difficult to love! But why must he have been so circumspect, and why did the contributors whose impressions he has collected in this book respond with almost the same degree of reticence that the author shows? Surely because a bolder portrait would have revealed something of a dictatorial and demanding snob, a cold and calculating social climber, and a heart buried under the thickest layers of egocentricity, only to be partly revealed when, in old age, so many of the defenses she had so carefully constructed against the world were to be cruelly torn down. Neither the author nor the contributors were the kind of people ever to put anything so vulgar on canvas: that was certainly one advantage that Mrs. Wharton gained by choosing her friends almost exclusively from among the really well-bred.

There are so many questions that remain unanswered: why, in the first place, did she ever become a writer? She adored social life, her position in American society was unassailable, and surely nothing that she encountered at Newport, Lenox, or New York could have pushed her very far in that direction. Why did her marriage with Teddy Wharton collapse? Why did she loathe America, and why did she choose France as her place of permanent exile—where even her most sympathetic friend, Mme de Taillandier, claims that she was never completely at home? And what, above all things, was exactly her relationship with her desiccated love-object, Walter Berry, whom, rumor has it, she jilted in youth, only to be jilted by him in later life? Answers to these questions need not come under the heading of idle gossip: they must be pertinent to her development as an author and a woman, and it would seem that the reader is entitled to a little more plain speaking when not too many people remain who are in a position ever to answer them.

The book, on its own polite level, does of course do some judicious and delightful unveiling. Daniel Berkeley Updike, the founder of the Merrymount Press at Boston, contributes a nice sketch of the American years and of Teddy Wharton; Lady Abercrombie discloses Edith's pretty feet and shoes in London, thus lifting her skirts a few centimeters higher than Mr. Lubbock ever dares to do; Charles du Bos, Mme de Taillandier, Robert Norton, and Mrs. Gerald Goschen, among others, show her in various more or less becoming lights in France. Mr. Lubbock tellingly reveals her reserve and her agonizing shyness, her intrepid interest in travel and love of new places, her passion for gardening and for good talk, her wonderful sense of the ridiculous, her great capacity for charity, and her pity for the unfortunate. However, one cannot help feeling all this to be, without greater clarification of her motivations than one is given, only the outer aspect of a much deeper and more humane character than is here revealed. For caginess and omission this book is only equaled by André Gide's "Journal," and one is forced to remark that it is very hard indeed to see Mrs. Wharton clearly for all the profusion of politeness and good prose.

Barrie's Letters

LETTERS OF J. M. BARRIE. Edited by Viola Meynell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

BARRIE's famous shyness apparently affected his pen as well as his tongue, and the result is that this collection of letters is strangely colorless—even astonishingly so coming from a writer whose professional personality was his stock in trade. The letters do, if you like, afford convincing evidence that Barrie, unlike so many preachers of sweetness and light, was almost abnormally gentle, polite, and generous in private life. In the whole three hundred pages of them there is scarcely a line unfavorable to any person or writer. Stevenson and, somewhat surprisingly, Thomas Hardy were his library heroes, but he professes to admire nearly everyone he mentions. Yet even when he is writing to the persons whom he seems to have known best and liked best there is no sense of ease in his communications, whether they are cast, as they most often are, in the form of rather matter-of-fact notes or attempt, as is sometimes the case, the kind of whimsy one expects from him.

Barrie certainly did not want to be a cold man, and he was capable of such substantial generosity as the transfer of perpetual rights to "Peter Pan" to a hospital for children at a time when those rights were worth two thousand pounds a year. Yet the effect of the letters, for all their politeness, is not warm. The editor says that none

The Same Record

LINCOLN THE LIBERAL STATES-MAN. By J. G. Randall. Dood, Mead and Company. $4.50.

THIS volume of essays on various aspects of Lincoln is clearly a collection of chips from Professor Randall's workshop, where his multi-volume biography is still in progress. It contains the solid virtues we have come to expect from Randall—the unremitting industry in collating differing versions of the same episode, the meticulous analysis of evidence, the careful weighing of alternative theories. Moot Points in the Lincoln Story is a good summary of the questions still open for the biographer; and Lincoln's Sumter Dilemma is an exhaustive reexamination of the old charge that Lincoln provoked the attack on Sumter. But on the larger is-ssues of judgment Professor Randall continues in his same free-wheeling way, apparently unperturbed by the detailed critiques of the positions set forth in "Lincoln the President." The cults of Douglas and McClellan continue unabated; the Radicals are treated somewhat worse than the rebels; and the whole theory that the war might have been avoided is trotted out again as if it had never been subjected to a searching review by Bernard DeVoto in two numbers of Harper's and by other critics. Surely one function of such a volume as this would be to enable Professor Randall to answer his serious critics instead of playing the same old record as if everyone thought it was wonderful. The word "liberal" as used in the title is hardly given enough concrete meaning to serve more than a rhetorical purpose.

EURIPIDES, they say, was probably the most popular playwright who ever lived and has been performed a great many more times than even Shakespeare. For a good five hundred years he was the chief standby in a dozen cities of the ancient world, and now, after a lapse of nearly two millennia, he has come into his own again with the production of "Medea" at the National Theater. When the curtain went down after the performance I saw, spectators rose to their feet to shout "bravo" very much as if a new tenor were being welcomed at the Metropolitan, and though most of them no doubt thought that they were paying tribute chiefly to Judith Anderson's tempestuous acting, the total effect could not have been achieved without the contributions of both Robinson Jeffers, who made the new English version, and the original playwright. Euripides was wowing them—I choose my word with care—on Broadway as he had wowed them in Athens.

Even in his own day, we are told, literary conservatives regarded him as impudent and thought his clever modern versions of the old tales just a little bit vulgar. Here also, I suspect, history is about to repeat itself, and my guess is that the intellectuals rather than the populace will be inclined to make reservations concerning the current production. Already certain of my friends have expressed the opinion that Judith Anderson's performance lacks subtlety and that Gilbert Murray's version of the play should have been used instead of the new one. Concerning the first of these judgments I can only say that I was too powerfully held by the confident vigor of Miss Anderson's acting ever to ask whether or not it was good, and concerning the second only that no one who will actually compare the two versions can very well fail to see that, for stage purposes at least, that of Jeffers is vastly superior. Murray's translation is stilted and fuzzy. Its awkwardly "poetic" phrasing can hardly be spoken except in a poetical singsong fatal to any attempt at dramatic expressiveness, and its faded archaisms, though highbrows may put up with them, hang like a fog between an ordinary audience and the dramatist who is trying to reach them. Jeffers is, on the other hand, simple, perfectly clear, almost prosaic, and if he does not always succeed in avoiding clichés, even the clichés can be transformed—as Murray's poetical stereotypes could not—by Miss Anderson's acting. "Medea" is a play about a barbarian hell-cat who differed from the Greeks in nothing more conspicuously than in the fact that she saw no reason why she should not let herself go, and it is as such that she is played. I do not know whether or not anyone before me has noted how much Miss Anderson looks like the pictures of Mrs. Siddons, but she is a tragedy queen in the good old-fashioned way. John Gielgud, who directed the performance, is all but extinguished by her vehemence, and so, for that matter, is everyone else in the cast except Florence Reed, who manages to keep the nurse visible and effective. But the pallor of Jason and the rest is not anyone's fault. It is Medea's play, and Miss Anderson knows how to make it just that.

The Jeffers version omits entirely the last scene, in which Medea is carried away in a magic chariot, but that scene, so a classical friend informs me, is obviously intended in the original to be taken with tongue in cheek. In all other important respects Jeffers follows very closely not only Euripides's story but also the order of events and the general conduct of the plot. The actual words, on the other hand, he treats with the greatest freedom. He expands or cuts as he thinks fit and permits himself even greater liberties. When an image or a turn of speech seems to him ineffectual in English he quite boldly uses another for which there is apparently no warrant whatever in the text, and even that is not all, for whenever an implication of the original strikes him as likely to be interesting to a present-day audience but in need of clarification he does not hesitate to dot an i or cross a t. When, for instance, near the beginning, the nurse comments on the wilfulness of her mistress, Gilbert Murray makes her say: "Rude are the wills of princes; yea,/ Prevailing alway, seldom crossed,/ On fitful winds their moods are tossed:/ Aye, not with glory but with peace/ May the long summers find me crowned." In Jeffers she says: "Oh, it's a bad thing/ To be born of high race, and brought up wilful and powerful in a great house, unruled/ And ruling many: for then if misfortune comes it is unendurable, it drives you mad. I say that, poor people/ Are happier: the little commoners and humble people, the poor in spirit: they can lie low/ Under the wind and live: while the tall oaks and cloud-raking mountain pines go mad in the storm."

Many other crucial passages differ in the same way, but nearly always, I think, even the Murray version gives evidence of the fact that there is warrant in the original for the sentiment if not always for either the words or the emphasis. And even in the one instance where there does not seem to be warrant for even the sentiment, Jeffers's boldness may, it seems to me, be justified on the ground that he is only modernizing still further a playwright who was himself notoriously a modernizer. When Euripides makes Jason protest that he has adequately rewarded Medea for her services by bringing her from barbarous Asia to civilized Greece, there does not seem to be any hint of the possible irony which Jeffers makes perfectly explicit by allowing Jason to talk a little like a rotary-club president congratulating a refugee who has got at last to God's country. Yet even this, I confess, does not offend me. As a popular playwright Euripides would like to be made accessible again to a large public. Miss Anderson, Mr. Jeffers, and Mr. Gielgud are making him exactly that, and I do not think he would be inclined to blame them for doing precisely what he himself always did—namely, bring an old story up to date.

NIGHTMARE ALLEY" is the story of a cold young criminal (Tyrone Power) who starts as a carnival "mentalists," moves on to a Chicago night club, and is on the verge of the big time (pseudo-religion, with prospects of a personal "temple" and radio station), when two of the women he has used gum up his act. The picture goes careful just short of all that might have made it very interesting; I gather from the handed-out synopsis that a temple sequence was made which does not appear in the show. Even so, two or three sharply comic and cynical scenes make it worth seeing—Power's wrangle over "God" with his wonderfully stupid but not-that-stupid wife (Coleen Gray), a scene which has some of the hard, gay audacity of "Monsieur Verdoux"; and every scene in which Taylor Holmes impersonates a skeptical but vulnerable industrialist. In any mature movie context these scenes would be no better than all right, and an intelligently trashy level of all right, at that; but this kind of wit and meanness is so rare in movies today that I had the added special pleasure of thinking, "Oh, no; they won't have the guts to do that." But they do; as long as they have any nerve at all, they have quite a lot. The rest of the show is scarcely better than average. Lee Garmes's camera work is lush but vigorous.

"Body and Soul," which gets very bitter and discreetly leftist about commercialism in prize fighting, is really nothing much, I suppose, when you get right down to it. But it was almost continuously interesting and exhilarating while I watched it, mainly because everyone had clearly decided to do every scene to a finish and because, barring a few letdowns, scene after scene came off that way. It is never as nervy as the best of "Nightmare Alley," but of its own kind it is more solidly made. I like both pictures because in both there is quick satirical observation, a sense of meanness to match the meanness of the worlds they are showing, a correct assumption of cynical knowledge in the audience which relieves them of the now almost universal practice of drawing diagrams for the retarded, and a general quality of tension and of pleasure in good workmanship, which now all seem to me to have been commonplace of American movies of the early thirties and which rarely appear now without looking like cautious museum copies.

"Song of Love" takes the Liberty of Showing Johannes Brahms declare his love for Clara Schumann; but at least things aren't made easy for them by showing Robert having a petulant shindy with Lola Montez, Franz Liszt, or a bottle. In fact, Schumann reacts to the news like a gentleman, rather than a stallion disputing a question of overtime; thereby giving the movies practically their unique maturely intended scene on that subject. Liberties are also taken with the music; even so short a piece as Brahms's G-Minor Rhapsody is haggled to bits. I don't like these kinds of license even when they are excusable, or unavoidable. But very much to my surprise I did rather like "Song of Love." All such inaccuracies and mutilations, and some clumsy casting, and some wrongly styled acting, were in my feeling more than counterbalanced by the real tenderness and quiet in which the picture was obviously undertaken. About Arthur Rubenstein's back-screen performances, in the manners of the various musicians, I don't feel competent to judge. But whether or not it was in fact appropriate to Clara Schumann, I liked the contained, splintering-crystal style that was given her; thought Brahms gave a surprisingly subdued performance of his Rhapsody; and I think they would have been wise to call in Horowitz to double for Liszt's playing.

"Ride the Pink Horse" is practically revolutionary for a West Coast picture; it obviously intends to show that Mexicans and Indians are capable of great courage and loyalty, even to a white American, and can help him out of a hole if they like him. In a particularly gratifying scene the star-director, Robert Montgomery, escorts a young Indian girl, Wanda Hendrix, into the dining-room of the best hotel in a small New Mexico town, and the reactions of the diners and hired help are recorded with simplicity, accuracy, and courage. But she is shown also to be no serious threat in any traditional movie sense—a mere child with a crush on the white hero, not a possible sweetheart, and something of a little savage at that; and in spite of good intentions the chief Mexican, Thomas Gomez, is just a character actor. As for the central quarrel of the story, it is so carefully vague you can hardly follow it. Montgomery, for so many motives so dimly stated and so contradictory that you can believe in none of them, is trying to blackmail a war profiteer (well played by Fred Clark) whose exact crime, even whose business, we never learn. Whether it is dread of libel suits, the so-called international so-called style, or plain blind habit, few American films ever manage really to specify a character or a situation so that either can achieve personal life or general applicability; people merely dance their way, more or less ingratiatingly, through a sequence of windy generalizations. They are not by any fat chance intended to be confused with any persons living or dead or who might ever possibly have lived.

"Monsieur Verdoux" is again in circulation. Because I am leaving town for vacation, I haven't yet had a chance to check on the three "minor" cuts I hear have been made. If you can't get a vacation, by all means see it—and René Clair's "Man About Town," a mainly delightful movie which I saw too late for inclusion in this review.

I haven't seen "Variety Girl," but H. B. Darrach, of Time, has, and I think posterity should have the benefit of his definitive description of one of the players, Elizabeth Scott, as "a Milton Caniff version of the Mona Lisa."

EVEN among the best ensemble pianists Franz Rupp is outstanding. What he creates around someone's playing or singing—a progression excitingly beautiful as playing of the piano, and exciting also in its continuous musical life, the musical continuity from one sound to the next—places him among the greats of our musical world. It represents gifts of the magnitude of theirs—not only the specific gift for ensemble performance, but gifts for the piano and for music which he has devoted, all these years, to creating musical life around the playing or singing of someone else. When he has used them long enough in the creation of autonomous musical life in performances of his own, his performance of Schubert's great posthumous A Major Sonata will have not only the over-all coherence of sections that it had in Town Hall recently, but the unflinching musical continuity from every sound to the next that it did not have; and the achievement of this musical continuity will bring with it the achievement of the finer gradations of tone that were lacking in that recent performance. I feel able to predict all this because he achieved it in smaller works—in Chopin's F minor Ballade, which he played with beautiful lyricism and plasticity (but without the customary mannered distortion of phrase, and built up to a hair-raising climax; and in exquisitely colored performances of Debussy's "Soirée dans Grenade" and "Reflets dans l'eau."

At one of the New York City Symphony concerts at City Center I heard young Arnold Eidus, winner of the international violin competition in Europe last year, and got a lot of pleasure from the elegance of the style in which he played his instrument and produced those lovely sounds from it—a style which a friend told me was very much like Thibaud's in his young days. I also enjoyed the musicality that revealed itself in Eidus's unaffected phrasing of some passages of the Mendelssohn concerto; but he played a great deal of the work with the distortions of the traditional virtuoso performance. And the joint performance of soloist and orchestra sounded as though Leonard Bernstein had given all the rehearsal time to other works on the program. One of these, Copland's "Statements," did not seem to me worth the trouble that had been taken with it; another, Gershwin's "An American in Paris," got an over-playing of detail that destroyed the continuity and effect of the work as a whole.

But at other concerts Bernstein demonstrated the powers required to get a by no means first-rate orchestra through a work as difficult as Stravinsky's "Scènes de Ballet," and to produce with this orchestra and the brilliant Tossy Spivakovsky a superbly assured performance of Stravinsky's Violin Concerto; and there was also an excellent performance of Piston's Violin Concerto with Hugo Kolberg. I have recently begun to get some enjoyment from certain of Stravinsky's later works that I didn't use to get; and I got it from occasional details in these two; but I still didn't care for them in their entirety. As for the Piston, I found the first movement engaging for once, but the rest just the usual meaningless rattle and clatter.

What one might have expected the New York City Opera Company to do poorly it has done astonishingly well—first Strauss's "Salome," and now Mozart's "Don Giovanni." The faults are mostly in what one sees on the stage—caused partly by the inadequacies of the City Center stage, and partly, in my opinion, by the poor taste of H. A. Conde, who designed the permanent set for "Don Giovanni," and by the pretentiousness of Theodore Komisarjevsky, who thought up some of the innovations in its staging. And it is the musical performance conducted by Laszlo Halasz that is so surprisingly good: I wasn't prepared to hear "Don Giovanni" sung as well as it was by James Pease, Norman Cordon, Brenda Lewis, Ellen Faull, Virginia Haskins, and Eugene Conley; and the only thing to criticize is the American enunciation of the Italian words, especially by Pease.

Of the rest of the repertoire I heard only Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," which was done very badly.

Apparently Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II felt they must do something higher and nobler than merely writing some of the best musical shows we have had; and so they wrote "Allegro," a musical morality play, which—except for the periods occupied by a couple of good musical comedy songs—had me squirming with embarrassment all evening. On the other hand, "High Button Shoes," just a Broadway musical written by people I had never heard of—Jule Styne, Sammy Cahn, and Stephen Longstreet—which I went to only out of interest in Jerome Robbins's dances, turned out to be very amusing, with a Mack Sennett ballet by Robbins that is one of the most brilliant things I have ever seen.

A Public Radio Rather Than a Code

Dear Sirs: The radio is the single most important source of recreation and information for the overwhelming majority of the American people. Ergo, the proposed new code of standards for the radio industry should be of vital public interest. It is immediately apparent, however, that the code is being discussed, and will eventually be adopted, only by the radio-industry management. The result of this government by the élite in the radio industry is a culturally starved, ill-informed, and inartistic public.

The code itself actually codifies nothing but clerical bigotry and outright philistinism. All the worst features of a commercial "culture" are being officially decreed: a rigid control would tell our radio writers and artists in no uncertain terms what they are to say on such divergent subjects as religion, sex, divorce, drinking, narcotics, and matters "which are not acceptable conversational topics in mixed social groups."

Art has its own laws and can serve the public only if the artist is allowed freedom of expression. The best in the arts is not usually concerned with propaganda in any field—politics, religion, or even morality. Nevertheless, artists do have views on these subjects, and these views often become integral factors in their art. The code, as can be seen from the following direct quotations, would allow time on the air only for those artists who conform to the narrow concepts of morality which are propounded by vested institutions, chiefly the Catholic church: "The subject of religion should invariably be treated with respect"; "a priest or minister, when portrayed in his calling, should be vested with the dignity of his office"; "adultery and other infractions of moral law should not be made a vehicle for suggestive or offensive lines"; "insobriety or excessive drinking should not be portrayed as desirable or prevalent factors in American life, and reference thereto should be kept incidental to the development of plot or character"; "narcotic addiction should never be presented except as a vicious habit"; "criminals should always be punished, either specifically or by implication"; and so forth.

Implicit in all these prohibitions, of course, is the assumption that all moral problems have already been solved for eternity, and the solutions must be imposed upon all. Those who think differently, the heretics, must not be given a public hearing. Creeping into our public life here is the neo-Thomist mistrust of the democratic process.

As James T. Farrell has ably demonstrated in his booklet "The Fate of Writing in America," this tyranny has its roots in the completely commercial soil of Hollywood and the radio industry. For this reason, I believe that Americans would do well to study the policies of the government-operated British Broadcasting Corporation and New York's municipal station, WNYC—enterprises in which commercialism has been reduced to a minimum. The products of both experiments, in my opinion, are most refreshing to a listener accustomed only to the unspeakable trash of the commercial networks.

Radio's sole defense is one of inability: advertisers simply cannot afford to gamble with anything that does not guarantee an immediate audience of gigantic proportions. What democracy and art require, obviously, is elimination of the commercial factor.

Traditionally, government operation on the BBC pattern has been the only alternative posed in discussions of this kind. But government operation, the advocates of free enterprise point out with some validity, is objectionable for a number of reasons: the danger of propaganda utilization, and the fact that a bureaucratic censorship might develop which would be even more odious than the present commercial censorship.

However, it is a fallacy to assume that public ownership and control necessarily imply government management. In our Western states many communities have publicly owned power companies administered by elected committees and completely independent of all governmental bodies. Similarly, it is possible to elect independent public bodies, composed of recognized artists and scholars, to manage a publicly owned, non-commercial system of radio stations.

But a venture of this kind must be financed. The most desirable method, I believe, would be a special tax on surplus incomes, or, even better, a capital levy. And there are other possible methods: in many countries of Europe the radio is financed by a special tax levied upon all owners of radio sets, either as a sales tax at the time of purchase, or else through the sale of regularly renewable permits.

Communists Must Have Been Right Sometimes

Dear Sirs: I hope you will allow me to explain to your correspondent, J. Hayden Moore, Sr., that those of us who are genuine liberals, and have determined that it is essential to have nothing to do with the Communists, do not believe that Communists are always wrong; nor, as I read his letter, did Alfred Baker Lewis, whom Mr. Moore attempts to refute, make any such claim.

Communists have been at various times on exactly opposite sides of important labor and international questions. They were in favor of collective security against Nazi aggression, and then made a pact with Hitler. They are anti-imperialists so far as Indo-China, Indonesia, and India are concerned, and supporters of Russian imperialism in the Baltic states, Poland, and Rumania. They have appealed to the principle of national sovereignty against the alleged evils of the Marshall Plan and denied that principle when Czechoslovakia and Finland wanted to go along with the Marshall Plan.

In the labor movement they first favored and then denounced dual unionism. They have supported and opposed John L. Lewis. They supported strikes in America against national defense when Stalin and Hitler were allies, and later supported the no-strike pledge and even, alone among the ranks of organized labor, the move to conscript labor. They defend the Civil Rights Congress in the United States—in an effort to undermine the American Civil Liberties Union—and deny civil rights in countries which they control.

With such a record they must have been right at least sometimes.

The Importance of Libraries

Dear Sirs: Dr. Gumpert in his article Books and Bookkeeping in America, in The Nation of October 11, has overlooked the most important and characteristic feature of books in America—the public library.

It is possible that publishing, retailing, and personal ownership of books suffer somewhat from this free access to reading matter, but it is the very essence of our democratic tradition that no one should be deprived of the means of education. The American public library is known as "an integral part of public education." If Dr. Gumpert will visit the public libraries scattered all over the United States, he will meet the "bookish people" in every community.

The idea Dr. Gumpert presents of owning "sets" and building up a large private library seems to me undemocratic and wasteful. Aside from Shakespeare and other books of reference value, and a small selection of books that one cherishes for personal reasons, the most intelligent use of books is to pass them on to others to enjoy—to the American merchant marine and the like. Books as ornamental dust collectors fail to meet the challenge of democratic education. There is nothing sacred about a book except the message between the covers. Free access to books is the very heart of our democracy.

The Shape of Things

THE COMPROMISE PALESTINE PROPOSAL WAS the more welcome because it came after many exhausting days of haggling and delay. It is a decent compromise, yielding just enough to American and Russian susceptibilities to prevent a breakdown. That the great rival powers could agree is itself more than two-thirds of the battle; indeed, we find it impossible to believe that any plan they jointly indorse will be lost in the Assembly. The British remain to be heard from, as we go to press; but little as they like partition, it seems probable that they will accept, however reluctantly, the limited obligations involved in the new proposal. British forces would be withdrawn by next May and meanwhile would act under the authority of the United Nations while a commission, appointed by the Assembly and responsible directly to the Security Council, carried out the partition plan. While this arrangement leaves the primary job of policing to the British, their government would no longer bear sole responsibility for the policy to be enforced. And by May 1 the militias created by the two new states would presumably take over, even though the transition period would continue until July. That this scheme involves risks, no one can deny. But at least it reduces British liabilities to a reasonable minimum. In our opinion, the plan should be amended to provide for a token U. N. enforcement body, contributed by member states, to give a truly international character to the task of implementation. Perhaps this idea can be incorporated in the subcommittee's proposal in the course of debate.

THE HARRIMAN COMMITTEE, APPOINTED TO "determine the limits within which the United States could safely and wisely extend aid to Western Europe," concludes its report by asking eloquently that we apply to the making of the peace the same spirit which triumphed in war. Unfortunately, the report itself is not altogether inspired by that spirit. The committee notes correctly that the size of a "prudent program" must correspond to the availability of commodities in this country and points out that many goods urgently needed for European reconstruction are in short supply here. That being the case, we should surely put first things first, as we did in the war, and give essential European needs priority over non-essential domestic needs. Con-veyor belts for British coal mines and steel for French power stations should have precedence over conveyor belts for Montana gold mines or steel for Florida hotels. That calls for a strong allocation system, but the committee merely suggests that "the government will probably require authority to set up priorities" if voluntary measures prove inadequate. With so cautious an approach to the key problem of allocations, it is not surprising that the committee recommends a total for the whole program of $12 to $17 billion and a limit of $5¼ billion in the first year. These amounts are so much below the requirements of the stripped-down Paris program that they would necessitate drastic revision of Europe's plan for expanding its own production. Yet while recommending curtailment of American aid, the Harriman committee says sternly that, as a condition of continued assistance, participating countries must take all practicable steps to achieve the production goals they set for themselves at Paris. Does it hope for bricks without straw?

THE ADMINISTRATION'S PROGRAM OF AID to Europe will be supported in principle by a majority of Republicans, however much they may haggle over details and seek to whittle down the total bill. That fact has been made clear by statements of leading members of the G. O. P. in recent weeks, and Governor Dewey's speech at the Forbes Magazine dinner on October 5 provided the clinching proof. For Mr. Dewey, a man who never plunges into political waters until he has received a dozen expert reports on depth and temperature, came out quite strongly for the essence of the Marshall Plan. Naturally, his advocacy of aid to "freedom-loving peoples" was stated in terms of wholehearted condemnation of Russia—a safe line for any American politician these days—and was coupled with a number of sneers at the Truman Administration, including the strange accusation that it had given "aid and comfort to Communist conquest." However, New York's governor talked sense on at least one point. It would be a mistake, he said, to deny aid to countries attempting Socialist experiments. "In the free world," he added, "economic systems are not all alike. We do not share the Socialist ideas prevailing in some nations and we believe some of their programs to be affirmatively dangerous. . . . I am sure in my own mind that SENATOR-ELECT JOHN C. STENNIS WILL probably never vote for an anti-lynching bill or for a Fair Employment Practices Commission, but he will look good in the Senate when we think of what might have been. Mississippi voters had a choice of six candidates to replace the late Mr. Bilbo. That statesman's attorney and political heir, Forrest Jackson, offered himself to the electorate as "the outstanding champion of white supremacy." Another contender ran an anti-labor campaign with side excursions to denounce the President's Committee on Civil Rights. A third promised that if elected he would fearlessly "stand on the Senate floor and tell Joe Stalin to go to hell." Then there was John Rankin, who, promising to "out-Bilbo Bilbo," offered the world the "Rankin plan," which calls for Europeans to "go back to work" and opposes "an international WPA to feed every lazy lout from Tokyo to Timbuctoo." Stennis himself virtuously avoided all mention of race and concentrated on proposed farm improvements for the people of his rural state. Last, and certainly least, was the state Republican Party in the person of L. R. Collins. We hope the people of Mississippi, who are said to be extremely sensitive to outside pressures, will not consider it indelicate of us to express our gratitude for their choice, the Senate being, after all, a national body.

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION CELEBRATED ITS thirtieth anniversary in an atmosphere of world crisis not unlike that which greeted its birth. Having survived a generation marked by civil war, foreign intervention, the rise of fascism, and World War II, the Soviet state quite naturally greeted itself with expressions of congratulation and confidence. But difficult years lie ahead. Inside Russia, the Five-Year Plan progresses, as Molotov pointed out, though not at an even pace. Heavy industry is advancing; other kinds of production are lagging in varying degrees. In agriculture, the damage inflicted by the 1946 drought has been compensated for by this year's excellent harvest, giving Soviet leaders an opportunity both to raise the bread ration at home and to make favorable trade deals with neighboring countries and even with the West. In foreign affairs, on the other hand, Russia seems to be retracing the rough road traveled thirty years ago. The history of 1917-20 offers many uncomfortable parallels with today's events, while some of the Soviet documents of that period—for instance, the famous letter from Chicherin to Wilson on October 24, 1918—are recalled, in all their vitriolic indignation, by Vishinsky's current recriminations at Lake Success. The tension that has developed between East and West can be relaxed only by an immense effort on both sides. The coming London conference of the foreign ministers provides a new chance for reasonable negotiation on the central issue arising out of the war—the treatment of Germany. If East and West can reach an agreement on that issue, the Soviet Union will have every reason to celebrate.

ANY DOUBTS ABOUT THE REAL MOTIVATION of the recent Washington investigation into communism in Hollywood, have been removed by the subsequent behavior of the Hearst press. As the climax to a series of ranting articles by Rupert Hughes of the Motion Picture Alliance for the Preservation of American Ideals, the Hearst newspapers have now come out for federal censorship of motion pictures. In a front-page editorial appearing in the Hearst press on November 5, the argument is raised that since the film industry has refused to conduct a sweeping purge of employees, there is no recourse but to censor films. This proposal will not be surprising to those who have followed the activities of the Motion Picture Alliance, which was sponsored and godfathered by the Hearst press. From its inception in 1944, the Alliance has raised a constant hue and cry about "communism," thus providing the Thomas committee with a pretext for an investigation aimed at imposing a rigid censorship on the industry. Although warned that this was the real purpose of the committee, the industry at first refused to believe it and tried to make its peace with Thomas by indulging in some fancy red-baiting. But the Washington hearings apparently convinced the producers, at last, that a trap was being sprung; from this trap they managed to step back just in time. Momentarily defeated, Thomas will return to the attack, after first letting the Hearst press and his other allies work up a campaign for censorship. In the meantime, of course, the hearings have already imposed a large measure of self-censorship not only on the industry but on those who write, direct, and produce motion pictures.

IF FREDERICK H. ECKER READ THE PAPERS the day he got a medal at the Waldorf Astoria in New York, he must have noticed that the Committee on Civil Rights had just issued its brilliant report. Mr. Ecker, who is chairman of the board of Metropolitan Life, was awarded the medal for his "achievements in the field of better housing," which means for building Stuyvesant Town and other projects. But to honor this achievement is also to honor Jim Crow, as signs carried by pickets of the Joint Committee for Equality in Housing announced to passers-by on Park Avenue. Stuyvesant Town, which is tax exempt, and its adjunct, Peter Cooper Village, which is not, accept no colored tenants. Metropolitan frankly acknowledges its discriminatory policy; in fact, when Mr. Ecker received his medal he defended the practice as "a matter of business and economics." This, on the day the President's committee had specifically cited Metropolitan Life as violating the precept that "equality of opportunity to buy or rent should exist for every American"! Yet perhaps a little apprehension was mingled with Mr. Ecker's arrogance; the ceremony at the Waldorf really called for no defensive statement. Did his morning paper and a hundred rain-drenched pickets disturb him? We hope so. It is time Metropolitan Life began to worry about the public-relations effect of its ugly doctrine.

TWENTY-THREE NATIONS HAVE SIGNED A general trade agreement at Geneva which President Truman has hailed as "a landmark in the history of international relations." Never before, certainly, have trade barriers been attacked on so broad a front. The agreement includes a series of provisions barring or limiting such practices as discriminatory restrictions, exchange controls, internal taxes, customs methods, and so forth. Attached to it is a list of tariff concessions covering 45,000 different items which are included in 123 separate but interrelated bilateral agreements between 19 countries. Under the most-favored-nation clause, a concession made to any country applies to every other in the group. During more than six months of the Geneva conference, the toughest negotiations appear to have been those between the United States and Great Britain. We wanted substantial reductions in Empire preferences, and the British insisted on important cuts in American duties on both British and Commonwealth products. The detailed results of the bargaining will not be known until November 18, but meanwhile we note that Harold Wilson, president of the British Board of Trade, has been assuring critics that the agreement does not weaken "the economic cooperation of the Commonwealth." Simultaneously, Winthrop Brown, who signed the agreements on behalf of the United States, declared that none of the concessions made by this country will endanger the existence or seriously damage any American industry. Nevertheless, when the lists are published, we anticipate plenty of howls from interested parties in both countries, with the volume of sound in direct proportion to the value of the results achieved.

Trouble in Kashmir

A SERIES of swift and dramatic moves has brought Kashmir into an area of international significance. Events there call for a vigilant watch, since the state is today a buffer between India and Pakistan on one side, and China and the U. S. S. R. on the other.

The partition of India and the withdrawal of British authority have left Kashmir in an exceptionally difficult position. With its southern boundaries touching both India and Pakistan, a decision to join either dominion was not easy to make. The Maharajah—a Hindu prince in a predominantly Moslem state—felt encouraged by Hyderabad's example and played for time, in the hope, perhaps, that ultimately he could declare the complete independence of Kashmir.

Unfortunately, time would not wait. Internal unrest manifested itself early this summer, synchronized with the invasion of Kashmir by the Pathan tribes of the northwest through a strip of territory now under Pakistan's control. Frightened by the prospect of combined revolution and invasion, Kashmir appealed for assistance, first to Pakistan, then to the British, and finally to India. Nehru's government was under no obligation, political or moral, to rush aid to Kashmir since the state had refused to join the Indian dominion and the administration was reactionary, corrupt and oppressive. Moreover, Sheik Abdullah, the acknowledged Moslem leader of the national movement and a man of wide influence, was in prison as a political offender for demanding popular government.

With the crisis deepening every hour, the Maharajah hastily concluded a provisional agreement with India. First, he released Sheik Abdullah and installed him as Prime Minister. Second, he agreed that Kashmir should join the Indian union temporarily in return for military assistance to prevent invasion.

In agreeing to this course, Nehru's Cabinet seems to have been influenced by considerations of security. India could not afford to take any chances of Kashmir sinking into chaos and passing under foreign control. A second reason for intervention was the fear of serious repercussions in Hyderabad, largest of the princely territories, with a population of sixteen million, of which less than two million are Moslem. Had Kashmir been overrun by looting frontier tribesmen, Hindus might have taken retaliatory measures in Hyderabad, setting off civil war in a region of India hitherto comparatively free from strife.

For these reasons, intervention appeared to New Delhi to be necessary. It is a heartening sign that Hindu, Sikh, and Moslem volunteers have been parading the streets of Srinagar, the capital, calling for unity against the common enemy. Whatever may happen hereafter in Kashmir, autocracy will not be reestablished. Sheik Abdullah has been an intimate colleague of Nehru's for many years and may be expected to cooperate with the Indian government in strengthening the democratic basis of the new administration.

Accession to the union is only provisional. When the present emergency has passed, a plebiscite will be held to decide whether Kashmir shall join India or Pakistan. Meanwhile, Sheik Abdullah's assumption of power has had a stabilizing influence on Kashmir's population, and elements which would otherwise have joined the tribesmen are now rallying round the government. Nevertheless, there seems to be some uncertainty about the adequacy of forces at the Prime Minister's disposal. Snow has begun to fall in the higher regions of Kashmir and will soon cover the entire valley. Flying operations from New Delhi to Srinagar, the sole method of sending troops and supplies to the threatened capital, will become increasingly difficult with the advance of winter. The immediate tasks ahead of Kashmir's government are to protect Srinagar and disperse insurgent tribesmen.

Nehru has raised questions, awkward for Jinnah to answer, about these large bands of tribesmen marching through Pakistan into Kashmir. Why were they not stopped en route and turned back? Was Pakistan unable or unwilling to do so? And the more serious question: where did the tribesmen get their arms and equipment? If reports are correct, the brother of the Moslem Premier of the Northwest Frontier Province was among the leaders of the invading bands. Pakistan's attitude toward Kashmir has for many months been suspiciously hostile. Essential supplies like wheat, sugar, oil, and cloth, which must pass through Pakistan, have been withheld on flimsy excuses, causing dislocation of transport and serious inconvenience to the population.

Jinnah has accused the Indian government of "fraud and violence." Nehru, in answer, has cited these incidents as evidence of Pakistan's complicity in the disturbances. It is, however, possible that Jinnah's government is powerless to prevent tribal aggression through Pakistan. One must not overlook the fact that these border tribes, accustomed for decades to live on British subsidies, have suddenly found themselves deprived of their normal means of livelihood. If this explanation is right, a glance at the map of Pakistan reveals other danger spots. The Pathan tribes of the Northwestern Frontier Province and Waziristan have natural affinities with Afghanistan that are stronger than physical or political barriers. Will they drop away and establish an independent state or turn toward Afghanistan? Once the process of redrawing the map of this little-known region commences, it may go far.

Nehru's proposal of a U. N. commission seems, in the circumstances, timely and wise. Its establishment, before fresh complications set in, should facilitate the speedy return of peace in Kashmir.

POLITICS and PEOPLE

BY ROBERT BENDINER

G. O. P. Ebb Tide

NO OFF-YEAR election, it seems, is so sparse or so inconclusive that a politician worth his salt cannot find in it something to "hail as an augury" of fantastic successes to come. If I were in the hail-and-augur business, I would rather be a Democrat this November than a Republican. Carroll Reece, who is in charge of such matters for the G. O. P., must have wriggled painfully to find in last week's results the inevitable "conclusive proof" that the American people approve his party's record in Congress.

Consider some of the material Mr. Reece had to work with. In Kentucky Democratic Representative Earle C. Clements was swept into the governorship in a landslide that ended four years of Republican control. Reece might have had an easier time minimizing the national implications of this overthrow if his own party had not pilloried Representative Clements throughout the campaign for having voted against the Taft-Hartley bill. Prices, too, were a major issue. When the returns were in, poor Reece was reduced to pointing out that Kentucky is usually Democratic after all, and that his party wasn't beaten as badly in 1947 as it had been in 1939 and 1935.

Indiana, which should logically be well up front in any visible Republican trend, must have disappointed the party chairman even more sorely. In spite of active support from Senator Capehart and House Majority Leader Halleck, local campaigns in that state went badly for the Republicans. They lost city-hall control in Indianapolis, Fort Wayne, Evansville, Muncie, and Terre Haute, and failed to wrest it from Democratic incumbents in South Bend and Gary. Hammond was the only sizable town in which they were successful. In Pennsylvania they lost mayors in such industrial centers as Allentown, Reading, and Erie, making their lone capture in Wilkes-Barre. They held on to Philadelphia's city machine, but since they have had a strangle-hold on that institution since 1884, their victory there was roughly comparable to a Roman Catholic sweep of the College of Cardinals.

It is in New York, however, that the Republicans appear to have had their sharpest setbacks. Upstate party strongholds like Niagara Falls and Schenectady elected Democratic mayors, and Erie County, apparently incensed over Governor Dewey's policy of permissive local taxation, ousted nine Republicans from the board of supervisors and gave Buffalo a Democratic City Council. The Republican boss of Erie County, unwilling to go through the expected gyrations, merely remarked to reporters, "There is nothing I have to say." In New York City the G. O. P. candidate for the Supreme Court, running with American Labor Party support, drew only half the G. O. P. votes that were given to a Republican candidate for the same office last year. And in the sole Congressional fight in the state the Republican contender not only lost, which was natural enough in a Democratic district, but trailed even the A. L. P. candidate. While I would not go so far as to characterize all this as a preview of 1948, or even as a definite Democratic trend, it is clear at the very least that last year's Republican rip tide is no longer running.

As for the election's effect on the chances of major candidates, it seems to me that only Dewey has lost ground. His chief claim to the Presidential nomination was the prospect that he would carry his own crucial state. To the extent that this prospect has been clouded by last week's spotty Republican performance, especially upstate, his chances have been weakened. And they are perhaps further diminished by the failure of Capehart and Halleck to produce victories in Indiana, both gentlemen being acknowledged backers of the Dewey campaign.

It is one of those entertaining little ironies of politics that to balance these setbacks in New York the Republicans are counting on the services of the American Labor Party, which they admire only slightly less than they do the Kremlin. Seizing on the successful effort to abolish proportional representation in New York's City Council, the Labor Party people have served solemn notice on the Democrats, who led what was in fact an unprincipled fight for P. R.'s repeal. "Tammany Hall and its allies," an A. L. P. spokesman warned, "have at long last succeeded in destroying the coalition between labor and the Democratic Party, so carefully nurtured and built by Franklin D. Roosevelt." No music could be sweeter to Republican ears, which detect in these words the promise that the G. O. P. will carry the state next year even if it should nominate J. Parnell Thomas for President. After all, the city's largest minority party, which has always gone Democratic in national elections, drew approximately 19 per cent of the city's vote last week.

The Liberal Party, gaining 57 per cent over its 1945 vote and accounting for 11 per cent of the city vote, is equally incensed over the abolition of P. R. But the story here is somewhat different. For the Liberals, as for most independent voters, a progressive Democratic platform in 1948, plus a vice-presidential candidate of stature, will doubtless wipe out the bitterness of the fight over P. R., although Liberal Party Chairman A. A. Berle has announced that his organization will press for another referendum next year. There is no breach between these two parties that cannot be healed for the purposes of a national election, especially since outstanding Democrats like Mayor O'Dwyer are known to have been privately sour on the anti-P. R. campaign. O'Dwyer's silence on the issue was as far as he could go without clashing head-on with his five county chairmen. Ed Flynn, the Bronx party boss, is fully aware of the dangers of a lasting strain, and has privately indicated that conciliatory gestures may be expected. The size of the independent vote, in Chicago as well as New York, should produce the necessary impetus. The A. L. P., however, with its strong Communist core, is probably beyond all wooing.

Political Void in Oregon

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Salem, Oregon, November 3

MOUNTAINS and mesas rise out of the uplands of the Fremont National Forest. The high plateaus are pocked with gorges. Few men would want to be over these wild solitudes in an airplane on a moonless night, with the ceiling closing down inexorably on the snowy summits. Yet the pilot thought he could make it and that by sun-up next morning they would be frying bacon and looking through the sights of their shotguns at geese from Canada in Warner Valley.

So the accident that people had speculated about ever since men in high office had taken to traveling by airplane actually happened. Forest rangers struggling through the timbered fastnesses for a day and a night on foot found the three highest public officials of their state dead at the base of a gnarled old Ponderosa pine, where the fluttering Beechcraft had finally crumpled between clouds and mountain.

Never before had the lives of the first three public men of a state been snuffed out at one stroke. The public was benumbed. It had not thought of any of the three dead men as great, but it had come to accept them and their personalities: Earl Snell, who had been twice elected governor by the most decisive margins in Oregon's annals; forty-one-year-old Bob Farrell, for five years the secretary of state; Marshall Cornet, big, jolly, and self-assured, the president of the state senate.

By a curious irony, the new governor, John H. Hall, the former speaker of the house, is one of the most unpopular men in the state, even with the Republican politicians, whose titular leader he has suddenly become. Try to imagine the complete unpreparedness among national politicians if death should reach so far into the United States government as to project John Snyder, RICHARD L. NEUBERGER has written a number of articles for The Nation on the political and economic problems of the Northwest. Last summer he contributed a series on Alaska.

overnight, into the Presidency. When the state's Republican leaders were attacking Hall for his alleged night-club, gambling-hall and race-track legal clients, they never thought that in a few weeks he would be occupying the gubernatorial chair. If any man seemed unlikely on his record to reach high office, it was Hall. In the legislature his pet bill had proposed to remove the double-recovery provision from an 1876 Oregon statute against gambling. The United States referee in bankruptcy characterized this measure as a gift to "the boys who run the gambling houses."

Hall was sworn in by his legal associate, Jay Bowerman, chief lobbyist for the dog-racing interests, which this year had a $12,438,416 "handle" at the greyhound tracks. This in itself was such an affront to the state Supreme Court that many of the justices, themselves ardent Republicans, fear their party is southbound in a hand-basket. Republican newspapers which had been denouncing Hall's legislative maneuvers are now called on to recognize him as head of the Republican Party in Oregon.

On the other side of the ledger, the political pressure is definitely off Oregon's famous liberal Republican, Senator Wayne L. Morse. Republican conservatives planned to oppose Morse in 1950 with Governor Snell. This threat was known to Morse, and it was not of small proportions. Snell never had been defeated in a political race. He had been elected secretary of state three times, governor twice. In 1942 he defeated the Democratic nominee by a five-to-one margin, a victory without duplicate in the history of the state. Now that Snell is dead, Morse has no dangerous adversary.

John G. Winant

BY LARUE BROWN

ON JUNE 12, 1945, a great crowd assembled under the temporary roof of the Guildhall in London to witness the presentation of the freedom of the city to General Eisenhower. One by one the chief men of Britain came up the narrow aisle between the banks of less distinguished spectators to be received by the Lord Mayor and sheriffs waiting in the splendor of their traditional robes. They came in inverse order of rank—aldermen, masters of the City Companies, great figures of Parliament, ranking army and naval commanders, the Archbishop of Canterbury, members of the Cabinet, Clement Attlee, Winston Churchill. Well toward the end came the call, "the American Ambassador." There had been applause in various degrees for the others, but now there was a storm surpassed only by the greetings to the Prime Minister and to the General himself. The few Americans who were there were moved, as they had been moved before, by the demonstration of the deep affection of the English people for John G. Winant.

That affection stemmed from many causes. He had come to the island fortress at the hour when Britain stood alone. He had brought the promise, soon to be translated into acts, of the good-will and material assistance of the United States. He was the official representative of the great ally. All this made for warm cordiality toward the Ambassador. But the love for the man had deeper roots. He had shared the ordeal and the perils of the English people. Along with them he had defied the bombs and the rockets. He had, like so many, had the news that his son was "missing in action" and the later anxiety of knowing him to be a prisoner, and indeed a hostage, in the hands of vindictive captors, and had refused to bargain unworthily for his release. Beyond all this he had become a symbol of the hope of men for a better-ordered world.

More significant than his close friendship with Mr. Eden and Mr. Churchill was his relation to the clerks and the drivers and the doormen of the embassy staff. It is said that he was shy and diffident. It may be so. But no one who witnessed his chance meetings with these men and women in the corridors of the embassy, who saw the warm greeting and the friendly smile, who heard the word of interest and encouragement could fail to understand why he was loved.

He had much in common with Franklin Roosevelt, to whom he was so deeply devoted that he fled the celebration of V-E Day in London to spend the evening quietly with associates who were also friends of the dead President and to talk of what the day would have meant to F. D. R. had he been permitted to see it. Like Roosevelt, Winant did not achieve his great position by accident. Coming to New Hampshire a stranger, a rich man, a teacher in a fashionable boys' school, he became three times governor of that conservative state. To do so he overthrew the long invincible Moses machine and defeated no less formidable an opponent than the late Frank Knox. He succeeded because beneath his somewhat shy and simple bearing there lay courage and sincerity and an inflexible purpose to do his part toward achieving justice and security for the common man. He was always ready to risk and he did risk his career, when personal prudence would have dictated compromise, to lead in the struggle for these ends.

Few realized the burden he carried as ambassador. It included, in addition to such incidents of normal international relations as survived the impact of the war, intimate contact with practically every phase of the all-embracing conflict. Even those close to him in London had only glimpses of the complications and difficulties which filled his long and arduous days. As a single example, the mere presence in Britain of our huge army brought a series of trying problems which arose largely out of the relation of our military forces to the civilian public among whom they were stationed. To the solution of these problems, some of which assumed the status of substantial crises, the army itself and particularly the War Department lent only qualified assistance. That they were solved was chiefly due to the firmness and good sense of Mr. Winant and to his steadfast support of those under him charged with the actual working out of acceptable arrangements with the British government.

Only when his correspondence with Franklin Roosevelt is some day published shall we know how great was his responsibility and how great his contribution to victory. He alone knew the cost to himself.

Throughout the war there was ever in his mind what lay beyond victory. In his speech of June 6, 1942, to the miners at Durham, only now published in this country, he put into words much of the outlook on life which guided his whole career. In that speech he said: "We must solemnly resolve that in the future we will not tolerate the economic evils which breed poverty and war. . . . We are committed to a common objective tomorrow. We are committed to the establishment of service to democracy . . . We must keep it wide and vigorous, alive to need of whatever kind, always remembering that it is the things of the spirit that in the end prevail, that caring counts, that hope and faith count, and that without charity there can be nothing good. That daring to live dangerously, we are learning to live generously, and believing in the inherent goodness of man, we may meet the call to 'stride forward into the unknown with growing confidence'."

This was the faith of a great American.

Why I Broke with Chiang

BY GENERAL FENG YU-HSIANG

AS A plain Chinese soldier risen from the ranks, I have always cherished admiration for the great tradition of democracy in which the United States was established and in which it is now assuming world leadership. I am grateful therefore for this opportunity to speak to the American people through the pages of The Nation. As usual I will be frank. I hope the traditional American generosity of spirit will not take offense at a soldier's bluntness.

I wish first to make it clear that over 90 per cent of the Chinese people, all except a few reactionaries in the Kuomintang camp, are whole-heartedly for peace, democracy, and liberalism. Over 95 per cent of China's intellectuals are against the status quo in China. They have faith in the Three People's Principles enunciated by Dr. Sun Yat-sen and want to put them into practice. In full accord with General Marshall, I believe that China's hope lies in these liberal and democratic elements.

To foreign observers these elements appear weak and unorganized, for Chiang Kai-shek's brutal terrorism is driving all opposition underground. Since I must protect my progressive Kuomintang comrades and other democratic groups, including the influential Democratic League, I cannot disclose their numbers or organization, but I can say that they are active in almost all the large cities of China. The people's forces, non-Communist, have been building up their power in more than forty counties in Southwest China. It is a shameless lie for Chiang to brand those whom he has persecuted as Communists. They are no more Communists than I am. As the terrorism, corruption, and inflation in China grow worse, which they are destined to do despite any amount of money Chiang may receive from abroad, the democratic forces will eventually break out into the open and bring about Chiang's downfall, just as the momentous political impact of the Three People's Principles overthrew the northern war lords in 1928. It is with Dr. Sun's spirit, therefore, that I face the task of fighting resolutely for peace and democracy in China.

FENG YU-HSIANG, the "Christian General," has been for many years the second most important military figure in China. He is also a leader of the progressive forces in the Kuomintang and last year broke with Chiang Kai-shek over the terrorism and corruption of the regime. He is now in the United States as chief of the Water Conservation Mission of the Chinese Republic, making a study of the TVA in order to draw up similar plans for the Yangtze.

OUR two peoples, the Americans and the Chinese, have had a real, historical friendship. During our war of resistance against Japan the material help and moral encouragement we received from the United States aroused our deep gratitude. After V-J Day President Truman's statement on China and General Marshall's subsequent mission further convinced the Chinese people of America's good-will and democratic ideals. I realize that when the resolutions of the Political Consultative Conference were violated by the reactionaries in my party,* the American people as well as the Chinese suffered great disillusionment. At this time full-fledged civil war had not started. It might have been prevented if the United States, instead of pouring billions of dollars into China, had then used its good offices to bring about a new agreement; if the United States had stayed out entirely—maintained absolute neutrality—the war would have petered out for lack of means. Weapons supplied to Chiang Kai-shek usually fell into the hands of the Communists. In effect, the United States armed both sides.

It is a matter of serious regret that more than three billion American dollars have been used in China to spread the fire of national destruction. And now a new effort to drive the United States into further intervention is reported in the American press. If it succeeds, both our nations will be plunged into an even sadder situation. A political loan of $1,350,000,000 to finance a three-year plan for China is suggested by William C. Bullitt in a recent article in Life magazine. The conditions of such a loan, which would include American control of China's financial, political, and military policies, have been widely discussed. But history shows that foreign money spent in intervention in Chinese political struggles is wasted; such intervention merely arouses the hatred of the Chinese people.

In 1918 the Japanese lent 500,000,000 yen to Tuan Chi-jui, leader of the northern war lords, to bolster the regime of his puppet, Hsu Shih-chang, then President of China, against the growing national movement led by Dr. Sun Yat-sen. Thousands of Japanese military advisers were sent to Tuan's armies. Other advisers tried to bring efficiency to government departments. But the only result was a gigantic wave of Chinese protests and demonstrations, the first signals of the awakening National Revolution. In a few years the northern regime was overturned, and the money of the Japanese was lost.

To be quite frank, ever since V-J Day anti-American sentiment has been growing in China. My people have never ceased to struggle against their own "bad government." The people's movements in 1916 against Yuan

Shih-kai and the Japanese and from 1918 on against Tuan Chi-jui, Chang Tso-lin, and the Japanese are fresh memories. Such nationalist upsurges are never manufactured by any one person or group. And no amount of force, from any quarter, can stop them.

MR. BULLITT'S proposal assumes that with American assistance the size of Chiang's army could be reduced and its efficiency increased. This has long been one of the reforms recommended by the Chinese. During the resistance war, in the summer of 1944, General Tang En-po was routed by the Japanese in Honan. His quick defeat and the deadly enmity his vanquished troops encountered among the local peasants, who disarmed them, alarmed the government. The people everywhere demanded army reforms. As a result, two decrees were issued—one announcing a reduction in the size of the army and the other increasing the pay of officers and men. Neither of these actually came to anything.

The strength of the army depends first of all upon the morale of the rank and file: they must be willing to fight. Chiang's soldiers are peasants who hate the civil war. They are collected by the village officials charged with enforcing the conscription order, and sent to the training centers roped and chained and half starved so that they will not be able to run away. Frequently new recruits are thrown into battle after hardly any training at all. Of course they make frantic attempts to desert. Passengers between Nanking and Shanghai often see them jump from the windows of fast-moving trains. No amount of money can make the Chinese peasant die for something he considers directly against his own interest.

Mr. Bullitt also shows his ignorance of China in suggesting the conscription of rich young men. The village officials are all and sundry in the service of the landlords, who control the countryside, and every rich young man who can be enticed into the army is immediately made an officer and seldom gets near the fighting. It would be idle to suggest that an American adviser could supervise recruiting in every Chinese village. The only way to win over the peasants is to carry out Dr. Sun's policy of "land to the tillers." But to all my suggestions on that subject Chiang has always turned a deaf ear.

In 1920, when I was commander of a brigade in Hunan, I saw with my own eyes the behavior of Tuan Chi-jui's troops, newly armed with rifles from Japan. They literally threw away their arms and ran when the revolutionary forces inspired by Dr. Sun Yat-sen advanced against them. I moved my forces south in 1926 to join Chiang, for I and all my officers and men were convinced that the government of the northern war lords must be destroyed. We were in a very bad situation. Often we had nothing to eat but plain rice soaked in salt water. But the zeal and high morale of the revolutionary army made possible the success of the northern campaign.

* Convocation of the National Assembly last winter was in contravention of agreements reached at the all-party Political Consultative Conference in the previous spring and caused the negotiations between the government and the Communists to be broken off.—
EDITORS THE NATION.

THROUGHOUT his years in power Chiang has never understood the secret of popular support. Like any northern war lord he believes in building up his own power. This is not the casual charge of an outsider but the conviction of one who has worked with him for twenty years. My close contact with him started in 1926. During the next three years he was the commander of the First Group Army and I the commander of the Second Group Army. Some grievance motivated him to order the execution of a general in his own Group Army. A mutiny followed, and he had to resign. As commander of the Second Group Army I was obliged to support him in order to insure the success of the revolution. I circulated a telegram upholding him, and he got back his command. I have worked at his side in the party and the government as well as in the army and know perfectly well his blind egoism and insistence on dictatorial power. He allows no criticism, no dissident idea. To my suggestions and advice, frequently carefully camouflaged in stories from old Chinese history, he has usually given outward approval in order to save my face. But he has never put them into practice.

Take, for instance, the army. It is a well-known fact that Chiang makes a distinction between his own troops in the Central Army and troops under other generals, the so-called "miscellaneous" armies. His criterion is not the quality of the soldiers but their commanders' personal loyalty to him. Troops which he does not consider his own loyal supporters, no matter how patriotic and well-disciplined, have received few supplies or replacements, while the Central Army has been steadily expanded and given the best equipment Chiang can afford.

During the war against Japan General Tang En-po, one of Chiang's most loyal henchmen, lost thousands of square miles in three weeks as the result of his corruption and his plundering of the villages. Instead of being punished, he continued to be favored. On the other hand, General Chang Chih-chung, one of the best of the nation's commanders, was always poorly supplied. In May, 1940, he held superior Japanese forces at bay in northern Hupeh, waiting for reinforcements which never came. He died in battle, a martyr to his country, on May 16, 1940. His forces were allowed to be destroyed simply because they were part of the miscellaneous armies. The pay in the miscellaneous armies was sometimes one-fifth that in the Central Army. The difference was deliberate—a method of building up personal power at the expense of the nation.

Mr. Bullitt imagines that American money will moderate the greed of Chiang Kai-shek's officials. Without repeating all the charges of deep-rooted corruption printed in both the Chinese and the American press, I will tell one simple story. In 1942 the official in charge of communications on the all-powerful Military Affairs Commission, a relative of Chiang's and like him a native of Feng Hwa, Chekiang Province, was proved to have sold about $17,000,000 (Chinese) worth of military rice and $10,000,000 (Chinese) worth of gasoline for his personal profit. American lend-lease supplies were involved, and the public cried for drastic action. Chiang Kai-shek thereupon used all his tactical talent to fool the public without hurting his underling. First, he ordered that the criminal be executed. Then telegrams from important military quarters demanded that the Generalissimo's order be annulled and the sentence changed to thirteen years' imprisonment. This evidently was still too much, for the thirteen years was changed to seven. The criminal was then invited to live in the mountain villa of another high official for his seven years of imprisonment. But this also was too uncomfortable; so two months later a telegram from the front brought the criminal to Chekiang Province, where he became the vice-commander of the Provincial Peace Preservation Corps. This public disgrace was countenanced by Chiang Kai-shek not only out of nepotism. The dominant reason was that Chiang himself has a number of expenses which cannot be put in the budget. The maintenance of the power of the secret police is one. Insuring the loyalty of his henchmen is another.

MORE American aid will simply increase Chiang's dictatorial power. At present all opposition to him within and outside the Kuomintang is trembling under his terrorism. Marshal Li Chi-shen, who wanted to reform the Kuomintang so that it could assume legitimate leadership in the country's affairs, was forced into exile and expelled from the party. General Yu Hsin-chin and his colleagues, who were of like mind, suffered a worse fate. Mme Sun Yat-sen is now living in Shanghai under close surveillance, not allowed to receive mail or friends freely. Members of the Democratic League are regarded as rebels: twenty Democratic League leaders were executed on October 7. Famous scholars like the economist, Ma Yin-chu, a Columbia man, and the archaeologist, Ku Mo-jo, are on the black list. About 30,000 men and women in three groups are slated to be wiped out.

Meanwhile ever since last spring, when nation-wide demonstrations against the civil war took place, professors and students have been dismissed from educational institutions. At the same time the reactionary San

Min Chu I Youth Corps and the C. C. local party machines have maneuvered to get their members admitted into schools and colleges. During the recent autumn entrance examinations, for example, party officials who had been planted some time ago in four Peiping universities stole the examination questions and passed them on to their comrades so that a block of them could get into the student bodies and control them. The theft, however, was discovered by other little functionaries, who proceeded to sell the questions for money. The scandal raged in Peking for some weeks and was only quieted by pressure from high quarters. This systematic eradication of the liberal democratic movement is driving China into the fold of the Communists.

Chiang's regime is the culmination of all bad governments in China. No amount of foreign money can save it from downfall. The United States should stop all aid to Chiang, and exert its power for peace by giving support to the middle groups—both the Democratic League and the opposition within the Kuomintang. I know definitely that such aid would be effective now, but it will be unavailing later. The United States should realize that a corrupt minority, dependent on foreign support to maintain itself in power, is a poor ally.

The Catholic Church and Education

BY PAUL BLANSHARD

BIGOTRY once again is eating its way into the vital organs of the greatest nation on the face of the earth, our own beloved America," said Francis Cardinal Spellman at the last Fordham commencement. "Once again a crusade is being preached against the Catholic church in the United States . . . now it is the growth and expansion of Catholic education which is claimed to be a constant threat to the supremacy of public education in the United States."

It is true that there has been a tremendous revival of anti-Catholic feeling in the United States in recent months, and its focal point is unquestionably the educational policy of the church. But as Protestant leaders have been quick to point out in reply to Cardinal Spellman, the new anti-Catholic sentiment is not an offensive against the church as such but a broad defensive movement against a growing educational aggressiveness on the part of the hierarchy. The new opposition is not based upon the kind of bigotry which disgraced the country during the Al Smith campaign for the Presidency. It is strongest among the liberals who have always stood most courageously for personal tolerance.

What has caused this new opposition to Roman Catholic educational policy? The immediate occasion has been the extension of bus transportation at public expense to pupils of parochial schools in nineteen states and the fight of various Catholic lobbies in Washington against any federal aid to education in which parochial schools do not share. The federal-aid fight, particularly, has raised certain basic questions about Catholic education which most Americans had never faced before. Are the Roman Catholic schools worthy of national support? Are they democratic? Do they teach responsible freedom? Do they teach tolerance and national solidarity? Non-Catholics have a right to ask these questions not only because the Catholic schools are training some 3,000,000 future citizens in more than 8,000 tax-exempt institutions but because the people have accepted the Catholic schools as substitutes for public education under state compulsory-education laws.

Public schools in the United States are controlled democratically by local school boards whose members are either elected or appointed by elected officials. Public school buildings belong to the people of each district, and the people as voters have the final say as to their use. This democratic control of education is so well established in our tradition that it is taken for granted.

The Roman Catholic parochial school, however, is owned by a priest or bishop or by a corporation or board controlled by a priest or bishop. The Catholic people of a parish do not own a single brick in their churches or schools; they do not determine whether a school shall be built, and they have nothing to say about its continuation or its policies. All control of education is in the hands of the parish priest and his bishop, subject only to the veto of the Pope.

Nuns as Teachers

THE parish priest and the bishop may hire or fire any teacher in the Catholic school system with or without reason, throw out any textbook or course of study, and shut any building. "The pastor," says the Right Reverend

PAUL BLANSHARD attracted nation-wide attention by his exposure of Tammany graft while serving as head of New York City's Department of Investigations and Accounts under Mayor LaGuardia. During the war he was a State Department official assigned to the Caribbean, and he has recently brought out a book on that region, "Democracy and Unrest in the Caribbean." This is the last of three articles on the Roman Catholic church in medicine, sex, and education.

John R. Hagan in "Vital Problems of Catholic Education" (Catholic University of America, p. 70), "is responsible by ecclesiastical law for the existence, maintenance, and conduct of the parish school. The religious superior [of the nuns and brothers] appoints the teaching staff and principal, and exercises over them a supervision which is at once religious and educational. The school board or the superintendent represents a third authority, namely, the bishop."

Below these priests and bishops in the Roman Catholic school system come the 77,000 teaching nuns who form more than 90 per cent of the teaching force in Catholic elementary schools in America. They are recruited as girls in their teens, largely by priests in the classrooms of the Catholic high schools, and are pledged to poverty, celibacy, and obedience for life. They live in the convents of their orders while they teach in the church's schools.

In the public schools teachers are reasonably free to marry and to live a life of intellectual freedom. The nuns of the Catholic schools never know the meaning of this type of freedom. Their thoughts, activities, and amusements are controlled by superiors who in turn are cut off from the cultural life of the non-Catholic community by the rules of their orders. Ordinarily the nuns are not free to read books, newspapers, or magazines of their own choice, to attend theaters or motion pictures, or to participate in any public amusements. Their carefully guided courses of training are pursued so far as possible within the Catholic educational system.

No matter how competent and devoted these nuns may be—and no one questions their industry—they do not acquire occupational tenure. They can be instantly removed as teachers or expelled from their religious orders for reasons which have no bearing on their competence as classroom teachers. Their superiors, in fact, in the convent and in the school are almost always the same persons, empowered to exercise discipline in any case of personal or intellectual insubordination. Nominal "teacher-training" courses are given in the convents, but even the shorter courses consist largely of theological indoctrination, and prospective teachers are never allowed to forget that their primary purpose in the classroom is the inculcation of the Roman Catholic faith.

This whole system of segregated schools under costumed religious teachers who are subject to the priests is almost ignored by the educational authorities of the various states. Because of the compulsory-education laws, "approving" agencies exist on the statute books in each state, but supervision of Roman Catholic schools scarcely goes beyond a perfunctory check on attendance. The most bizarre inequalities in teaching requirements exist within the closed Catholic system. Only fifteen states have any requirement whatever for certification of Catholic teachers, and only four enforce the same teaching requirements for parochial-school as for public-school teachers.

Parochial-school education is the cheapest in America, much cheaper even than Negro education in Mississippi. In 1944 Mississippi spent $42.25 per pupil; in 1937 the diocese of Indianapolis spent an average of $15.53 per pupil in five of its typical parochial schools, at a time when the corresponding expenditure in the public schools was $76.51. Roman Catholic parents who send their children to parochial schools frequently contribute only $1 a month per child to the school fund. The schools are able to operate on this financial level because the average teaching nun gets only $300 to $500 a year, paid in a lump sum to her religious order for her "keep," as against the $1,900 a year received by the average American teacher. Even the few male lay teachers in the Catholic school system are paid far below the average wage of the public schools for corresponding work.

No Intellectual Freedom

IN THESE Roman Catholic schools there is no academic freedom as non-Catholics understand the term, and no teaching of genuine religious freedom. The word "freedom" is constantly used, of course, but examination discloses it to be a semantic artifice meaning readiness to receive divine, that is, Catholic, revelation. Redden and Ryan in their standard Catholic work for teachers, "Freedom Through Education" (imprimatur Cardinal Spellman, p. 23), define the Catholic conception of freedom in unmistakable terms:

Freedom to worship God implies in its correct meaning and application that every man should acknowledge God as his creator, submit to His divine rule and will, and through the proper use of faith and reason embrace the eternal truths which alone insure salvation. This is true freedom. It is opposed to that so-called "liberty of conscience" which a "seditious and rebellious mind," dominated by man's lower nature and blinded to truth and goodness, employs to undermine, overthrow, or destroy the infallible authority of religion to guide and direct all the individual's conduct in terms of the moral law.

Under this interpretation of "freedom" no teacher in a Roman Catholic school is free to disagree with the hierarchy on any social or religious policy which the hierarchy cares to include in its modicum of "eternal truths." As Father Wilfred M. Mallon, S. J., put it in his attack on the American Association of University Professors before the National Catholic Education Association in 1942 (Bulletin, p. 193):

Freedom to teach what is true is without practical applicability unless we have a norm . . . the Catholic college norm must be not only natural knowledge but the deposit of divinely revealed truths immeasurably more certain than any truth arrived at by mere human deduction or experiment, because we have for them the guaranty of the infinite knowledge and veracity of God.

In view of the very nature and fundamental purpose of Catholic education, violations of Catholic doctrine, or of Catholic moral principles, or of the essential properties of Catholic life, on the campus or off the campus, render a man unfit for service in a Catholic college.

What does this priestly control of education mean in terms of intellectual freedom? The best answer is to list sample doctrines of the hierarchy which no teacher in the Catholic school system is free to challenge publicly without incurring penalties. I do not have the space to quote chapter and verse for each statement, but if a Catholic authority cares to challenge any one of them, I shall be glad to give my sources.

1. Franco is an eminent Christian statesman.
2. The Pope is the infallible leader of mankind, and when he speaks for the church in matters of faith and morals, he cannot make a mistake.
3. The Virgin Mary returned to the earth six times in one year and told three peasant children of Fatima, Portugal, how the Western world should handle Soviet Russia.
4. It is a grave sin for an American Catholic deliberately to join the Masons or Odd Fellows.
5. No good Catholic may positively and unconditionally approve of the policy of separation of church and state.
6. With a bow to Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas is the greatest philosopher of all time.
7. It is a sin to teach the evolution of man as a whole from animal life.
8. No Catholic has a moral right to secure a divorce even from a spouse who is syphilitic, insane, or an adulterous murderer; and any Catholic who separates from such a spouse and remarries is guilty of adultery.
9. The Reformation was a backward step in human history, and many of the worst evils of fascism and communism flow from it.
10. It is a grave sin for a Catholic to own or use a Protestant Bible.
11. The Pope is the head of a sovereign temporal power which has coequal rights with that of the government of the United States.
12. The rights of the church as educator are prior to and superior to the rights of the state as educator, and no government has the legal right to infringe upon this divine prerogative.

Campaign Against the Public Schools

IN FAIRNESS to the Roman Catholic people of the United States it should be pointed out that they have never approved of the doctrinal narrowness of Catholic education or of the idea of a segregated school system. The parochial-school system has been imposed upon them by the hierarchy at the point of a theological gun. When about a hundred years ago public schools replaced denominational schools for most American children, many Catholic parents wished to join the American community as equals in the public-school system. But Rome sharply rebuked them and laid down the flat rule that American Catholics must boycott American public schools wherever possible. This rule is now part of the canon law of the church. Although the hierarchy makes a great show of its official doctrine that the family has a primary right in educating the child, in practice no Catholic parent has a right to disagree with his priest on the subject of his child's education, on pain of the denial of absolution. The statutes of the diocese of Indianapolis on this subject are typical:

Where a Catholic parochial school exists, parents ordinarily violate the general canon law of the church (Canon 1374) if they send their children to public or non-Catholic schools. If they persist in this violation, they sin gravely and cannot be absolved until they make proper adjustment with the ordinary through the pastor (Statute 117).

In spite of these drastic penalties the majority of Catholic parents in the United States have never sent their children to Catholic schools, and since 1930 the proportion in attendance has not kept pace with the Catholic population. Catholic authorities are disturbed by this fact, and they are even more alarmed at the sharp decline of recruits for the teaching orders of sisters. The whole economic structure of Roman Catholic education would collapse if young Catholic girls could no longer be persuaded to take the veil. (Lay teachers, of course, would demand a decent living wage.) Recently a leading Catholic layman of Chicago declared that the Catholic schools can be saved from extinction only by a subsidy.

Naturally, there has been much grumbling among Roman Catholics about the separatism of a dual school system and its extra financial burden. In order to hold the people in line the hierarchy has felt obliged to conduct a continuous and bitter campaign against the public school. "Godless" is the mildest of the epithets which the anxious priests have used. Here are some quotations from a pamphlet issued by the America Press under the imprimatur of the late Cardinal Hayes—"May an American Oppose the Public School?" by Father Paul L. Blakely, S. J.

Our first duty to the public school is not to pay taxes for its maintenance. We pay that tax under protest; not because we admit an obligation in justice. Justice cannot oblige the support of a system which we are forbidden in conscience to use or a system which we conscientiously hold to be bad in its ultimate consequences. . . .

The first duty of every Catholic father to the public school is to keep his children out of it. . . . For the man who sends his children to the public school when he could obtain for them the blessings of a Catholic education is not a practicing Catholic, even though he goes to Mass every morning. . . .

Is a Catholic free to attend a non-Catholic college or university? The answer is that he is not free, since the only school, whether it be a kindergarten or a university, which is fit for a Catholic is the school that is Catholic in its principles, its aims, its programs, its teachers, and in its submission to the direction and supervision of the church. . . .

Efforts to Censor All Education

THE Roman Catholic hierarchy, in addition to controlling its own schools and colleges completely, also claims the right to censor all general education, and to effect this object encourages Catholics to control local boards of education where possible and to place Catholics in key positions as teachers and officials in the public-school system. For these Catholics in the public-school system the hierarchy lays down rules in the moral manuals almost as detailed as the rules for parochial teachers. They are directed to stand for the superiority of the church school even while they are teaching in the public school, and in discussing civic affairs with pupils they are "expected to make a statement on such matters as divorce, euthanasia, birth control," and kindred subjects. "She [the Catholic teacher in the public school] must not speak in such wise as to give the impression that all forms of religious belief possess a natural right to exist and to propagate. Only the true religion possesses such a natural right" (Father Francis J. Connell, "Morals in Politics and Professions," imprimatur Archbishop of Baltimore-Washington, p. 156). Father Connell, who is associate professor of moral theology at the Catholic University of America, adds that a Catholic teacher in a public school may start the Lord's Prayer for the little Protestant children when it is customary, but she must stop with the phrase "Deliver us from evil" and not say "For thine is the kingdom" etc. If she adds this latter phrase, it is a sin, for "in practice these words have taken on a Protestant connotation" (ibid, p. 158).

The hierarchy has not been successful in capturing many parts of the American public-school system. It is true that three states—Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin—have Catholic directors of state education, and in many cities, such as Boston, Providence, Buffalo, and San Francisco, the city superintendents are Catholics. But the majority of Catholic public-school teachers in the National Education Association refuse to follow the dictates of the hierarchy in educational matters, and when Catholics attempt to make taxpayers support parochial schools as part of the public-school system, as they did in the famous North College Hill battle near Cincinnati last spring, they usually meet prompt defeat.

When the Supreme Court by a five-to-four vote last February allowed the state of New Jersey to charge the costs of parochial-school transportation to the taxpayers, the battle lines were drawn for a much larger conflict, of which the bus fight was only a preliminary skirmish. In the hierarchy's briefs and the public discussions of this New Jersey bus situation, and of federal aid, it became evident that the Catholic plan for educational expansion in this country consists of three steps: (1) immediate appropriations for auxiliary services for parochial schools, (2) complete support of all parochial schools by public funds, as in Ontario, England, and the Netherlands, (3) eventual establishment of Catholicism in all public classrooms, as in Spain and Italy.

But the New Jersey bus decision was actually a major defeat for this plan in spite of its temporary financial gain. Both the majority and the minority of the court made ringing declarations in favor of the doctrine of the separation of church and state. It was clear that in the eyes of the court this particular exception of bus service was a very special exception to a general principle, and that there was no hope of direct support for parochial schools under the First Amendment to the Constitution, which prohibits any "establishment of religion."

Accordingly, the church's only hope for securing desperately needed federal funds for its schools is the development of some device for indirect appropriations which would by-pass the provisions in most state constitutions and statutes prohibiting public expenditures for parochial schools. The precedent for such a device is the Louisiana textbook (Cochran) case, in which the Supreme Court permitted textbooks to be given by the state to parochial students not as contributions to the Catholic school system but as personal awards of service to students.

Meanwhile the conflict in the coming session of Congress will center about the Aiken bill for federal aid, which would open the door for direct federal appropriations to parochial schools in states where such aid is now refused, and the Taft bill, which would permit parochial schools to get federal funds only in the proportion in which they now receive public money from the states. For once liberal educators of the country are solidly backing Mr. Taft. Their reasons have never been summarized more pointedly than by John Dewey:

It is essential that this basic issue be seen for what it is—namely, as the encouragement of a powerful reactionary world organization in the most vital realm of democratic life with the resulting promulgation of principles inimical to democracy. We cannot deny that public education needs federal aid in order to equalize opportunity between state and state and between individual and individual. But it would be a poor bargain indeed to gain material aid at the expense of losing our greatest intellectual and moral heritage.

Pattern for Union-Busting

BY WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, November 8

IN THE wintry Taft-Hartley months which lie ahead there is likely to be a wake whenever two or three union organizers are gathered together. They will be mourning not only Johnny Green and his shipyard workers but the United States labor movement, which didn't know what was hitting it until all was over this week.

The Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, standing virtually alone, had staked nineteen strike weeks and nearly $300,000 in a gamble for peace-time survival. The Bethlehem Steel Corporation took almost the whole pot in this cruelly uneven industrial contest.

The shipyard strike, the longest major walkout since the war, cut into an industry which presumably is vital to reconstruction. It took place during the first test months of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, which was supposed to resolve such domestic troubles with peace and justice for all. The issue was basic—the right of a union to stay alive. Yet, curiously, the strike got few headlines, and these were usually mixed with arrival-and-departure shipping news on the next to the last page of the New York Times. Perhaps the subdued despair of strikers in East and West Coast yards did not make lively copy. More curiously still, the mass of labor itself, not to mention the White House and Administration agencies, seemed indifferent; perhaps the proper wording of resolutions lamenting the Taft-Hartley act took precedence over such dreary union business as picket lines and soup kitchens.

At any rate, a key chapter in labor-management history was ready for the book when Bethlehem and the groggy shipbuilders' union prepared to initial it in the daily and sometimes nightly negotiations which started in Washington on October 27. The union's surrender was nearly unconditional. The terms were dictated by Bethlehem, whose Eugene Gifford Grace is the spiritual as well as managerial heir of the late Charles M. Schwab, famed for his part in the Battle of Homestead in 1892. The company was represented in the conference room by D. C. Mills, manager of industrial relations, who sat with a copy of the Taft-Hartley act before him. John Green, the president of the Shipbuilding Workers, came out of the room alive and cocky but limping from the merciless kicking around. It had long been apparent to him that there was going to be no triumph for the union, that a decent settlement was the best it could expect. This was worse; this was close to disaster for a union which had been 500,000 strong during the war, and it was ominous for all of organized labor.

After 135 days—the 117-day General Motors strike in 1945-46 set the previous post-war record—on picket lines and meager relief rations, what were left of some 30,000 strikers at ten Bethlehem shipyards would now go back to work under a contract which in many important respects was worse than the one they had before the company precipitated the walkout at midnight of June 25. They had lost hard-won and valued over-time, grievance, and seniority rights, which were among the chief issues of the strike. There was a general 12-cent wage raise in the contract package scornfully tossed to the strikers, and this did represent a grudging concession. Bethlehem at first confined the raise to hourly-paid workers, cutting off incentive and peace workers, the core of the union.

The intermediary in this situation was the Conciliation Service, facing its first challenging assignment since it set up business as an independent pacifying agency under the Taft-Hartley act. If anything, its representative, Assistant Director William N. Margolis, contributed to the pacification of the union by Bethlehem. But at least it took an interest, however belated, in the strike, which at its peak tied up some 67,000 men and over 70 ships.

At the outset, after Bethlehem had made it plain that its post-war concept of collective bargaining was the unilateral imposition of conditions of employment on the union, the Shipbuilding Workers hoped for intervention by President Truman, the Maritime Commission, and the navy. The President failed to acknowledge letters in July and August from John Green, who argued that "the responsibility for the occurrence of this uncalled-for and tragic strike rested, first, with the employers and, second, with the various governmental agencies concerned with this industry." The White House let it be understood that Mr. Truman didn't want to get mixed up with the strike; nor did the agencies.

THE strike was essentially for the continuation of war-time conditions, plus a nominal cost-of-living wage adjustment. At first it took in nineteen yards on the East and Gulf coasts. Relatively favorable agreements were quickly worked out with fringe companies. Bethlehem, however, stood fast for depressive settlements with the union at Baltimore, where it has three yards; at Quincy and East Boston; at New York, where it has four yards in a wide harbor area, and at Terminal Island, San Pedro, California. United States Steel's shipyard at Kearny, New Jersey, also held out, waiting for Bethlehem's pitch. And still unsettled were fringe issues at San Pedro and the Patapsco yard at Baltimore.

Bethlehem lost shipside money in the contest, but it could easily afford it in view of the end gains it expected. Not even in war time, when it set a record in 1945 of 857,511 tons of steel production, had its business been so good. In October, running its steel mills 102 per cent of capacity, Bethlehem smashed all delivery records with 879,285 net tons of rolled steel and other finished products. Net Bethlehem income for the first nine months of 1947 was $38,710,728. In the similar period of 1946 it was $29,794,650. Ship construction, conversion, repair, and scrapping—much of it under government contract—could wait while Bethlehem trimmed the C. I. O. down to a pliable size.

As a result of its success Eugene Grace will unquestionably be a large factor, next spring, in pattern-making wage negotiations with C. I. O. President Philip Murray's United Steelworkers. In the past Benjamin F. Fairless of United States Steel has told the industry how to appease the C. I. O. Now Grace has won the right to show the industry how to defeat the C. I. O.

Murray finally woke up to this prospect, but very late. He reported to the Boston convention of the C. I. O. in October, when a strong resolution of support for the shipyard strikers was adopted, that the Steelworkers had kicked in $25,000 for Johnny Green's men. In varying amounts from $2,000 to $5,000 the United Automobile Workers, the Textile Workers, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers also came through. But even this help didn't go far in a struggle which was costing the suffering union at least $40,000 a week.

In Baltimore the city C. I. O. council gave a remarkable demonstration of lack of interest. The anti-Communist leadership of the Shipbuilding Workers had been in ideological disagreement with the council, which in return virtually ignored the shipyard fight. Harry Lundenberg's A. F. of L. Seafarers and Joe Curran's sailors, however, worked for the strike in off hours.

The corporation naturally swings a lot of economic and social weight in Baltimore, which perversely prides itself on its gas street lamps, cobblestone streets, and white marble doorsteps in front of slum houses where many shipyard workers live. Thus there was no relief aid from most community-fund agencies. Nor was there any state unemployment compensation. Many strikers who tried to get part-time jobs while waiting out the walkout found they had been blacklisted. Medical fees in maternity cases were demanded in advance until the Baltimore chapter of Americans for Democratic Action, under Dr. Frank F. Furstenberg, organized a pool of fifty-seven physicians for emergency help.

BETHLEHEM opened up its active strike-breaking campaign about two months after the walkout started. By-passing the union, which had been unable to get management to sit down with it at a bargaining table, Vice-President W. H. Collins mailed out letters to some 8,500 strikers denying that the company was "out to break the union" and suggesting that hourly paid workers come back and pick up a 12-cent raise. In September printed copies of company contract proposals—concealing various jokers—were circulated to make the union leaders look unreasonable. At about the same time a tide of arrests swept through the picket lines. It was disorderly conduct, for instance, for a striker to loiter with a cup of coffee on the steps of a diner across the street from a yard gate. (At the Sparrows Point yard, seven miles outside the city, Bethlehem operates a company town, complete with two-family privies and a private constabulary organized along the lines of Pennsylvania's old-time coal-and-iron police. There the police magistrate doubles as a yard foreman.)

"Wanted at Once" employment ads blossomed out in the Baltimore Sun. The Personnel Center in the Tower Building sought marine pipefitters and electricians, and no agency fee was required of applicants. The union sent men around to find out about these jobs. Sure enough, the Personnel Center gave them cards to the Bethlehem Steel Corporation at its Key Highway yard. Bethlehem scoured the city, rounding up men who had never seen a shipyard before but could be enticed into the gates by assurances that they would be paid—with time and a half for week-ends on a seven-day schedule—whether they were able to do any yard work or not. Many of these recruits were Negroes—a circumstance which couldn't have been better calculated by the company to create and store up racial resentments for many years to come.

Persuasive foremen methodically started dropping in at the homes of their striking union friends to talk with the wife and kids after supper on Sundays. Their topic was that the strike couldn't go on forever, times certainly were tough, a lot of other guys were going back while the going was good, and it wasn't smart to play a sucker when there was plenty of time and a half to be had. By the end of October strike ranks had been cracked by this back-to-work maneuver. It only took a few thousand men, pouring in and out of the gates at shift-change time, to kick picket-line morale to pieces.

It will be a long time before the Shipbuilding Workers recover from all this. They remember with pride that they set records building liberty ships during the war, and they will remember with bitterness that a grateful government stood by while the company forced them to set another kind of record in peace time. Other groups in organized labor are likely to taste that bitterness, too: the loss of a major strike has a spreading tendency.

Notes from Lake Success

By J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, November 8

PERHAPS the high point of United Nations achievement to date was registered at a press conference last Wednesday at Lake Success. Dr. Brock Chisholm, executive secretary of the World Health Organization, gave an account of how the world's medical resources had been mobilized by his organization to combat the cholera outbreak in Egypt. More than four million cubic centimeters of anti-cholera vaccine—enough to inoculate one in every six persons in Egypt—had been shipped in and a million more sent to Saudi Arabia and Syria as a preventive measure. Other urgently needed medical supplies had also been sent and vast quantities of vaccine set aside for future use.

It is astonishing to see how technically advanced we are, how efficient is our cooperation, when the plague is in men's bodies and not in their minds. Perhaps we had better give the W. H. O. a greater role in the battle for peace as well as in the battle for health.

THE adoption of the modified Little Assembly proposal—with the subsequent announcement of a Slav-state boycott—emphasizes a trend which is becoming increasingly well defined. The original Marshall statement made it quite clear that the United States was determined that the Assembly's prestige should be built up to compensate for the impotence of the Security Council. The Balkan, Korean, and Little Assembly proposals must therefore be taken together as means for accomplishing this objective. In at least two of these American proposals small-nation pressure produced revisions which in the opinion of the majority brought them within the scope of the Charter.

All who followed the strenuous debates in the sub-committee hammering out the terms of reference of the Little Assembly and who noted the tougher line being urged by the delegates from Australia and Argentina were aware that the forces of moderation had won a substantial victory. The Little Assembly, placed firmly in subordination to the General Assembly and seriously limited as to the matters it may discuss or investigate, is now a very little assembly indeed.

To the Russians, however—and this was brought out clearly in Mr. Vishinsky's speech just before the vote was taken—these modifications added up to nothing. The Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan—no distinction is made in regard to their capitalist-imperialist objectives—are the political realities reflected in but not changed by Assembly decisions. Mr. Vishinsky, using picturesque metaphors of wolves and sheep, boa constrictors and rabbits, said explicitly that the Soviet Union would not in such cases yield to the majority vote of the Assembly. The Russian boycott has had the effect of consolidating the small-nation vote on the side of the West. If, as I believe is the case, the Russians still want to influence world opinion through the United Nations forum, they should reflect upon that 43-to-6 vote on the Little Assembly.

BY THE week's end the main issues in the Palestine discussion had become clarified. The majority report of UNSCOP has now been generally accepted as the basis of discussion. The central problem is that of enforcement. Here three lines have emerged—an American, a Russian, and a British.

The Americans, accepting the end of the British mandate, have wanted the British forces to carry the responsibility for law and order until the two new states are constituted. Acknowledging limitations of Assembly authority, they have suggested that an Assembly commission advise—or supervise—the organization of the Arab and Jewish states.

The Russians want the British out at the earliest possible date—April 30, 1948, is set—and propose that during the transition period, which they suggest should last until the end of next year, a small commission directly under the Security Council should supervise the administration of Palestine and carry through the partition plan.

The British, up to the week-end, had said little. But it was fairly clear that they were standing by their original declaration that they would not accept sole responsibility for enforcement of a settlement to which both Arabs and Jews did not agree.

The Canadian delegate, Lester B. Pearson, worked strenuously to bring together these conflicting points of view. He proposed that the British mandate should terminate on January 1, 1948, and that Palestine should then be brought directly under United Nations sovereignty. A High Commissioner for Palestine with the necessary technical assistants should be named by the Assembly but be responsible to the Security Council. The target date for establishing the two states should be set at July 1, 1948. In the meantime the British forces in Palestine should be responsible to the United Nations for the enforcement of law and order until they were replaced by the national militia and constabulary of the two states. They would be withdrawn as quickly as they could be replaced by national forces.

At the week-end the major delegations involved were consulting their governments to discover whether such a proposal was acceptable. One hopeful note was struck in the announcement by Dr. Evatt that he had canceled his sailing to attend the wedding of Princess Elizabeth and would keep the ad hoc committee in constant session until a solution was reached.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Up, and Up, and Up!

WAGES have outrun prices," Senator Taft asserted in a speech at Boston on October 28. The cost-of-living index, he pointed out, has risen 65 per cent since 1939, while the average income of factory workers has jumped 110 per cent and that of all non-agricultural employees 85 per cent. It is this discrepancy, according to the Senator, that is the primary source of inflationary pressures.

As I understand this argument, its implication is that any rise in wages greater than necessary to offset the rise in prices is unjustifiable and dangerous. If that is so, surely other forms of income ought to be measured by the same yardstick. Yet the Senator in this major pronouncement on inflation neglected to mention the tripling of farm income since 1939 or the fact that corporation profits after taxes are running this year at a rate more than four times the 1936-39 average of $3,900,000,000.

This last omission is all the more strange since it has been impossible to open a paper in recent weeks without reading of sensational advances in profits. A survey published by the Wall Street Journal on October 31 showed that 149 major concerns in 15 industries had earned $446,147,382 in the 3 months ending September 30. This represented a dip of 0.6 per cent compared with the second quarter of the year—a normal seasonal variation—but a rise of 42 per cent above the third quarter of 1946, which had been an exceptionally profitable period. "Earnings for all 1947 up to the end of last month," the paper reported, "unquestionably added up to the highest ever recorded for such a period."

Here are some group percentage gains over the third quarter of 1946 tabulated by the Wall Street Journal:

7 auto and auto equipment companies . . .	127
6 coal companies	63
9 electrical-equipment companies	165
13 petroleum companies	70
10 pulp and paper companies	80

The picture is not entirely uniform. The air lines have gone deeply into the red this year, and food, liquor, department-store, and moving-picture concerns, while still doing quite well, have in general earned less than in 1946. But by and large there are few shadows to dim the brightness of the profits outlook. Nor, judging by the readiness of corporate boards to raise dividends, are present high earnings a mere flash in the pan. When United States Steel, which is notoriously conservative in distributing profits, recently declared its first extra dividend since 1929 and lifted its common stock from a $4 to a $5 annual rate, Chairman Irving S. Olds emphasized the move's significance as an expression of confidence in continued prosperity for the company.

Similar dividend action has been and is being taken by numerous other concerns. Up to October 31, 530 leading companies had increased their rates this year, and many have announced extras in addition. On the other hand, only 70 companies reduced or omitted dividends in the same period. Publicly reported cash dividends in the third quarter, according to the Department of Commerce, were 17 per cent higher in the aggregate than in the third quarter of 1946.

The upward climb of profits, while certainly gratifying to corporations and their stockholders, has also its embarrassing aspects. So much corporate prosperity may be ignored by Senator Taft, but it suggests possibilities of higher wages to trade unions and of lower prices to harassed consumers. To combat such dangerous thoughts, the financial press is plugging the theme that current profits are largely illusory. "True profits," the Journal of Commerce asserted editorially on October 28, "are being grossly exaggerated for large numbers of business enterprises by two factors. First, altogether inadequate provision is being made for the cost of replacement of fixed assets. Secondly, higher unit prices which boost the value of year-end inventories temporarily inflate profits." Discussing the first of these factors, the editorial cited the case of a manufacturer with plant and equipment costing $10,000,000 before the war which he now cannot replace for less than twice that sum. "Merely to maintain the integrity of his investment, therefore, he must find $10,000,000 over and above his depreciation reserves."

In practice, however, I note that many corporations—United States Steel, du Pont, and General Motors are examples—are reporting profits after making provision for extra depreciation. Moreover, there is no reason to assume that a 100 per cent rise in replacement costs is the general experience: much of the plant and equipment now being installed takes the place of facilities acquired in the twenties when prices were much higher than in 1939 and in some cases nearly as high as today. Finally, new machinery purchased today is not usually identical with that which is being discarded; much of it presumably is a great deal more efficient and more profitable to operate even allowing for greater first costs.

The suggestion that rising inventory valuations create an illusion of profits also bears further analysis. Actually, many corporations have largely eliminated inventory profits and losses by adopting the "Lifo" (last in, first out) system of costing. Others, notably the big retailers, have set aside, before striking profits, large reserves against possible inventory losses. Corporations which have not taken such precautions may be hit by sharp price declines. In that case they will, I prophesy, indignantly deny the unreality of inventory losses, however much they now protest that inventory gains are a mirage.

The more I read alibis for mounting profits, the more respect I have for the candid textile producer who, asked by a Wall Street Journal reporter why he didn't cut prices in view of his large earnings, replied: "Demand is so high we'd probably be alone if we were to pioneer a price-cutting drive. And the public wouldn't benefit anyway. Intermediate processors and retailers would grab the profit; they'd mark up our goods to the level of our competitors." The point is that it is useless to abuse individual private enterprisers for profiteering; they cannot help it, for it is inherent in the system.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Reviewers' Choice

ALTHOUGH up to his death a few months ago, C-F Ramuz, the Swiss author, was almost wholly unknown in this country, the recent publication of his novel "When the Mountain Fell" (Pantheon, $2.50) has brought him a large posthumous success: it is a Book-of-the-Month Club selection and is being hailed by the reviewers as a classic and a masterpiece. I do not agree with this judgment; indeed, I find Mr. Ramuz's new book only slightly less tiresome than his previous "The End of All Men," which appeared in English translation in 1945. The acclaim it is receiving must be recognized, I think, as the latest instance of the swing of the critical pendulum from the one extreme of false reality to the other extreme of false spirituality. We should not be surprised at the fact that the same opinion which supposes that the truth of modern life is conveyed in such books as "The Hucksters" or "The Story of Mrs. Murphy" now thinks that the ideality of modern life is conveyed by Mr. Ramuz's pious and banal little fable.

Set in Switzerland, "When the Mountain Fell" tells of a landslide which falls upon the high pastures where a group of peasants graze their cattle each summer. All the group is killed except a young man named Antoine, who manages to tunnel his way back to life. He returns to his village, worn and deranged by his long ordeal; the other peasants think he is a ghost until the priest confronts him with the cross. But terror revives once more among the villagers when Antoine insists upon going back to the mountain to dig for the friend who he imagines still survives there; none of them will accompany him into this haunted territory. Only his pregnant wife, Theresa, has sufficient faith and love to follow her husband. Her devotion restores Antoine to sanity, and he returns home with her.

This is the content of Mr. Ramuz's novel. Its style is the crooning Biblical prose long sanctified as the proper way to write about peasants, idiots, and other of God's innocent children—the kind that swells the heart with virtue while it lulls the mind to rest. In other words, "When the Mountain Fell" is barbiturate literature for what the publishing trade proudly refers to as the discriminating reader. Alongside it our more lurid historical romances are good clean adolescent fact-facing.

The insidious thing, of course, about a book of this sort is that although it is a straight religious document and a profoundly anti-intellectual one, it takes no open theological or anti-rational position; so that even people who might be stopped by a formulated faith are available to its seductions. Its appeal to non-reason is entirely implicit in its nostalgic exaltation of the primitive: there is no paraphernalia of ideas; there are no concessions to the immediate problems of civilized living such as always intrude themselves into the work of our American "spiritual" writers. When one of our domestic myth-makers, a Saroyan or a Steinbeck, for example, goes primitive on us he invariably feels that he must deal with that most primitive of earthly forces, sex. But Mr. Ramuz makes no such mistake; his is the churchly view of man which understands that in order for the divine laws to operate in fullest purity all earthly considerations must be dissolved.

I suppose the most significant aspect of the success that has greeted "When the Mountain Fell" is the way in which it points up the fact that the only alternatives our formers of literary opinion can manage are, on the one hand, a bewildered, formless receptivity to the most debased manifestations of contemporary confusion and, on the other hand, a serene faith momentarily maintained in a world empty of anything but the most elementary moral precepts. In view of their power it is surely small wonder that we suffer such a dearth of any fiction which would try to cope with the modern reality in at least some part of its moral complexities.

It is with genuine reluctance that I report my disappointment in Gladys Schmitt's latest novel, "Alexandra" (Dial, $3), the story of a young woman whose fierce idealism both in love and in art makes life insupportable for her, is certainly not without the qualities that distinguished Miss Schmitt's previous work. Here, as in "David the King," Miss Schmitt is still impelled by a remarkable intensity of affection for human beings; the new book demonstrates, as well, the high standards that guide her in her writing career. But whereas in treating a historical subject a highly emotional author had sufficient distance from her material to permit her characters a free life of their own, in treating a modern subject she lives so close to her characters that inevitably there is a loss of emotional clarity. Subjective and objective intensity of feeling merge—especially since the story is told in the first person. A rather uterine atmosphere pervades the narrative. In high compliment to Miss Schmitt, it can be said that "Alexandra" often suggests the best work of Willa Cather: the resemblance lies not only in the choice of an artistically dedicated heroine but in the very pure handling of the American background. One could wish, then, that Miss Schmitt might have achieved in proper degree the quality that Miss Cather had perhaps in excess—the ability to put some cool space between herself and her passion-driven people.

Elizabeth Taylor's "A View of the Harbour" (Knopf, $3) can be recommended as excellent light reading for an intelligent female audience. If I do not think it is robust enough for the male taste, the reservation is not to be taken as an invidious comment on Miss Taylor's performance: at least in our moments of relaxation let us accept the happy disparity. "A View of the Harbour" sketches the doings, in a single short summer, of the inhabitants of an English seaside town; it is a book of humor and conscience and gentle skill, making no very great demands on the reader but also never falling into either the emotional or stylistic laxity of "easy" fiction. Only the English seem to be able to walk this pleasant literary road. It is, of course, a by-path of the best traditional literature, not to be reached except one has gone the length of the main highway.

DIANA TRILLING

The Mexican War

REHEARSAL FOR CONFLICT. By Alfred Hoyt Bill. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50.

THIS book on the war with Mexico of 1846 to 1848 is aptly titled. It proved indeed a rehearsal in two senses for the much longer and bloodier conflict into which the United States plunged just fifteen years after hostilities opened on the Rio Grande. The majority of the officers who led the Union and Confederate armies served their apprenticeship to war in Mexico. More important, it was this struggle and the bitter domestic controversies engendered by it that fanned the smoldering embers of irrepressible conflict to an unquenchable flame.

Mr. Bill is not one of those historians who regard the Mexican War as the first outbreak of American imperialism. He lays great stress on the scandalous nature of successive Mexican governments and on their brutalities, bad faith, provocations, and outrages. Such accusations are true, but do they offer moral justification for the grab of half a continent? Actually an administration of angels in Mexico City would not have been able to check the onward roll of manifest destiny. "Little Jimmy Polk" entered the White House determined to annex California, peaceably if possible, forcibly if necessary; and if his expansionist policies outraged many of his countrymen, they had the tacit support of the majority. Mr. Bill complains that critics of the war have not appreciated the fact that "Mexico was paid for the territories she surrendered five-sixths of the sum that had been offered her on the eve of hostilities." But surely the function of conscience money is to atone for sin, not to transform it into virtue.

However, while disagreeing with some of Mr. Bill's interpretations, I am ready to testify that he plays fair in giving the facts which tell against him as well as those which support his thesis. His book is one that deserves to be taken seriously even if it aims at the general reader and is not studded with footnotes. My one criticism in regard to its style is that the first chapter shows signs of being written down to the supposed public taste. It provides an impressionistic picture of Washington in the 1840's, contrasting the city's squalor and magnificence and touching lightly on its scandals, gossip, fashions, frivolities, and feuds. An amusing enough job but of doubtful relevance and done in a manner that has become rather stereotyped.

When Mr. Bill gets away from Washington to the front line, he is much better. In particular his battle scenes are both clear and exciting, and he portrays such leading characters in the drama as Polk, Taylor, Scott, and Santa Ana in the round, omitting neither faults nor virtues. The value of the book is enhanced by a number of excellent pictures and maps and a modest-sized but useful bibliography.

What's behind

SOCIAL ANTI-SEMITISM?

DOES social anti-Semitism really matter? Suppose that a Jew can't join an "exclusive" club . . . stop at a particular hotel . . . be welcome at a certain resort. Aren't these just signs of petty prejudice—annoying but unimportant?

The answer is a resounding "No" and Carey McWilliams, noted thinker and writer on minority problems, tells you why in COMMENTARY for November. Follow him along the sordid but fascinating trail of religious prejudice and you'll discover what is behind social discrimination. You will see how its groundwork is laid in college . . . you will understand why Jews are barred from various businesses and professions . . . you will uncover the reasons for their concentrating in others. If you are a Jew, you may realize for the first time why you're where you are today—both socially and economically! DOES SOCIAL DISCRIMINATION REALLY MATTER? is no hysterical protest against anti-Semitism; it is a calm, documented article that makes absorbing reading for every Jew who has ever suffered social or business discrimination—and for every non-Jew sincerely interested in inter-faith amity.

"A Hurricane of Culture"

CUBAN COUNTERPOINT: TO-BACCO AND SUGAR. By Fernando Ortiz. Translated from the Spanish by Harriet de Onís. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

THIS is a very unusual book. It is possible to discuss it as a sociological study, as a historical investigation, as an anthropological treatise, as an economic analysis, and as a literary effort. It is all of these, but it is not the usual monograph; rather it contains choice cullings from the notebooks of its erudite and distinguished author, Dr. Fernando Ortiz, lawyer and diplomat, sociologist and editor.

"Cuban Counterpoint" is a complex study. Or perhaps it would be better to say that it is a study of a complex problem in which the author uses all the social-science disciplines that are generally applied separately. Looking at Cuba, Dr. Ortiz must focus on sugar and tobacco, the two crops basic to its economy. Thus he is led immediately into the strikingly different histories behind each plant, into a consideration of how each plant determined the economic structure of its exploitation. In turn this imperceptibly and inevitably enlarges into an investigation of the superstructures created by tobacco and sugar.

From the anthropological view the book is valuable for its informed analysis of the extraordinary way in which tobacco was integrated into the life of the Indians of the Antilles. Even more important is Dr. Ortiz's employment of the concept of transculturation—a word of his own coining—to arrive at an understanding of Cuba today. Transculturation, replacing the older word acculturation, is a sounder concept and expresses the reciprocal give and take that occurs when cultures meet. In Cuba the paleolithic Ciboney had yielded to the neolithic Taino; then with Columbus came "a hurricane of culture: Europe. There arrived together and in mass gunpowder, the horse, the wheel, the sail, the compass, money, wages, writing, the printing-press, books, the master, the King, the Church, the banker . . . various types of economy came in, confused with each other and in transition [feudal economy arrived with mercantile and even industrial capitalism]. . . . With the whites came the Negroes . . . of different regions, races, languages, cultures, classes, ages, sexes, thrown promiscuously together into the slave ships, and socially equalized by the same system of slavery." The savage story of Europe's first beachhead in the New World begins to have realistic content as well as romantic color.

In its own way the book traces Cuba's history from those early desperate years down to the present, not systematically, not chronologically, not completely, and yet, because Dr. Ortiz considers the capricious fortunes of sugar and tobacco, the fragmentary outlines are there: the long period of colonialism, the brief hopeful years of independence before Cuba's economic life came under the control of the United States. History here is but an expression in time of the fate of the two crops; the differences—agricultural, social, economic, and international—between the crops is the heart of the book.

With great felicity of style Dr. Ortiz presents his findings and boldly asserts his conclusions, his theories, his counterpoint. Tobacco, native to Cuba, demanded skill and devotion in its growing and processing and supported small, independent farmers who formed a sturdy, independent rural community. Without slaves, without large invested capital, without government aid or favor, Cuban tobacco spread over the world and became, along with tea and coffee—all alkaloids, "solace for the senses and subtle nervous stimulants"—a comfort and a bracer for the common man, while Havana cigars became the mark and pleasure of the gentleman in the capitals of Europe. The goal of the tobacco grower was the best, that of the sugar grower the most. Sugar, brought to Cuba, enslaved the Indians and, when they soon died out, provided a market for Negro slaves. Favored by and dominating the government, sugar created a class of pampered and imperious planters. As sugar plantations grew in size and the refining process became increasingly mechanized, the planter class was replaced by corporations representing foreign capital. The ramifications of this counterpoint are fear-reaching.

In the economy of Cuba there are also striking contrasts in the cultivation, the processing, and the human connotations of the two products. Tobacco requires delicate care, sugar can look after itself; the one requires continual attention, the other involves seasonal work; intensive versus extensive cultivation; steady work on the part of a few, intermittent jobs for many; the immigration of whites on the one hand, the slave trade on the other; liberty and slavery; skilled and unskilled labor; hand versus arms; men versus machines; delicacy versus brute force. The cultivation of tobacco gave rise to the small holdings; that of sugar brought about the great land grants. In their industrial aspects tobacco belongs to the city, sugar to the country. Commercially the whole world is the market for our tobacco, while our sugar has only a single market. Centripetence and centrifugence. The native versus the foreigner. National sovereignty as against colonial status. The proud cigar band as against the lowly sack.

Since the turn of the century organizing capitalism has been successfully invading the tobacco industry, and soon, it would seem, the counterpoint will have ceased to exist. The independence implicit in the pattern evolved by the tobacco culture is disappearing before large-scale capitalism. This change is stated bitterly, but the process is not described; we are merely told that "in the last fifteen years the number of landowning tobacco growers has dropped from 11,200 to 3,000. The landowner . . . is joining the ranks of the proletariat, becoming undernourished, poverty-stricken, preyed upon by intestinal and social parasites. The economic system of tobacco is gradually approaching that typical of the sugar industry, and both are being strangled by heartless foreign and native tentacles." Cuba's problem now becomes one with that of Puerto Rico and our own "factories in the field."

The interested reader who is stimulated by the brilliant musings of a mind stocked by rich and rare reading will find here a perfect guide to many records left by sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Europeans who reported with happy excitement all that they saw and were told about tobacco and smoking. For those who cannot be convinced, even by the blindfold test, that there is any difference among the branded cigarettes, this story will be an absorbing excursion into an exotic past.

To the present reviewer, who has long been interested in explorers' accounts, this study has a special appeal. Here is the explorer not as a romantic figure but as an agent of European civilization. We are apt to consider Columbus, for example, in simple, one-dimensional terms—as the daring mariner who sailed farther and discovered more than anyone else of his time. This book shows him as the beginner of transculturative processes, as a man who deliberately took tobacco home to Spain and brought sugar to the New World, transplantings that initiated profound changes which have operated continuously throughout our history.

American Fortune

THE MARSHALL FIELDS: A STUDY IN WEALTH. By John Tebbel. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

GREAT fortunes are more often inherited than made in the twentieth century. And as the days of the American robber barons become more remote, it is perhaps natural that they should be treated with increasing tolerance. John Tebbel is not uncritical of his subject, but he is a long way from the muckracking tradition.

As a matter of fact, the first Marshall Field was considerably less of a buccaner than most of his wealthy contemporaries. In the store which provided the basis of his fortune he pursued a policy of strict honesty as a matter of good business, and his paternalistic treatment of his employees was considered generous in his time. However, he apparently found nothing to be ashamed of in a close financial association with the notorious Charles T. Yerkes, Jr., or the Chicago City Railway Company, of which Field was one of the large stockholders, when the company tried to buy a ninety-nine-year franchise with half a million dollars in bribes.

Tebbel states the facts and says charitably that Field's attitude toward civic virtue was "negative"—there is no evidence that Field himself initiated any shady dealings, but he exerted all the pressure he could to prevent exposures by the Chicago Daily News. He was a firm believer in the rights of wealth and the maintenance of the established order.

His grandson, Marshall Field III, is another story, occupying the second half of the book. Most of the space is devoted to reasonably objective histories of PM and the Chicago Sun. The author emphasizes the fact that the contemporary Marshall Field has strictly lived up to his agreement to keep his hands off the editorial policy of PM, while he has steadily assumed more responsibility as publisher of the Sun. And the book ends on the optimistic note that the heir to one of America's largest fortunes is now embarked on a useful career in his own right.

This contrast between grandfather and grandson is a significant bit of American history, and Tebbel has recounted the salient facts. The book is well worth reading for these facts. But it fails to live up to its subtitle: "A Study in Wealth." Neither the peculiar moneymaking genius of Marshall Field I nor the social conscience of his heir is satisfactorily explained.

Biographical treatment of a living man necessarily has limitations, especially when he has supplied a good deal of the material, which seems to be the case here. And while the author attaches considerable significance to the fact that Field had two unsuccessful marriages, and was psychoanalyzed, it is scarcely surprising that he reveals nothing about the psychoanalysis which has any bearing on Field's subsequent career. The dissimilarity between the publisher of the Sun and his wealthy friends is stated; it is not interpreted as much more than an isolated case.

As a study in wealth, therefore, the book cannot stand comparison with Dreiser's fictionalization of Yerkes in "The Financier" and "The Titan," or with the story of the founder of another Chicago department store in Lester Cohen's "Sweepings." It is, however, a good straightforward account of the careers of two wealthy men.

THE WINSLOW BOY (Empire Theater) is based on a cause célèbre already well known to those who read the popular literature of courts and crimes. A young adolescent was expelled from a British naval school on the charge that he had forged a fifteen-shilling postal order, and his upper-middle-class father demanded that the case be reopened. When the school authorities refused he got before the House of Commons a demand that the Admiralty consent to be sued. The Admiralty at first refused but was finally compelled by parliamentary pressure and the force of public opinion to yield. In the course of the long fight the father was financially ruined, but in the end the boy, who was almost certainly innocent, won his vindication. The famous British sense of fair play had gained a victory over the equally famous British entanglement in the red tape which entrenched bureaucrats do not want either to cut or untie. The moral, if you happen to be a genuine left-winger, is of course that justice in a class society is ruinously expensive when it is not unattainable. Equally obviously, if you happen, like the author of the present play, to be merely a traditional liberal, the moral is, on the contrary, that the concept of fair play provides the basis for an ultimate appeal which the concept of "class justice" will not admit.

No one is likely to maintain that Terence Rattigan's prize-winning play is tremendous drama. Whether or not the individual spectator regards it, nevertheless, as genuinely interesting and rewarding will depend pretty largely on the extent to which he can accept the current English preference for dramatic understatement. Almost any American playwright who had chosen this subject would undoubtedly have attempted to make it "big." Whether he happened to be Communist or liberal, he would have argued all his points with vociferous vigor and would have attempted to keep his audience wrought up to a high pitch of excitement by putting on stage all the climactic moments, including, certainly, the big scene of the parliamentary debate itself. He would probably have considered that he had failed unless he had harrowed our feelings almost unendurably and unless he had proved again to his satisfaction that there is no real paying audience for what he would call "adult" drama. In Mr. Rattigan's play the scene is continuously the pleasant, mildly stuffy Winslow home, presided over by the amiable martinet of a father, a "little man" redeemed from insignificance by his courage and his belief that such a thing as justice does exist. In the first act there is one brief harrowing scene when the frightened boy returns home to confess his disgrace; in the middle of the play there is a thumping theatrical climax when the famous advocate who is deciding whether or not to take the case puts the victim through a cruel, bullying cross-examination and then, when the boy has been reduced to hysteria, turns to the family and says, "Obviously he is innocent." But during most of its running time "The Winslow Boy" is a domestic comedy-drama presenting the home life of a middle-class family passionately concerned over the injustice of which it has happened to be the victim but not quite able to believe that it has become a center of national interest.

Probably no American cast could catch the spirit of the play, and wisely the Theater Guild and its associate sponsors for this particular production have imported an excellent English cast, which includes the attractive ingenue Valerie White; Allan Webb, who, though unspectacular, gives a really notable performance as the father who would be ridiculous if he were not so noble and brave; and Frank Allenby as Sir Robert Morton, the redoubtable courtroom performer. For him Mr. Rattigan has written a part which is an actor's dream. Theatrically it has everything—the grand preliminary buildup, the haughty, commanding presence, the air of cold mastery, the big demonstration of forensic virtuosity, and even, finally, the brief revelation of the good heart hidden beneath the forbidding exterior. For Mr. Allenby, moreover, it must be said that he plays it as such parts ought to be played—up to the hilt. The subdued manner of all the other principal characters, who are, after all, quietly decorous as only middle-class

Englishmen and Englishwomen can be, provides him with the perfect contrasting background for Mephistophelian theatricality, and he takes full advantage of it.

Obviously I enjoyed—but without, I think, overestimating it—"The Winslow Boy." Nevertheless, it is all, I suppose, a matter of taste. What makes the play seem to me an example of agreeable underemphasis will certainly make it appear to some more robustious spectator merely tepid, both dramatically and ideologically. Mr. Rattigan's sermon is plainly intended for those of his contemporaries who still have faith in compromise. When one of his characters says something to the effect that all parties believe in justice for the individual, his heroine replies, "No, only some people in all parties."

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THE total impression made by the centenary exhibition of Albert Pinkham Ryder's paintings at the Whitney Museum (through November 30) is that of an unrealized vision. The vision itself, had it been more completely precipitated, would have sufficed to establish the artist beyond dispute as the greatest American painter. As it is, taking the evidence of this show into account, I would find it uncomfortable to argue his case against Bakins's and Homer's.

The evidence is unsatisfactory because of its scantness and because of the bad physical condition of many of the canvases themselves. As Lloyd Goodrich explains in a well-written catalogue note, Ryder "ströve, half-consciously and without adequate training, for the richness of the old masters. His pictures were built up with underpainting and layer on layer of pigment and glazes. . . . Unfortunately he had little knowledge of traditional techniques, and in trying to secure his effects he used dangerously unsound methods. He painted over pictures when they were still wet, thereby locking the under surface in before it had dried and hardened, so that the different surfaces dried at different rates of speed, causing serious cracking. He used strange mediums—wax, candle grease, alcohol; and he made much too free use of varnish. In showing visitors his paintings he would wipe them with a wet cloth or literally pour varnish over them." Among the most unhappy effects of these procedures, aside from cracking, has been the radical obliteration of gradations of value by excessive darkening, so that one color mass merges into another. Given Ryder's fondness for heavy greens, blues, and browns, the result is sometimes altogether disastrous, making it impossible, as in "Moonlit Cove" and "Macbeth and the Witches," to tell what the picture was meant to look like when it left the artist's hand.

Ryder was beyond question one of the most original and affecting painters of his time, whether in Europe or this country. In the task of stating his originality he seems to have had no help at all from his contemporaries. Taking his departure from the academicism that dominated his age—he mentioned Corot and Maris as his favorite painters—he had to cut his art out of the whole cloth and search in isolation for a means to convey the surprisingly new things he had to say. He knew little or nothing of those of his early and late contemporaries—Daumier, Monticelli, and Munch—who in their various ways were exploring some of the same realms of pictorial sensation.

The loneliness of his effort condemned Ryder to aesthetic as well as personal eccentricity. We can understand why he took so long to finish pictures to his own satisfaction: in his endeavor to make concrete the dramatic, visionary nature of his idea he had nothing he could use to guide him at least part of the way—as Cézanne, for instance, had impressionism. He was on his own almost from start to finish. What we miss in his work, as a result of this, is amplitude of realization, pictures that come off conclusively because the painter has created himself a style, with the aid of his time and milieu, secure enough to contain and redeem his inevitable mistakes. The few masterpieces in the present exhibition—"The Forest of Arden," "Moonlight on the Sea," "Sunset Hour," perhaps "Under a Cloud"—seem happy accidents unsupported by sufficient testimony from the pictures surrounding them. It is as if the artist exhausted himself in these rare completely successful pictures and had each time to begin all over again.

Ryder's main impulse was to simplify nature into silhouetted masses of darks and lights; color was a matter of dark and light modulations within these masses. The primary effect is of simple, blocked-out pattern, startling because of the emotion discharged by the novelty of a relatively few shapes, novel in their contours and in their placing. Yet his most successful canvases—I think here of "Moonlight on the Sea" and "The Forest of Arden"—owe more of their final effect to a subtle, rhythmic weaving together of color and value tones. Where the picture did not stand or fall entirely by the placing of three or four large shapes, the artist was able to retrieve his uncertainty and clumsiness by imposing a general, all-inclusive tonal harmony. Here Ryder resorted to more conservative means and renounced in effect such complete correspondence between his vision and its embodiment as he attempted in his more startling but less successful pictures—where he attempted to qualify the solid simplicity of the silhouette by building up a thick, enamel-like surface that by reflected light would intensify the few color tones.

The moral is that one should never go too fast in art. It is the tragedy of Ryder that he attempted to go too far too fast—alone. I say tragedy, because Ryder had, obviously, gifts enough to have made him a major artist in a better place and time. Once again it is necessary to register another casualty of American provincialism.

Ryder left behind a manner rather than a style. This made him a plausible victim of forgers, who could by diluting his invention, in one instance at least, contrive a painting more harmonious than many of his: I mean "A Spanking Breeze," which is included in the present show as an example of a faked Ryder—with a placard underneath, pointing out the "weak drawing," "unpleasant color," and "crude, direct handling." One wonders more than ever whether museum people ever see things with their own eyes. Forgery that it is, "A Spanking Breeze," manages to be a rather good picture precisely because it takes nothing from Ryder except his manner, leaving out the difficult intensity and originality of emotion he could not realize often enough in his own work. While Ryder could not always meet the high terms he set himself, the forger, even though he was only a hack, could meet them when reduced.

ONE of the great events of the year is RCA Victor's recording of excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" played by Toscanini and the N. B. C. Symphony and issued both on vinylite (Set V-7; $7) and on shellac records (Set 1160; $4). They comprise the movement with the sections Romeo Alone, Sadness (with one of the great Berlioz sustained melodies, whose unexpected turns and exquisite inflections I have described in the past, about one-third in on side 1), Concert and Ball, Great Festivity at the Capulets'; and the movement with Capulet's Garden and Love Scene (the wonderful intervening section with the singing of the young Capulets is, regrettably, omitted, but the movement is a succession of details that overwhelm one with their intense musical loveliness and poetic expressiveness, including another great melody about 1¼ inches in on side 5). The magical Queen Mab movement is still to be done and will be issued separately. The performances are among Toscanini's greatest achievements, and are reproduced on my vinylite copy with spaciousness, brightness, and sharp distinctness, but without the expressive sensuous warmth and sumptuousness of the best present-day orchestral recordings—like the English Decca Ravel "Daphnis and Chloë," or the English Columbia Tchaikovsky Fifth that I will discuss in a moment.

Another of the year's important events is RCA Victor's recording of last year's performance of Bach's B minor Mass by Robert Shaw and his Collegiate Chorale (Sets 1145/6; $19). This is merely a first report on the few sides I have had time to listen to: the Kyrie, Qui tollis, and Cum sancto spiritu. On these I have noted the rich over-all sonority, its lack, however, of the clarity of texture that the performance had in Hunter College, the occasional blanketing of orchestra by chorus, the harshness of the chorus in fortissimo passages, the excessively fast tempo in which the wonderful Qui tollis cannot achieve the effect it has when taken more slowly, and on the other hand the exciting buoyancy of the Cum sancto spiritu.

What should be one of the year's great events is Columbia's recording of Mozart's D major Quintet for strings K. 595, played by the Budapest Quartet and Milton Katims (Set 708; $4.60): the work is one of Mozart's greatest; the performance is perfection. But that skill in recording chamber music which Mr. Kolodin has written about has produced one of the worst of Columbia's recordings of the Budapest Quartet—one which, this time, cuts the ear like a knife when played with wide-range equipment, and is otherwise unpleasant on a machine of limited range.

Another disappointment is Columbia's imported recording of Mozart's lovely Quintet for clarinet and strings K. 581, played by Reginald Kell with the Philharmonia Quartet (Set 702; $5.85). I had been told wonders about the Philharmonia Quartet; but in this performance there are no wonders to be heard—only coarse tone, poor integration of individual in group performance, even faulty pitch of the first violin. And Kell's phrasing is filled with fussy nuances and violent inflections that distort his beautiful tone. Nor is the recorded sound good.

The Paganini Quartet, which has recorded Beethoven's three "Razumovsky" Quartets Opus 59 for RCA Victor (Sets 1151/2/3; $6, $5, and $5, respectively), is only a little more than a year old, and can hardly be expected to exhibit the subtle ensemble inflection that creates the exciting animation of texture in the Budapest Quartet's old H. M. V.-Victor performance of Opus 59 No. 3; but it plays with musical intelligence and the necessary dramatic feeling; and the performances would also sound well if it were not for the cellist, who no longer has the beautiful tone he had in the original Pro Arte Quartet, and who also has other technical difficulties that are disturbing. The performances are well reproduced, but surfaces are poor.

A pleasant surprise is Columbia's imported recording of Mozart's Horn Concerto K. 495, the first two movements of which are largely a flow of lovely Mozartian melody beautifully played by Dennis Brain with the Hallé Orchestra (Set X-285; $3.35). The recorded sound is not up to English Columbia's best: it is both sharp on top and heavy down below.

English Columbia's best in orchestral recording is to be heard in the set (701; $8.35) of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony played by Paul Kletski and the Philharmonia Orchestra. It is a performance in the style that has become traditional—with much change of pace that Tchaikovsky doesn't ask for; but it avoids the excesses in that style that also have become traditional, staying within the limits of good musical taste; and the playing of the orchestra is very fine.

And excellently recorded also is the performance by Sargent and the Liverpool Philharmonic of Benjamin Britten's "The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," an ingenious set of variations and concluding fugue on a theme of Purcell (Set 703; $4.60).

Letters to the Editors

In Justice to James Curry

Dear Sirs: In a letter in your November 1 issue Richard L. Neuberger, in discussing Mr. Ickes and the Alaska Indians, refers to a correspondent by reference to an association with "James Curry, a Washington lawyer . . . who is trying to collect damages for certain Indian tribes" at a 10 per cent rake-off, which could run into "several millions."

Mr. Curry is the unsalaried counsel for the National Congress of American Indians, representing most of the tribes of the United States. He is a former colleague of mine in the American Civil Liberties Union, and a man deeply devoted to the protection of minority rights. Congress has set up an Indian Claims Commission which is taking up to ten years to resolve ancient claims—to be recommended to Congress for possible payment.

Mr. Curry may get 10 per cent of something ten years hence after years of work. If any of your readers know of any other lawyers willing to tackle complicated Indian claims for 10 per cent—even 25 per cent—of a possible collection ten years from now, will they send me their names promptly? We can use a dozen of them.

"The Unity of Europe Is Historic Realism"

Dear Sirs: As an unintentional commentary on the Marshall Plan, or some other such plan with similar intent, the following words of the well-known thinker José Ortega y Gasset should be of general interest at the present time, though they were first published in 1941, long before the Marshall Plan was announced. The quotation is from the widely read book "Toward a Philosophy of History."

I predict—somewhat boldly, in view of present appearances—a possible, a probable, unification of the states of Europe. I do not deny that the United States of Europe is one of the poorest fantasies that have ever existed, and I take no responsibility for what others have handed out under these verbal signs. But I do maintain that it is highly improbable that a society, a collectivity, as ripe as that now formed by the peoples of Europe should not move toward the creation of a state apparatus for the exercise of the European public power which already exists. It is not, then, a weakness for fantasy nor a leaning toward "idealism," which I despise and have fought all my life, that has brought me to this conclusion. It is historic realism that has made it clear to me that the unity of Europe as society is not an "ideal" but a very ancient daily fact, and having seen this fact one cannot but confront the probability of a general European state.

Even more important than this prediction is the concept of "society" upon which Ortega y Gasset based it. This concept the following words will explain in part:

One of the worst errors of "modern" thought, leaving its stain on us even today, has been to confuse society with association, which is just about its opposite. A society is not brought about by a willed agreement. Inversely, any such agreement presupposes the existence of a society, of people living together under certain customs, and the agreement can only determine one form or another of this coexistence, of this pre-existing society. The idea of society as a contractual, and therefore juridical, union is one of the silliest attempts that have ever been made to put the cart before the horse. For law, law the reality—not the idea of law in the minds of philosophers, jurists, or demagogues—is nothing, to use a rather baroque phrase, but the spontaneous secretion of society; it can be nothing else. To expect law to govern the relations between beings not already living in effective society seems to me—if I may be pardoned for my rudeness—to have a somewhat confused and ridiculous idea of law.

Does this concept, in which the Marshall Plan obviously, I think, finds support, at the same time predict, less directly, the inevitable failure of the Western world to live peaceably with the Russians and their satellites? Or is the United Nations organization the beginning of a "spontaneous secretion" that betokens at least the gestation of a world society? That, I should think, is the sixty-four-dollar question.

A Committee to Aid Convicts

Dear Sirs: Many of the conscientious objectors who served prison terms during the war, especially those who now work for various "liberal" movements and organizations, are frequently called on for help by other prisoners, not C. O.'s, with whom they "did time." Sometimes help is needed by a recently released prisoner who can't find a job or is having difficulty readjusting to "civilian" life, and the C. O. realizes poignantly that he may be the last hope for a man who otherwise will soon be on the skids back to crime and the penitentiary. Sometimes the request is for legal aid in appealing a case for a man now in prison.

At the core of such pleas is the personal, friendly relationship, the fact that any aid given will not be tied up with the frequently humiliating, report- and supervision-ridden type of professional help. The cases are rarely "good" ones involving civil liberties, or workers' rights, or race discrimination, and consequently seldom get aid from the agencies interested in such matters. Here are three recent ones of this sort:

Bob L—. A military prisoner under a long sentence, with a record of juvenile delinquency, from poor home background, twenty-six years old, released a year ago, recently lost job when employer learned of record, child still-born, wife left him. Bob went on bum, wound up in county jail "drunk and disorderly." Has had financial and other help, but need continues.

Bill M—. Released recently after five and a half years in penitentiary in morals case. Guilt doubtful. Courageous Negro, twenty-five, fought Jim Crow through prison; C. O.'s found job for him, advanced money for rent and food.

Bill C—. Convicted at eighteen of bank robbery, sentenced to twenty-five years, has served six years. Recent appeal denied by District Court, denial reversed by Appeals Court. Workers' Defense League attorney believes case has merit. Money needed for legal fees.

The C. O.'s called on for this kind of help have for the most part very limited incomes, and most of them have advanced all the money they can for such purposes. Accordingly, the undersigned have formed a Committee to Aid Convicts and Ex-Convicts and are appealing for contributions to set up a special fund for such emergencies. The money will not be used to help imprisoned C. O.'s or for other "celebrated" cases but exclusively for helpless, friendless men who have got entangled in the cruel net we call justice.

We shall be most grateful if some of your readers are moved to contribute. Gifts should be sent to Alfred Hassler, Treasurer, at 2929 Broadway, New York 25.

The Shape of Things

POLITICAL INSTABILITY AND THE MISERY OF the people of France and Italy have provided plenty of fuel for the strikes and riots set off by the Communists. In France, the political threat is embodied in the concentration of reactionary sentiment around De Gaulle, who, since his electoral triumph, has played up to the worst elements in his following by demanding a three-power alliance (France, Britain, and the United States) against Soviet Russia. In Italy, the rise of fascist groups little different in behavior and orientation from those which preceded Mussolini's seizure of power, has given the extreme left a good excuse for counter demonstrations. In both countries, inflation, shortage of food, and the existence of a brutally unfair black market has driven workers and small professional people close to desperation. No one believes revolution is imminent in either France or Italy. The danger is that Communist efforts to discredit the existing governments—an easy enough job, under the circumstances—may open the way for all-out reaction, especially since their bitter attacks on the Socialists have made collaboration among the parties of the left practically impossible. Yet Ramadier's attempt to strengthen his government by drawing in men like Reynault from the center-right looks like a futile gesture. The further he goes in that direction, the more completely he isolates himself from the workers and risks being forced into the role of a French Noske. His position and that of the non-Communist left in Italy might be strengthened by prompt economic help from America. But if it fails to come, or if it comes slowly and in inadequate amounts and with political conditions attached, only the extreme right and the Communists can benefit.

HIS "INDISCRETION" IN TELLING BUDGET secrets to a reporter before they had been imparted to the House of Commons has cost Hugh Dalton his office as Chancellor of the Exchequer and may have ended his political career. To many Americans, accustomed as they are to political "leaks," that will seem a heavy penalty for the offense. Mr. Dalton seems to have believed, when he gave a preview of his budget speech to a representative of the London Star, that it was too late for the last edition. Evidently he underestimated the speed and enterprise of Fleet Street—a strange miscalculation for one of his experience. At any rate, the Star was able to put a special on the streets within a few minutes, and the Chancellor found that he had scooped himself and violated one of the most sacred traditions of a parliamentary body which is very jealous of its traditions. As Prime Minister Attlee said, in accepting Mr. Dalton's resignation, "The discretion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who necessarily receives many confidential communications, must be beyond question." In a dispatch to the New York Times, Herbert L. Matthews suggests that Mr. Attlee may have welcomed the chance to drop a colleague who had been "almost universally criticized." That theory does not make much sense when one considers that the incident must damage the Labor government's prestige. Moreover, Dalton's ability and fighting spirit in debate had won him the high regard of Laborites inside and outside Parliament. If he was unpopular, it was with the opposition, which feared his caustic tongue, and with the financial press, which, not surprisingly, objected to his acting like a Socialist Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS, WHOSE CAREER IS sketched by Margaret Cole on page 555, has been appointed to succeed Dalton. Cripps had recently been made Minister of Economic Affairs, with general authority over economic planning, and there is a good deal to be said for combining this job with control of the national finances. Implementation of the "austerity" program which Cripps has drafted requires more cooperation from the Treasury than Dalton, perhaps, was always willing to afford. Now Cripps has the driver's seat to himself and is in a better position to keep production, trade, and fiscal policies in step. No man understands better the nature of Britain's economic crisis. He knows that, whatever temporary relief American aid may offer, Britain must find means to live within its physical income, that the improved living standards which are the Labor government's goal depend on an increase in total production. Cripps's insistence on cutting the British coal according to the cloth available has won him the bitter dislike of those Britons who must find a personal devil to blame for their hardships and can't or won't understand the deep-rooted causes of their country's difficulties. The newly ordered draft of "drones" and workers in parasitical trades for employment in vital industries will probably bring him a fresh crop of enemies. Those Britons, however, who realize that they are, in effect, living under siege, will applaud his efforts to insure that burdens as well as benefits are shared.

IF THE NEW TAX PROGRAM WHICH DALTON presented last week had been framed by Cripps, it would probably have been even tougher than it was. The necessity for supplementing last spring's budget did not arise from any deficit; actually, during the first thirty-two weeks of the fiscal year, British revenue exceeded expenditure by over $1,000,000,000. Nevertheless, this large surplus was not sufficient to absorb the excess of purchasing power in the country. As Dalton explained, recent measures to expand exports and contract imports resulted in an addition to money incomes which could not be balanced by increased supplies of goods. He proposed to mop up some of this excess purchasing power by a steep increase in the sales tax, with the rate on luxury items, such as jewelry, going to 125 per cent. Other additions to existing taxes, such as the higher rate on distributed profits, are calculated to check the growth of spendable income or to discourage the waste of scarce resources. A new tax on certain kinds of betting aims a blow at an "industry" which has attracted a huge number of workers from productive employment. Mr. Dalton has been sharply criticized for not being severe enough. In particular, his budget is under attack because it failed to eliminate or reduce food subsidies which have helped to create surplus income by keeping prices of rationed necessities at a low level. However, the Labor government has insisted that in the peace crisis, as in the war, the basic requirements of life must be made available to all, regardless of income. Removal of the food subsidies would result in a sharp rise in prices and mean that the lowest income groups would not be able to afford even the modest diet to which their ration cards entitle them. It would also inevitably lead to new wage demands and disturbance of the labor peace that is so necessary for increased production.

IT IS ENTIRELY APPROPRIATE THAT ONE OF the three Americans involved in the fantastic and abortive expedition to overthrow Trujillo was named Thomas Sawyer. . . . An advertisement for the Visiting Nurse Service in the New York subway has our ears burning. It shows a pretty girl in a nurse's uniform—and bears this caption: "Her phone rang 89,000 times last year." Which is 7,416¾ times a month, which is 247 times a day. The little girl should not only have a hand; she should also have a private number. . . . And speaking of telephone calls, 42,000,000,000 of 'em were completed in the United States in 1946, according to the A. T. and T.'s "Telephone Statistics of the World." The average American used the telephone 301 times in the course of the year, and there are more than 30,000,000 telephones in this country. Russia, on the other hand, has only 1,500,000. But perhaps that's enough, considering that they are all on a party line.

WALTER REUTHER'S VICTORY OVER THE George Addes—R. J. Thomas group at the C. I. O. automobile workers' convention was even more decisive than his most optimistic followers had dared expect. As a result, this young and able socialistic intellectual now firmly controls the executive board of America's most vigorous union. The Atlantic City convention was the climax of a bitter factional struggle. Reuther's victory does not, however, end his difficulties. In the coming months, he faces the following awesome questions: Can he demonstrate the capacity of a radical but anti-Stalinist group to lead a major trade union? Can he reconcile the restraining pressures from the C. I. O. top leadership with the recurrent militant urges of the U. A. W. ranks? Can he carry through a political-action program that will consolidate his support in the union without alienating him too sharply from his more conservative C. I. O. colleagues? Can he balance the divergent tendencies within his own group? And, finally, can he avoid making blunders which the opposition will be waiting eagerly to take advantage of? The first real test of his capacity will be the wage negotiations with the companies in the spring. His situation is a ticklish one, but it has tremendous possibilities, and if Reuther behaves courageously and sticks to principles he may well become the leader of a major segment of militant unionism. Shrewd observers at the convention felt that Reuther made an error in not giving George Addes a major post. In that way, they felt, he might have drawn a competent and respected leader away from the opposition and reduced it to such powerless figures as R. J. Thomas. With Addes, the opposition can be dangerous.

PAUL BLANSHARD'S OUTSPOKEN ARTICLES on the policy of the Roman Catholic church in America, the last of which appeared a week ago, were bound to create immense interest. But some of the by-products of the public's reaction surprised us. Almost as soon as the first of the series, The Roman Catholic Church in Medicine, hit the newsstands, complaints began to come in that readers could not find copies on their usual stands—or anywhere else around. With each article, the complaints multiplied, though we increased the copies distributed. Readers came to the office in unheard-of numbers to buy the issue. A check of the New York area showed many stands sold out a day after the copies were delivered. Others seemed about normal. But dealers themselves may have had something to do with the odd discrepancies. One faithful reader found The Nation buried among several music trade papers on a Pennsylvania Station stand. A dealer on Forty-second Street sold out quickly—or said so—but refused to accept additional copies; another claimed he got no copies of the issue in question, although they had been delivered as usual. A dealer downtown said that one person took all his copies and then bought out several neighboring stands; whether to distribute or destroy, he did not know. Odd things even happened to mailed copies. A number of subscribers have written in to say that those particular issues failed to arrive, though they have had prompt post-office delivery right along. Perhaps their postman was protecting them from dangerous facts. But the most surprising bit of censorship was reported by a Harvard subscriber who reports the issues of The Nation containing the Blanshard articles absent from the library of the Faculty Club. He asks for reprints. We hope he'll send them around to his more sheltered club mates.

Palestine Prospects

THE British statement delivered last week to the Palestine subcommittee meant that Mr. Bevin had not budged an inch since his Colonial Secretary, Arthur Creech-Jones, outlined Britain's Palestine policy in the first days of the Assembly session. This meant that, after anxious weeks of consideration by the General Assembly, during which time constructive measures for settlement had been formulated, Britain was prepared to accept no more responsibility than when it first landed Palestine on the United Nations doorstep last spring.

In view of Britain's latter-day record in India, we had a right to expect more. If Britain had failed in the mandate because the difficulties were such that no single nation could cope with them, then it was proper that Palestine should become the responsibility of the United Nations. But because of its mandate—a mandate which still continues—Britain was morally bound to give the United Nations the cooperation necessary to carry out an agreed solution of the Palestine problem. As one of the world's outstanding Jewish leaders said this week, "Britain had a magnificent opportunity of withdrawing from Palestine with honor—and she missed it."

The reasons for Britain's intransigence are not difficult to find. There is bitterness over being so long in the crossfire of Jewish-Arab antagonism. There is pique over being asked to do what other nations are unwilling to do. There is undoubtedly a rankling sense of guilt. And there is the stubbornness of Mr. Bevin, whose almost psychopathic animosity to Zionism has surged up to the surface in several outbursts at Labor Party conferences. At Lake Success, it is this last which is considered the most important factor: several British delegates and advisers are known to be much more sympathetic than their government to the solution the Palestine working committee had blocked out.

What is amazing—and encouraging—is that the setback caused by Sir Alexander Cadogan's statement is not considered fatal. If the British refuse to cooperate, other ways will have to be found, although obstacles remain which cannot, by any means, be blamed on the British. The Americans, while they reached tentative agreement with the Russians on a broad plan of partition to be implemented by a commission responsible to the Security Council, have behaved in a negative and frequently obstructive manner. They have yet to indicate that they will support a scheme which might require force for its implementation. The Russians, rightly suspicious of British intentions, have shown great unwillingness to modify the committee's proposal to fit the vague British time-table of withdrawal. Nevertheless, of all United Nations committees, the Palestine "working party," made up of the United States, Russia, Canada, and Guatemala, has proved the one most determined to produce a settlement which will be workable and also likely to win the necessary two-thirds vote in the Assembly.

From the practical standpoint, it seems essential that a scheme be devised to fit the British time-table, though the British are admittedly making this as difficult as possible. One method would be to establish the date of ending the mandate by agreement with the British—say, May 1, 1948—and declare that on that day the two states shall become independent. Special arrangements might be made for the withdrawal of the last British troops after May 1 but before August 1, arrangements similar to those for the withdrawal of the French troops from Syria and Lebanon. This would avoid an interim period in which no effective authority would exist. Before the mandate ended, the United Nations commission would supervise the setting up of civil administration and law-enforcement bodies in the nascent states.

An alternative scheme would be to postpone independence until a later date and declare Palestine under United Nations sovereignty between the time the mandate ends—or the last British troops are withdrawn—and the date of full independence. In this case, the problem of keeping order and the authority of the United Nations commission would become of prime importance.

But these questions, along with the geographical and administrative details of the partition plan, will almost certainly have been settled in the subcommittee before this editorial appears. Then the real debate will begin, first in the ad hoc committee and after that in the Assembly itself. How it will come out, no one dares guess. The Arabs can not only be counted upon to fight for their own plan, but to raise every kind of objection, legal, political, and emotional, to the acceptance of partition. The success of the majority plan can be assured in just one way—by the full and energetic support of the United States. The record of our delegation up to this hour gives us little reason to expect such an effort. Once agreement has been reached and the American position fully stated, however, the government's prestige will be committed to the plan. A defeat in the Assembly would be a defeat for the United States on an issue of first importance. For this reason if no other, there are grounds for hope that the Americans will press for a favorable vote in the Assembly.

Bundles for Europe— Without Strings

By FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE NATION has never favored secrecy in the processes of government, but it is hard not to wish the debate in Congress on emergency aid for Europe could be carried on behind sealed doors. That substantial aid will be voted, is certain; both parties are overwhelmingly committed to it. What one dreads is the exhibition to the world public of America's complex of fear, suspicion, superiority, complacency, ignorance, and genuine benevolence of which we have already had revealing previews in the statements of legislators and government officials. When even so conscientious and intelligent a Congressman as Christian Herter qualifies his support of aid by an insistence that American supervision must extend to the last step in the process of distribution and by an anxious hope that nothing will fall into the hands of reds or other unworthy elements, one shrinks from revelations still to come.

We have traveled a long way from the days, last summer, when serious political leaders, here and abroad, discussed the need of giving help to all hungry peoples and disorganized economies. Or when liberals innocently advocated carrying out the Marshall program through the United Nations. What would have happened to both the Administration's emergency and long-range plans had Russia and its satellites joined the sixteen nations is today easy to guess. Whatever Moscow's motives, Molotov's retreat from Paris was a gift of God to Secretary Marshall. It enabled him to put the issue of aid openly on the basis of fighting communism in Europe and to abandon all pretense of general relief and reconstruction. The UNRRA era is dead, and Molotov collaborated with Marshall in killing it.

Whether the Secretary of State intended to include Eastern Europe in his plan as outlined at Cambridge last June, I seriously doubt. He did so as an afterthought, in response to worried protests from political leaders in France and England. But his indorsement of the Bidault-Bevin invitation to Molotov to join their talks on the proposed plan gave the appearance of a reversal of the Truman Doctrine, and offered hope in Europe of a new effort at general reconciliation. American policy thereafter, particularly the sudden revelation of our unilateral program of German industrial revival, together with Russia's abrupt boycott of the whole affair, soon killed that hope, and the sixteen nations settled down to their task of planning for economic revival in the West. But they did so with many misgivings, recognizing the dangers they faced in linking their whole fate to American politics and the hazards and pressures of American free enterprise; and recognizing, too, the crucial necessity, if any plan was to work, of restoring economic relations with Eastern Europe. The coming days will show what that decision implied for West and East alike, as Harold Laski says on page 548. Mr. Truman, Mr. Marshall and his aides, Mr. Harriman, Mr. Krug, the chairmen of various inquiry committees, and other prominent citizens, singly and in combination, have made their proposals; but Congress will dispose. The world awaits its action with concentrated anxiety.

ALTHOUGH the immediate matters under consideration are the emergency needs of France, Italy, and Austria, the entire Marshall Plan will dominate the debate. The special session will properly consider the urgent demands of the President and Secretary of State in the light—or darkness—of Europe's longer future. Those who describe the overall plan as Operation Rathole will be reluctant to appropriate even $600,000,000 for stop-gap aid. Friends of the Marshall Plan will have to defend it as a whole.

So the problems discussed by Harold Laski in his notable article are upon us; they cannot be postponed. We have the formal assurance of the Administration that American aid must be offered without conditions of a political nature; and, for the moment, I am willing to take that as the official position. But two things must be said in this connection: First, Congress is not bound by Administration constraints; it can insist, if it pleases, that the postulates of the Thomas committee be applied to the recipients of American money or supplies. And, second, neither the Administration nor any Congressional leader has suggested that the aid granted should be free of economic conditions. On the contrary, it is everywhere assumed that Congress will never appropriate funds—emergency or otherwise—unless they are administered or supervised by an American authority. The question is whether the directing body shall be a government corporation, like the RFC, or an agency of the State Department.

Mr. Laski urges that American help be given on terms similar to lend-lease, by which he means, I assume, that the United States should leave control to the recipient countries, under general agreements covering terms and purposes. He doubts, however, that this is the intention, and he is right. The intention is, first, a dole, distributed under American direction, and, second, a long-range pump-priming effort administered, perhaps, through joint European-American agencies but controlled as far as possible in Washington. As Mr. Herter said on the air the other night, if we find a country is going Communist or is squandering American money, we can always stop the funds.

It is natural and entirely proper that provisions should be made for the careful handling of funds lent or donated to European countries. The danger is that we will treat the nations receiving aid, not as parties to a transaction, but as recipients of charity, not as sovereign and equal states, but as dependencies. In this mood, even the reasonable inevitable American passion for efficiency and the economical use of funds is bound to have political results. This is made clear in a recent column by David Lawrence. Acknowledging that the Harriman committee had called for "production goals and for piecemeal aid so a check can be maintained" on what is done with the money, Mr. Lawrence criticizes the committee for "surrendering American principle" by deciding against explicit conditions requiring countries to adopt the free-enterprise system in order to qualify for American aid. Mr. Lawrence is sure that the Republican Party will not agree to a scheme which denies this government a voice in the way the money or supplies shall be used abroad; he points out that we don't appropriate $12 billion to $17 billion every day to bail out other countries. I am sure the Republicans he speaks for, and a good many Democrats as well, will agree with him and be ready to believe that European states or statesmen that haggle over such obviously reasonable terms are already past redemption by dollars.

IN THIS situation, the attitude of American progressive groups must be clear. Europe needs help. Only the United States can give it. Isolationist opponents of the Marshall Plan will harp on the dangers of sending goods or dollars to countries which may go Communist tomorrow or, if not, may use our dollars to build a Socialist Europe. Supporters of the plan will stress its properties as a specific against the red fever. Progressives must fight both kinds of reaction at once. Laski's insistence that Europe should get along without America, if it cannot get help without strings, is treatment only a European would have the right to prescribe. American liberals and leftists—Communists apart—cannot possibly advocate a defeat of the Marshall Plan; it is not their stomachs that would go empty. They can only expose the consequences that will follow an attempt to treat Europe like an aged and indigent relative who no longer knows how to order his affairs. Such a policy—emerging partly from our fear of Russia, partly from our fear of socialism—will defeat the small last chance of a democratic Europe. It is this that Americans who still cherish democracy must tell their representatives in Washington during these coming weeks.

Is Europe Done For?

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, November 5

EUROPE is not merely a geographical expression; it is also a great tradition and a quality of mind. It has seen stormy weather before, not unlike the tempests which now sweep across its frontiers. It saw them after the Reformation. It saw them again in the epoch of the French Revolution. There is no reason, then, for surprise that after two world wars and the immense upheaval in Russia, both the sense of crisis and the fact of crisis should seem to non-Europeans the most impressive aspects of its life. It is a Europe in which there has been massive destruction for six years. It is a Europe upon which the impact of war has left a deep sense of fatigue, and which also, because of the nature of the Nazi aggression, has lost a good deal of the habitual discipline that makes the daily routine of life seem a natural obligation. Above all, it is a Europe whose historic ruling class has lost not merely its own self-confidence but the power to impose its traditional values upon the masses except, as in Franco's Spain, by ugly methods of coercion.

Europe today presents the characteristics of a civilization of which the ultimate foundations have been called into question. The establishment of Socialist and Communist governments over so wide an area registers a general dissatisfaction with capitalist society, even with capitalism successful enough to be geared to the luxury of politically democratic institutions; and this is as real a turning-point in history as the slow transformation of feudalism into capitalism. The European crisis is more dramatic and shattering, first, because modern technology has made the pace of change ever more rapid, and, second, because the breakdown of European imperialism, not only in the Far East but, at least as significantly, in Eastern and Southeastern Europe as well, has deprived capitalism of the chance to carry on as a going concern, with the masses paying the price of maintaining their old rulers in their historic privileges.

The crisis in Europe will be a long-term crisis only if that ruling class which the European masses no longer accept is so amply supported by America that it is able either to stage a counter-revolution or to postpone the achievement of stability until, as in Nazi Germany, the masses turn to some demagogue like Hitler in the hope that he will provide the basis of a new equilibrium. For nearly all the vital elements which make for recovery are present in Europe. There is the necessary man-power; there is an abundance of technological skill; there is the productive capacity which, granted the necessary stability, could swiftly replace the losses due to war. What is lacking is the breathing-space required to get Europe working again on the basis of the new leadership seeking to establish itself. In the present condition of the world, winning of that breathing-space means help from the United States for perhaps three or four years or the deliberate acceptance of a reduction in the standard of life. The second alternative, if American help should be withheld, might, as the prelude to Socialist reorganization, mean hard sacrifice followed by a new level of well-being. It might equally, if the rising leadership proved lacking in courage and efficiency and imagination, plunge Europe into a new dark age.

IT IS clear that America is willing to help Europe, but that there are terms upon which the help will be given. In part those terms were revealed by the American loan to Britain; they may be broadly and I think not unfairly described as terms which give the American exporter equal access to markets in which British exporters have previously established supremacy. In part they were revealed by the loans to Greece and Turkey. Stripped of the rhetoric of diplomacy, the Greek and Turkish loans were a defense of American capitalism against the danger of what is called in Washington "Russian expansionism" but may also be described as a fear that the masses in Greece and Turkey, like those in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, will abandon the capitalist way of life. The terms were revealed finally in Mr. Marshall's Harvard speech, and in the series of official pronouncements which have followed, including the Secretary of State's press conference on November 3. The American government will seek large-scale aid for Europe, over a term of years, if Europe can offer real assurance to the United States that American help will be more than a temporary plaster on a wound, will, in fact, assure permanent European recovery.

If American aid, as Mr. Marshall pictures it, were based on those principles which underlay lend-lease in the recent war—rightly described by Mr. Churchill as the most unsordid act in history—I do not think European recovery would be in doubt for one moment. Such a plan would insure the rapid attainment of political stability in Europe, since it would give the new regimes there both the time and the economic elbow-room to consolidate their authority and domesticate the new social values they seek to express. It would also, I believe, enlarge the boundaries of democratic freedom in Europe by giving those regimes, especially in the East, real confidence in their security. This would also release manpower and diminish expenditure upon armaments. It would make possible a swift solution of the German problem by opening the way to the reintegration of Germany into the European economy.

It does not, however, seem likely that the war-time model of lend-lease was in Mr. Marshall's mind. This was forecast both by the withdrawal of the credits granted to Hungary and Czechoslovakia—which was a political, not economic, decision—and by America's rejection of the British plan to nationalize the heavy industries of the Ruhr. It looks, in fact, as if American aid were likely to be conditional on an agreement, not necessarily explicit, on the part of those nations which receive it to halt the process of transforming capitalist societies into socialist societies. American aid, in a word, will be geared into that market economy which is the central principle of capitalism.

IF IT be said, in reply to this, that Great Britain, which has a Labor government, and France, which is partly Socialist, as well as other countries in which Socialist parties play a vital part, are participating in the Marshall Plan, I think the answer is a simple one. Without American aid the British economic position in the next twelve months will be very serious. The Labor government is seeking insurance against the danger of a new crisis like that of 1931. Mr. Bevin's policy, therefore, is to risk the division of Europe in the hope that American aid will enable Great Britain to buy the time it needs for full recovery. The French government fears that a worsening economic position may bring to full power those reactionary forces which are now organized under the leadership of General de Gaulle. That would mean, in effect, the replacement of the nascent Fourth Republic by a new Vichy-France, with General de Gaulle playing the role formerly filled by Marshal Pétain.

Much the same result would occur in Italy: there would be a new fascism, heralded perhaps by return to a monarchy. In both France and Italy, I think, such a change would mean civil war. What it would mean in Britain is more questionable; at the very least it would so divide the Labor movement of this country that the energies now devoted to increasing production would be absorbed in fighting a revival of the classic techniques of capitalism in crisis. If that led to the coalition of which the Tories are now so eagerly talking, it would be the end of the Labor Party; such techniques could not be imposed upon the Labor government with its present majority.

If it be asked why I believe that the terms of American aid must prove unacceptable to the new Socialist leadership in Europe, my answer is that, so far as I can see, those terms would lay the foundation for capitalist revival on the Continent; that capitalist revival would mean counter-revolution; that counter-revolution would mean civil war over half of Europe or perhaps more; and that this civil war might very easily provoke a third world conflagration. If it be urged that the American government has no such desires or purposes in mind, I agree at once. I am not concerned with the intentions of the American government; I am concerned with the far more serious question of what the American government must do if it is determined—as clearly both the Republican and Democratic parties are determined—to preserve the "American way of life," which is, after all, no more than a pseudonym for American capitalism. The grave problems confronting American capitalism can be postponed only if that inner horizontal expansion which the epoch of the frontier made possible is replaced by an outer horizontal expansion. This means that, in relation first to Asia and next to Europe and the Middle East, America must become an investing and exploiting power. That only half-conscious need, that drive to build relations which are independent of the wills even of the men who build them, lies at the root of American hostility to Russia and of its anxiety to reconstruct Germany on the basis of private enterprise. For such a Germany means not only a great field for American investment; it means that American capitalists, as Germany becomes reorganized, can dominate France—and in partnership with Germany seek to keep Russia within limits they regard as safe.

EUROPE needs a unified economy like the continental economy which permitted the vast expansion of the United States in the nineteenth century. Given that economy, all the conditions are present for European economic revival and, not less important, for a great cultural revival like that of the Renaissance. But European unity can now be achieved only on a socialist basis. Capitalism does not permit any of the conditions unity requires. It does not permit large-scale disarmament. It does not permit full employment, or the planned use of raw materials, or the coordination of reequipment in industry and agriculture. It means a competitive export policy within Europe instead of a planned export policy for the whole Continent. Above all, it prevents that reshaping of the European wage structure on which the whole problem of increased output ultimately depends. All of these are purposes compatible with a socialist Europe. But all of them involve, also, so profound a change in the relations of production, in the legal system of ownership, that they would bring to a close the history of bourgeois civilization there. To all intents, they would end the European phase of capitalist economy.

These changes are therefore fiercely opposed in Europe itself by the classes which have hitherto ruled European life. For once the market economy is transcended, society produces for use and not for profit, since price no longer remains the clue to the market's self-regulating mechanism, the master-method to which all other institutional techniques must be subordinated. These changes mean also the rapid abrogation of privilege and, not least, of the use of national sentiment as a smoke screen behind which peoples who have no quarrel with each other are yet driven to fight in defense of privileges which simply abridge the quality of their lives. They mean, further, internal security at a far higher level than in any previous period, since much of what is now diverted to national defense could be used for the production of creative goods and services. But it is quite certain that the ruling classes in Europe will only abdicate if it is made inescapably clear that they cannot rely upon American assistance in any effort they may make to roll back the mounting wave of socialism and to reimpose upon the masses, even at the cost of conflict, that traditional discipline which maintains and safeguards their privileges.

So, in a vital sense, the question of whether Europe has a future will be answered in Washington, answered perhaps before many weeks have gone by. A united socialist Europe would of course have immense effects in America, psychological as well as economic. The economic effect would be a compulsion upon American capitalists to open their own vast internal market to European goods; this sooner or later would raise for the American economy all the questions it has been seeking to postpone for more than a generation. There would also be immense repercussions upon the party structure and so upon the political institutions of the United States. Psychologically, the effect would be to raise swiftly, and in far more dramatic form, all the issues which lurked upon the horizon in the creative period of the New Deal. One way of putting it is to say that socialist principles would be given their first real letters of credit in America; another is to say that America's influence would be exerted to bring the "century of the common man" instead of the "American century." Better, perhaps, than either formulation is to say that the American century would become the century of the common man all over the world.

Like all pre-revolutionary phases in history, this is an age of disillusion and pessimism, and I do not know whether America, especially Young America, is adventurous enough to embark upon a policy which means the self-preparation of the United States for a revolution by consent. On a short-term view this means asking the giant economic interests of America for the exercise of massive self-restraint at a time when they obviously feel that they have the world at their feet. But on a long-term view it has obvious advantages for the ordinary folk of America. For if, in their name, the American government assists in the revival of European capitalism, we shall have taken a long step on the road to war, and at its end America, with no markets to supply, will have to make the choice between socialism and democracy on the one hand and capitalism and dictatorship on the other. For a capitalism which finds itself incapable of horizontal expansion turns quickly to the overthrow of democracy. Anyone who examines the opposition of the "economic royalists" to President Roosevelt's social reforms will have no difficulty in seeing that this is the case.

THE future of Europe depends therefore, in my view, upon its economic unification; and this can be obtained in either the hard way or the civilized way. The hard way implies a resolute refusal of American help on any terms which prevent Europe's leaders from completing the transition to a socialist economy; it will mean a generation of suffering, the possibility of civil war, the slow ascent from darkness to light. The fear of all this has led to the enthusiastic reception of Mr. Marshall's proposal. The civilized way is a revival of lend-lease for some such period as five years, with the inclusion of Eastern Europe and Russia among its beneficiaries. By that way, in my judgment, the "iron curtain" could be penetrated, the latent democratic forces of Russia could be mobilized, and we could solve the urgent problems which center in the release of atomic energy.

If what I have called the civilized way appears to the political leaders of America an impossible choice, then, for myself, I hope the political leaders of Europe will choose the hard way. I do not think it would mean the end of Europe, any more than the fall of Rome meant the end of Europe. It would impose great hardship for a long period of time. It would lower the standard of life. It would mean, almost certainly, a long winter for democracy and freedom. To ask one's leaders to make that choice is a terrible thing. But if the civilized way is not open to them, and they refuse to exact the sacrifices of the hard way, they are only postponing a decision their successors may well have to make in far more difficult circumstances.

Above all I believe it is for the government of Great Britain to take the lead. The Labor government was given its immense majority in Parliament to lay the foundations of a socialist commonwealth in this country, and it would be cowardly for it to withdraw because the task must be accomplished under a stormy sky. This is one of those supreme moments when Britain may once more save itself by its exertions, as it may save civilization by its example. It is the people who ride out the tempest who bring back their ship into harbor.

The New Chicago Fires

BY HOMER A. JACK

Chicago, November 12

ON JULY 16 the people of Chicago read in their newspapers that James Hickman, a steel-worker, had shot and killed his former landlord. This deed was the culmination of a tragedy which began last January when four of Hickman's seven children were burned to death. Hickman had come to Chicago with his family in 1945 and searched desperately for an apartment. David Coleman promised him a second-floor apartment in a building on Chicago's southwest side, but the apartment was not ready when the Hickmans wanted to move in. So they were "temporarily" crowded into a tiny attic cubicle fourteen feet square, with only one small window and with no water, toilet, gas, light, heat, or fire escape. The Hickmans lived in this attic until January 16, 1947, when there was a fire. The four youngest children, ranging from three to fourteen years, were burned to death, and Mrs. Hickman and two other children escaped only by jumping out of the window.

The coroner's inquest revealed that Coleman had several times tried to evict all the tenants of the building so that he could convert the flats into more profitable "one-room and kitchenettes." Tenants testified that Coleman had said he would do anything to get them out, "even if it takes a fire to do it." Witnesses told of seeing a man run out of the building just before the fire was discovered. The jury was unable to decide whether the fire was of incendiary origin, although fire investigators privately believe that it was. The verdict criticized the owners of the building for "permitting such conditions to exist." To the father of the four children who had died this seemed pretty mild. Still brooding over his loss, Hickman went to Coleman's house six months after the fire and shot him. Coleman died in the hospital four days later, and Hickman was indicted for murder.

One more fact. Hickman happened to be a Negro—as was Coleman. This added a new element to the situation—the penalty Negroes pay for being Negroes under the acute housing shortage in Chicago and the nation. A Hickman Defense Committee was organized. Competent legal talent headed by Leon Despres, an attorney active in civil-liberty cases, was retained, and a campaign was started for funds and sponsors. The trial began early this month. Hickman killed a man, assuredly, but he had accomplices—the people and government of the city of Chicago.*

ON OCTOBER 10 Chicagoans read that ten Negroes had died in a midnight tenement-house fire on West Ohio Street. A few citizens realized that this was not just another fire. And so did Chicago officialdom. By ten o'clock that morning Cook County's dapper State's Attorney William J. Touhy was poking around in the ashes and posing for pictures. By twelve o'clock Mayor Kennelly had visited the ruins and told the press he was ordering a "full and complete" investigation.

Chicago race-relations experts already knew part of the story. The apartment house was in the middle of a "tension area," where Italian Americans and others were resisting the "invasion" of Negroes. The files of the Mayor's Commission on Human Relations and the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination contain a brief account of the violence that had accompanied this resistance:

7/5/44—"Molotov cocktail"; 2/10/45—brick through window; 5/9/45—building stoned; 8/45—stones through window; 9/11/45—arson and bricks; 7/10/46—arson; 10/30/46—arson; 8/12/47 and 9/15/47—vandalism.

Two years before, just as some Negro families were expected to move in, there had been an incendiary fire in the same tenement. The Negroes had moved in, however, and remained the only Negroes in the block.

The press lost no time in digging out certain facts connected with the fatal October fire. The owner of the building was found to be in the business of converting slum properties for Negro occupancy at a fat profit. He bought this particular building in 1945 for $9,500, cut the apartments into one- and two-room kitchenettes, and collected monthly rentals totaling $2,000. The Chicago Sun in a graphic story slapped a picture of the burned tenement next to one of Mayor Kennelly's residence, the swank Edgewater Beach Apartments. The Sun showed that a two-room apartment in the tenement, furnished and including the "privileges" of sharing kitchen and toilet, cost $78 a month, while a plushy apartment in the Gold Coast building, unfurnished, but including an in-a-door bed, refrigerator, private bathroom, and kitchenette, cost $74.50.

*Since Mr. Jack wrote, the jury in the Hickman case, after deliberating nineteen hours, has been unable to agree on a verdict, and the judge has declared a mistrial.—EDITORS THE NATION.

HOMER JACK, a Unitarian minister, is executive secretary of the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination.

A blue-ribbon coroner's jury headed by Horace Cayton, the sociologist, set about the task of finding the cause of the ten deaths on Ohio Street. The fire could not immediately be pinned on the owner, although he was undoubtedly guilty of some degree of negligence. The jury then had to decide whether the fire was incendiary in origin. Police and fire investigators refused to admit the probability of arson until, through a stratagem which cannot yet be divulged, testimony was extracted from the chief of detectives that there was evidence the hallway had been soaked with a 70 per cent solution of an inflammable fluid. Largely on the basis of this evidence the Sun and the Negro Chamber of Commerce each offered a $1,000 reward for evidence leading to the arrest and conviction of persons responsible for the fire.

At this writing, the rewards are still standing; nothing more has been discovered, although eighteen detectives have been working for more than three weeks to obtain clues from a tight-lipped neighborhood. Earle Downs, a veteran City Hall fire investigator, told me that the fire was incendiary in origin and that "some day we'll get our man—providing more than one man set it."

A THIRD fire is still smoldering in Chicago—in the City Hall. It is threatening the Chicago Housing Authority and the Mayor's Commission on Human Relations. Mayor Kennelly himself helped to set it when he refused to issue a strong statement reaffirming the city's policy of non-discrimination during and after the Fernwood race riots in mid-August. At that time ten thousand whites in the surrounding section of the city demonstrated violently for almost a week in an effort to intimidate eight Negro families which had moved into an emergency veterans' housing project in a "white" neighborhood (see The Nation of September 13). The Negro veterans still live in the project, but the Mayor's attitude has given certain elements reason to believe they can challenge the city's policy. Even some Protestant ministers, seeing Kennelly's reluctance to support former Mayor Kelly's policy of non-discrimination in public and private housing, recently asked him, no doubt in Christian terms, to remove the Negro tenants from the project.

Community venom is chiefly directed at the moment against the present administration of the Housing Authority and the Human Relations Commission; it was the commission which, more than any other municipal agency, not excluding the police, prevented the Fernwood riot from developing into a major conflagration. The Fernwood-Bellevue Civic Association has condemned the Housing Authority for "provoking violence, riot, bloodshed, juvenile and adult delinquency, discrimination, and destruction of friendly and harmonious understanding between the races of people in this city" and criticized the commission for being "motivated by the conviction that the only solution to the problem of harmonious racial relationship is by infiltration and commingling of the respective races, contrary to the sober conclusions of the truly representative members of all racial groups."

Attacks on the C. H. A. coincided with efforts to block the passage of municipal bond issues for land clearance and relocation housing in the November elections. At first, two groups opposed the bonds—Negroes who felt with some justification that they might be "redeveloped" out of even their present slum areas and whites who feared that the relocation housing might take in Negro families. Groups demanding a non-segregated redevelopment program agreed to postpone their campaign until after the referendum on the bond issues, but forty-two neighborhood "improvement" associations openly asked for the defeat of the measures. An aggressive campaign to pass the bond issues was then undertaken by such conservative forces as the State Street Council, the Chicago Bar Association, and the Chicago Association of Commerce. Even the Chicago Tribune gave the bonds last-minute support, pledging, however, that it would help remove the "irresponsibles and incompetents" from the Housing Authority. Mayor Kennelly refused to support the C. H. A. publicly and in a speech on election eve indicated that "any weakness" in its present procedures would be corrected. The housing bond issues were passed by a vote of two to one, with slum clearance—according to the unofficial returns—receiving next to the most votes of the ten bond issues before the voters. The City Council has now launched a full-fledged investigation of the C. H. A. on the complaint of the alderman from Fernwood that it "persists in theories of housing which are shared by no other local government agencies and are not in accord with those of a great majority of citizens."

The Mayor's Commission on Human Relations is facing a similar fight for existence. A subcommittee of the City Council has refused to give it the usually routine permission to reallocate certain of its funds for salary payments, and one alderman has bluntly stated that "the commission is doing more to hinder amicable relations between racial groups than to help them." The commission's staff faces a payless November and December unless the subcommittee's ruling is reversed. And yet, on its current budget of $55,000, the commission easily saved the city a hundred times that amount by helping prevent the Fernwood riots from spreading.

The future of both the C. H. A. and the commission—and the future of human relations in Chicago for a generation—depends on Mayor Kennelly. He has been repeatedly visited in recent weeks by leading church, labor, settlement, Negro, and other civic-minded groups and asked to support the two agencies. Privately he has told friends that he doesn't like such pressure. One wonders how he feels about the pressure being brought to bear on him by business acquaintances who oppose the Authority and the commission.

Chicago liberals who voted for Kennelly last April as a reform candidate have been astounded to see him fall far below the standards set by former Mayor Kelly in the field of inter-group relations. Kelly organized the first mayor's committee on race relations in the nation and put many Negroes in high city offices, including the chairmanship of the C. H. A. Chicagoans realize that Kennelly wants to do right but lacks experience, and they fervently hope he will learn that in running a big city there are other goals besides balancing the books and other useful advisers besides executives with "a practical business viewpoint."

Return to Russia

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, October 25

WHEN after an absence of a few months a person returns to a country where he has been living for some time, he nearly always finds that it has not changed as much as he had expected. On landing in Leningrad, I found the passport officer just as polite and the old customs official just as casual and jocular as last time: "I suppose we ought to play through all your gramophone records, but it's too much of a sweat—never mind." And when I pointed to a case he hadn't opened, he said "never mind" again, adding with a grin: "Probably more stockings and sweets from Stockholm; they'll appreciate them in Moscow." On the quayside, meanwhile, a jubilant welcome, complete with cameras, microphones, and bunches of autumn flowers was being staged for the Russian chess players, who had returned on the same boat from their victorious visit to London. They made little speeches paying homage to the high standard of British chess and attributed their success to the conditions created by "our physical-culture authorities" and to the fatherly care of Comrade Stalin, "the Fizkulturiks' best friend."

Leningrad was alive again on that mellow autumn day, with the golden dome of St. Isaac's and the golden spire of the Admiralty glittering in the sun, and the Neva a deep, dark blue. It seemed more crowded than in summer, though not so crowded as Moscow; quite a number of Leningrad families still have flats of three or four rooms. One of the post-war achievements of Leningrad is the reconstruction of the numerous seaside resorts, with their bungalows, sanatoria, and bath houses, on the formerly Finnish Karelian Isthmus; the restoration of the Tsarskoe Selo palaces, which were burned down by the Germans in 1944, is also in progress. The city's industries, this year as last, were in first place for performance.

On the train between Leningrad and Moscow I noticed, after only three months, that the rebuilding of the destroyed villages had been carried much farther; also more food was being sold at the railway stations, and the Red Arrow had reduced its time from fourteen to thirteen hours. The latest figures show that four million people in the countryside of Russia proper have now been moved from dugouts into houses.

TWO things stand out clearly as I look at Russia again—a betterment in material conditions as a result of a relatively good harvest, and a sharp and anxious concern about the "American menace." While food and clothes are still in the main rationed, I find much larger supplies of consumer goods in Moscow than were available three months ago—mostly Russian goods but also some from Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Germany. Household articles, wireless sets, and a few other things are cheap, as Moscow prices go, even in the non-ration shops. Foreign news in the press is read with the greatest eagerness; people study detailed reports of the United Nations debates to discover what are the chances of an improvement in international relations. Vishinsky's "anti-war monger" speech made a deep impression, and not least the fact that he gave the "warmongers' " names and quoted their utterances. It was taken as proof positive that trouble was brewing. In consequence the sense of national solidarity seems greatly heightened. This change is very striking.

Last winter little was heard of the progress of industrial reconstruction, and during the spring and summer all attention was focused on agriculture. No stone was left unturned by the Communist Party in all its endless ramifications to make the harvest a success, though it is not yet equal to a very good pre-war harvest. But now news is coming in about industry. The outstanding example of what has been accomplished is the reconstruction of a large part of the Zaporozhie steel mills: to rebuild these huge plants out of literally nothing it was necessary to send to the spot large numbers of technical personnel and to coordinate no fewer than sixty supplying industries all over the country. Another factory that has been wholly rebuilt is the large synthetic-rubber plant at Voronezh. If up to last March industry was barely managing to fulfil its schedule under the Five-Year Plan, it has shown a sharp and steady improvement since April, and now, it is felt, the wheels have at last begun to turn properly, and there is every prospect, international weather permitting, of the plan being fully realized by 1950.

FOR the Russians the Marshall Plan is symbolic of the whole Soviet-American conflict. They think it would prove in the end ineffective, even if the capital invested in Europe reached an astronomical figure; but at the same time they think it politically very dangerous, for they are convinced that America will attach political conditions to every penny given or lent to Europe. They see the plan as a camouflaged instrument for the strategic penetration of Europe and the establishment of a bastion against the Soviets in western Germany.

They argue that despite enormous post-war difficulties Eastern Europe—notably, the Soviet Union, Poland, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia—is steadily building a sound economy with the help of state planning. This planning may vary from country to country; in Russia it is now based on the principle of technical competence, while in Yugoslavia it is still at that "mass-enthusiasm" stage which Russia passed through in the early thirties. The standard of living in the various eastern countries will not for a long time reach an even level. But all the countries with a planned economy—that is, "real" socialism—are, as seen here, moving in the right direction, and the danger of crises and slumps has been reduced to a minimum, the only incalculable factor being the weather. A common remark heard in Russia, and not by any means only from party members, is: "We know, more or less, where we are going; we have something to look forward to. Has Western Europe any idea where it is going?"

The accounts Russians get of the West are no doubt highly colored, but who can deny that in France a small minority is living wonderfully well on the black market, while the mass of the population—especially the urban population—live miserably. The remedy, the Russians argue, will surely not be supplied by occasional dollar injections, especially when the injections have conditions attached to them. "In the name of democracy," one Russian commentator says, "the Americans want to put one-third of the French nation [the Communists] beyond the pale." That, and Greece, and the "Negro problem" are considered irrefutable arguments debunking the purity of Western democracy.

Bevin and Attlee were naturally denounced with particular violence in the joint communiqué of the nine Communist parties meeting in Warsaw because they appear to the Russians as the middlemen who are "selling out Europe's socialist birthright for a mess of dollars." The new Communist organization, Russians insist, is not concerned with the promotion of Communist revolution in Europe but is merely a defense measure against the Marshall Plan and other capitalist devices. Once you interpret the jargon correctly, you understand what is meant by the statement: "The right-wing Socialists are the worst enemies of European democracy."

TOADYING to the West" in political, economic, artistic, and scientific matters has been condemned with great violence time and again, especially since Zhdanov's famous discourse on literature. But a new note is now often struck in the press. A recent article by the well-known writer Leonid Leonov explained that Russia is not fundamentally hostile to the West but cannot help distrusting it because it has been so consistently ungrateful to Russia and even, on many occasions, has stabbed it in the back. Did not Russia save Europe from the Tartar invasion? Did not Russia bear the brunt of the struggle against Nazi Germany? The roles of Russia and the United States in the last war tend to be symbolized, as they are in a new poem by Alexei Surkov, by the blood men shed at Stalingrad and the blood of pigs killed in the stockyards of Chicago.

The war has made America rich and other people poor. And are the poor, Ilya Ehrenburg asks in a striking article, less deserving than the rich? He then enters upon a discourse about the relative merits of Europe and America and comes to the, in some ways, surprising conclusion that all Europe, including Russia, has a common cultural heritage and is civilized in a higher sense than America, which is "technically efficient" but not civilized. Ehrenburg even comes out with a strong defense of Matisse and Picasso as great masters and as "part of our common heritage." (The editor of the paper, in a footnote, disclaims responsibility for this view.)

Such articles as these may be considered concessions to some existing "pro-Western" feeling. Germany is not touched upon in Ehrenburg's article, but in others great interest is displayed in the German people, and particularly in the recent congress of German writers in Berlin.

It is perhaps significant that a German film like "The Murderers Among Us" should have been widely shown in Russia. In terms of war-time propaganda it is completely unorthodox; it should be viewed perhaps as an attempt to explain certain kinks in the German character. The German hero finds himself incapable of killing a "rehabilitated" S. S. man, though he loathes the man and knows that he committed hundreds of murders, and arrives at the strange conclusion that it is not for Germans to punish other Germans. Advocacy of a more "understanding" attitude toward the German people goes with references to Western Europe as still, in spite of everything, "different from America."

It is hoped, and believed, that forces are at work in Western Europe which will counteract American economic pressure and also the American "ideological" and "cultural" influence which the Russians find almost as disturbing. Much is written here about the "flooding" of Europe, especially the Scandinavian countries, with magazines like Time and Reader's Digest and with American best-sellers which have a definite anti-Soviet purpose. The way Kravchenko's book, "I Chose Freedom," was "pushed" in England is considered illustrative of the American ideological crusade in Europe.

Stafford Cripps

BY MARGARET COLE

IT IS less than a dozen years since the British Labor Party in conference emphatically rejected Stafford Cripps. It had consented to hear him in his own defense, and by one of the errors of human judgment to which he used to be unfortunately prone, he had chosen to deliver a lawyer's defense of his Socialist League activities rather than an appeal to the sympathies of the delegates. Today he is Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as Economic Director for the Labor government with three ministers under him—Hugh Gaitskell at Fuel and Power, George Strauss at Supply, Harold Wilson at the Board of Trade—all of whom share his general idea about the present job of British industry. Most people thought that Cripps would get a really important post some time, but they were not quite sure what or when. For his ups and downs of popularity within his party over the last eighteen years have been as marked as the ups and downs of the party in the country.

He has a background which repays study. His father, Alfred Cripps, Q.C. under Victoria, later Lord Parmoor, was a highly successful barrister, in his earlier years a Tory. Beatrice Webb, Alfred Cripps's sister-in-law, judged him a careerist, and her diaries of about the turn of the century contain quite a few slighting remarks about the "little jewel of an advocate" and his lack of real principle—a judgment he proved quite wrong by becoming a convinced pacifist and internationalist and accepting office in Ramsay MacDonald's first government. Stafford's mother was Teresa Potter, one of the daughters of Richard Potter, of whom Beatrice Webb was the eighth. Teresa died young, but the Potter inheritance is so clear in Stafford that sometimes he seems more like Mrs. Webb's son than her nephew. He does not look like "an untidy eagle," as H. G. Wells described his aunt—he looks more like an owl—but he shares her asceticism, to which delicate health may have contributed in both cases. Beatrice Webb approved of good but plain food—she was never tired of saying that Lord Haldane was "eating himself to death"; Stafford likes plain food which most people would not even call good, and when in 1942 he went as plenipotentiary to India, many Englishmen prayed that he would not meet Gandhi and return convinced that a loin cloth and some rice and salt provided "the essential minimum of civilized life"—to quote the Webbs.

He has Beatrice's deep religious instincts, but he is a Christian, whereas she never found a satisfying creed until she went to the Soviet Union. He has her unswerving sense of public duty and her disregard of opinion when principles are at stake; and he has, also, her slight "ham-handedness" in relations with colleagues. She was, and he is, genuinely kind and friendly, but natural "bonhomousness" of the Franklin D. Roosevelt or George Lansbury type was left out of their make-up, and Stafford's efforts to be "matey" in the early days of the Socialist League occasionally made one shiver. (The tradition of public service and public obstinacy is well carried on by Stafford's attractive son, John, conscientious objector and agricultural worker during the war and now editor of that remarkable journal the Countryman.)

Stafford went to Winchester, where he distinguished himself in science. He missed World War I owing to ill health, and set to work at the Bar, quickly becoming a success. His specialty was company and patent-law cases, in which there is plenty of money to hire top liners. Stafford was a top liner; by 1932 the table in his chambers was thick with briefs, and the fees he gave up when he entered government service amounted to something like £30,000 ($120,000) a year. The knowledge his work brought him of the managerial end of business and industry, knowledge in which Labor is still not rich, stood him in excellent stead at the Ministry of Aircraft Production and later at the Board of Trade and will certainly be valuable now. Patent-law cases have not generally much need of advocacy, but Stafford is also a brilliant advocate. His most effective speeches in Parliament, such as that made after the shocking Gresley colliery disaster in 1934, have been speeches made to a brief, an indictment of something or other. At such times he becomes fully human and loses the tendency to lecture which sometimes mars his more affirmative efforts.

He slid into politics in an effortless and non-spectacular manner: he was the obvious choice for Solicitor General in MacDonald's second government. But he sprang into prominence after the crash of 1931, when he rejected without hesitation the appeal of Lord Sankey, the Lord Chancellor, that all the law officers should stick to MacDonald. He went out with Arthur Henderson and the rest, and at the ensuing election had the satisfaction of seeing the East Bristol electors remain faithful to him, although by a narrow majority. He, Clem Attlee, and George Lansbury were the only front-benchers to survive the catastrophe; he thus became in one bound a national leader.

But not for very long. Within a few years his sense of the coming crisis had taken him into paths where the party of the thirties would not follow him. He, along with Attlee, G. D. H. Cole and his wife, William Mellor, once editor of the Daily Herald, Colin Clark the economist, Gaitskill, and others, had seen that the débâcle of the party, Macdonald or no Macdonald, was largely due to the fact, brought to notice by the antics of Oswald Mosley, that Labor had really no policy for coping with economic storms. Accordingly, this group founded the New Fabian Research Bureau (now the Fabian Society) and the ill-fated Socialist League, whose purpose was to be a forward pressure group within the party. Aneurin Bevan, George Strauss, D. N. Pritt, and the weekly Tribune were among its leaders.

The Socialist League in its short life made two tactical mistakes. It was over-doctrinaire—to a single party program it moved at one conference no fewer than seventy-eight amendments, boring everybody—and it committed itself to the policy of a popular front with Communists and others, a policy which neither the trade unions nor the bigger divisional parties like the London Labor Party would consider.

During the war Cripps, as ambassador to Moscow—appointed because he was believed to be persona grata to the Kremlin—held a job which must have been about as cheerful as an assignment in a refrigerator. Russian conviviality, so far as it was displayed to him, was hardly in his line; and people on his staff have given vivid descriptions of the grim way in which the embassy was commonly treated. On his return to Britain he was given laurels as "the man who brought the Russians in on our side," which was of course quite untrue. The man who achieved that was in Berlin, and Stafford knew no better than anyone else whether the Russians could sustain resistance. But he was, for a while, extremely popular; his first "austerity" broadcast, which in a flat cold voice offered not blood, tears, and sweat but queuing up for food, mending, and keeping clean with rationed soap in the blackout, was received with gloomy satisfaction, and when he went out to India many felt sure that the man who could deal with Stalin must be able to deal with Gandhi. It is a matter of history how narrowly the nine days of hectic activity missed success.

On his return he took on Aircraft Production, a job after his scientific and managerial heart. His seat was magnificently safe, and high office in a Labor Cabinet certain. Until last summer his main task was to get the "working parties" going for non-nationalized industries—important work, but not of a kind which brought him to the eye of the general public. It was only when the clouds closed in that people were ready again to respond to the voice which, of all the voices of the government, seems to be able to say most clearly and with most conviction that austerity and rationing are not being sought for their own sake, and are not just a cruel burden imposed upon the British housewife by unkind Americans, but are a necessity for the job of building not the old but a better Britain. Stafford Cripps does not mince words or put things picturesquely; when he thinks it ridiculous to suppose that any Tom, Dick, or Harry from the work bench can step right in and run industry, he says so, and there is a good deal of ideological snorting. But he means what he says: he faces facts and reads out the sums and their answers. And the British people can do with a good deal more of that type of talk than they get.

Del Vayo—Victory on Spain

THE United Nations discussion on Spain has once more demonstrated that after nine years of Franco the Spanish issue retains all its power to arouse and divide people. Throughout the two-day debate in the Political Committee the meeting room was crowded and the atmosphere overheated. I have frequently warned appeasers of Franco that the Spanish story cannot be killed. This time the first attempt to kill it was made by the American delegation. As soon as the representative of the Dominican Republic opened the debate with a proposal that the question be dropped from the agenda, everyone knew he was speaking for the State Department. This is one of the menial services that the Gran Benefactor, Trujillo, must render the United States in exchange for this country's continued toleration of a regime which disgraces the Western Hemisphere.

It was immediately apparent that the majority of the delegations were not ready to permit the American maneuver to succeed. An impassioned debate of two days ended with the adoption of a resolution "reaffirming" the General Assembly's decision of last December and "expressing confidence that the Security Council will exercise its responsibilities under the Charter" in the case of Spain. The resolution achieves two aims. First, as Mr. Gromyko correctly pointed out, it strikes a "new moral blow at the Franco regime"; second, it keeps the Spanish issue on the agenda of the Security Council, which will have to deal with the problem "as soon as it considers that the situation in Spain so requires." It is my personal conviction that the Spanish people will see to it that the situation "so requires" sooner than is imagined by certain delegates who argued that strong measures would be resented in Spain.

Even those Spaniards who were confident that the United Nations would eventually open its doors to Franco now realize that this hope is finished. Neither last summer's rigged plebiscite, staged deliberately to impress the coming Assembly, nor the aggravated international situation, on which Franco is counting to remain indefinitely in power, has brought the Spanish dictator an inch farther along the road to Lake Success. The vote last week—the fifth in which the United Nations has voiced its condemnation of Europe's last surviving Axis member—definitely slammed the door in Franco's face. Cut off from the international organization and all its affiliated agencies, fascist Spain stands alone, in complete and terrible isolation. The effect in Spain will be considerable. That large sector of vacillating opinion which, though against Franco, never dared take a stand because he seemed to be gaining strength internationally, will realize now that Spain is shut out of the world community as long as he remains in power. The Political Committee tightened the noose around the throat of the hated dictatorship and by its vote recorded an important victory for Spanish democracy.

The decision might also have been, with Palestine, the greatest accomplishment of the present Assembly. A Soviet-American rapprochement on Spain could have cleared the atmosphere for the coming Foreign Ministers' Conference in London. That this did not happen is entirely the fault of the American delegation.

I am in a position to affirm that from the start of the discussion this year the Russians were the most conciliatory and anxious to arrive at unanimity among the big powers. From the public point of view, this was made clear in their acceptance of a resolution which they considered far too weak. The Polish delegate, Dr. Lange, even withdrew his own strongly worded proposal and worked hard in the Drafting Committee to find a compromise acceptable to everyone. Conciliation was evident, too, in the moderate speech of the Yugoslav delegate, Bebler, and in the skill with which Ukrainian Foreign Minister Manuilsky avoided being drawn into a secondary fight. All this is a matter of public record. From personal knowledge I can add that the Slav bloc had decided in a meeting held on November 10, the eve of the general debate, to go more than halfway to reach an accord with the United States and Great Britain. It was only when they discovered, through the reports of persons who approached the United States delegation and through certain indiscreet remarks of John Foster Dulles, that the Americans would oppose any resolution embarrassing to Franco, that Gromyko delivered his well-documented speech criticizing American policy in Spain.

One voice absent from the debate was that of Léon Jouhaux, France's great labor leader, who stirred the Assembly last year to a moment of genuine emotion when he answered the mediocre and hypocritical arguments of Senator Connally by describing the heroism of the Spanish resistance, maintained throughout the years in spite of the betrayal of the democracies. This time France voted for the resolution; but Jouhaux has returned to Paris, and Parodi, surely following instructions from the Quai d'Orsay, avoided taking any position that could offend the Americans. Apart from Gromyko's speech, the two high points of the debate were the eloquent remarks of Mrs. Pandit, flaying Argentina's wilful defiance of the December resolution, and Jan Masaryk's shrewd, able address.

What happened last week proves either that the United States does not want an understanding with Russia or that its diplomats are extremely inept. The reasons given for their position were wholly unconvincing. To abstain from voting for the resolution simply because the United States disliked the use of the phrase "to reaffirm" is utterly absurd. As Dr. Alfaro, Foreign Minister of Panama, succinctly pointed out: either you affirm a resolution passed last year with the vote of the United States, or you declare that you no longer stand by the resolution and you destroy it. The majority, by their votes, indorsed his verdict.

The attitude and tactics of the American delegation proved once more that a foreign policy based on the single objective of stopping Russia is sure to end in the surrender of every democratic principle. No wonder such a policy is difficult to explain in logical or convincing language.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Wall Street Tax Plans

SOME months ago Representative Knutson, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, appointed an advisory committee to assist in the formulation of a long-range program for revision of the federal tax structure. It was a very carefully selected body. At its head was Roswell Magill, professor of law at Columbia University and associated with a prominent firm of corporation lawyers. His colleagues included a movie magnate who was once president of the N. A. M., a Republican governor, a New York banker and director of many corporations, a Virginia manufacturer, a couple of other corporation lawyers, an economist employed by the Association of American Railroads, and the head of a farmers' milk cooperative. Just to make the group completely representative, a labor leader was added. The choice seemed safe enough, for Matthew Woll is the outstanding Republican in the A. F. of L. However, it proved a mistake, for Mr. Woll, resisting strong pressure, not only refused to sign the committee's report but blasted it as disguised tax relief for the "favored few."

It is not, I think, unfair, to identify this committee with Wall Street or to assume that its recently published report gives us a clear picture of the triple-play strategy for "tax reform" which has been devised by Wall Street and its Republican allies. First there is to be a reduction of income-tax rates across the board, as provided for in last session's vetoed tax bill, which Mr. Knutson promises to reintroduce as soon as possible. Next there are to be "structural reforms"—changes in the federal tax code relating to methods of assessment of personal and corporation taxes and estate duties. Finally, the load taken off the upper brackets by these measures is shifted to the shoulders of low-income receivers by means of a general excise or sales tax.

The specific task assigned to the Magill committee was to work out detailed plans for stage two of this program. However, its report touches revealingly, if briefly, on the other two steps. "Adjustment" of personal-income-tax rates and schedules, it suggests, is an immediate necessity, and while it admits that reductions must afford some cost-of-living relief to lower-income groups, its emphasis is on the damage done "by a tax system which, instead of rewarding people in proportion to how much they strive and accomplish, punishes them with a graduated penalty which increases with their success." But the committee is not yet prepared to scrap entirely the principle of taxation in accordance with ability to pay: it will be satisfied if surtax rates are lowered to the point where not even the wealthiest taxpayer will pay more than half his income to the Treasury.

References in the report to excise taxes are vague but ominous. "If federal expenditure remains high," it declares, "the retention of a broad system of excises will be necessary if the way is to be opened for income-tax relief." Although it avoids precision on this point, Magill and other members of the committee have long advocated greater reliance on sales taxes as a means of revenue. A bill that broadly represents their views is now being promoted by Representative Gearhart, influential Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee. It proposes to compensate for a drastic reduction in income tax by a 10 per cent manufacturers' sales tax on all fully processed goods with the exception of food, housing, transportation, and some minor items. By increasing personal exemptions this bill would knock off the income-tax rolls some 6,400,000 taxpayers now paying an average of $47 each. But here is the joker: these same citizens, according to the Wall Street Journal, would find the manufacturers' sales tax costing them on the average about $109 annually.

Taxpayers in this position would be little comforted by the "structural reforms" which are the immediate concern of the Magill committee. For these reforms are designed to reduce tax burdens for corporations and wealthy individuals; not many possessors of incomes below $5,000 would derive much benefit from them.

Space forbids any detailed discussion of the committee's proposals, many of which are extremely technical. They include partial elimination of "double taxation" of dividends, reductions in corporate-tax liability by more generous provisions for depreciation and the "carrying forward" of losses, exemption for certain kinds of capital gains and increased credit allowances for capital losses, and exemptions from estate and gift taxes which in many cases would make possible almost total avoidance of these levies.

The proposal which has the greatest topical interest, since it is likely to reach Congress ahead of the others, is for extension to all taxpayers of the income-splitting benefits now enjoyed by married couples in the thirteen states with community-property laws. Such laws provide for equal division of all income between husband and wife so that they are able to file separate tax returns. Thus a married man in California with a salary of $51,000 will report $24,500, after allowing for exemptions, and his wife will do the same. Each will pay a total tax of $9,362.50 or $18,725 together. The highest surtax bracket they reach will be 59 per cent. A married man in New York is under no legal obligation to share his income with his wife and can only file one return. If his salary is $50,500, he will report, say, $49,000 after exemptions. On the top $5,000 he will pay 72 per cent and his total bill will be $24,795—$6,070 more than that of the California couple.

Obviously this different treatment of taxpayers in different states is grossly inequitable. But is the solution to treat all incomes for taxable purposes as if they were subject to community-property laws? Before the war Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau proposed to equalize matters by making consolidated returns compulsory for married couples in all states. Such a change might reasonably be accompanied by increased personal exemptions for married couples and children. It would certainly be much fairer than the Magill committee plan, which will provide the greatest proportionate gains for those with the largest incomes and will be of no benefit whatsoever to some 40,000,000 taxpayers in the lowest bracket.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW is still alive and provoking. I have it on the best authority in the form of one of those famous postcards. We had hoped to reprint in this issue a section from "London Music in 1888-89 as Heard by Corno di Bassetto Later Known as Bernard Shaw," which was published here in 1937, is now out of print, and is known, I imagine, to relatively few American readers. Shaw was, in his younger days, one of the few good critics of music, living or dead. In reprinting one of his pieces we thought to do honor not only to the writing but to the critic. But Mr. Shaw ruled against us.

My works [said the postcard] may be quoted for comment or criticism but not otherwise—not as entertaining readable matter.

In short, NO.

Which puts everyone in his place.

W. J. TURNER the English critic, who died last winter, was another of the few writers about music who deserve respect. His comment on Toscanini, which appears here, is taken from his volume, "Music: An Introduction to its Nature and Appreciation," published in 1936, but was originally printed in the London New Statesman and Nation, which Turner served for many years as music critic. He was the author of distinguished works on Beethoven, Mozart, Berlioz, and Wagner, of which only the first two were published here, and only the Mozart is still in print. He also wrote poetry, novels, and plays.

During the past week I have been reading his book on Berlioz with great delight. Turner is quite as vigorous and peppery as Shaw; and the neglect and misunderstanding which have attended the music of Berlioz through the years give full scope to his talent for disposing, by analysis, of the pompous nonsense to which music, even more than the other arts, has always been subjected and of which Berlioz has been a special victim. Yet one is always aware of a basic sweetness and a basic humility toward the art that was the passion of his life—so that there is no trace, even in his fiercest remarks, of anything less pure than genuine and disinterested emotion.

Turner quotes extensively from Berlioz's correspondence and prints among others a letter which Berlioz, aged twenty, wrote to his father announcing his determination to devote his life to music. It reads as follows:

I have voluntarily embarked upon a magnificent career (one can give no other epithet to that of the arts) and not upon my destruction; because I believe that I shall succeed, yes, I believe it: it is not an occasion for modesty; to prove to you that I leave nothing to chance, I consider, I am convinced that I shall distinguish myself in music; everything points to it outwardly, and within me the voice of nature is stronger than the strictest objections of reason. I have everything imaginable in my favor, if you will support me: I begin young; I shall not need to give lessons like so many others to support myself; I have certain attainments and possess the foundations of others in a way that leads to a deeper development, and indeed I have experienced passions of sufficient strength not to be mistaken as to their true accents whenever it may be necessary to depict them or make them speak.

If I am mercilessly condemned to die of hunger in the event of failure (and in truth I would not stop sooner), your reasonings and your disquietude would be better founded; but there is no question of that, and, fixing it at the lowest, I shall have one day two thousand francs income; but let us say fifteen hundred, I could live all the same on this sum; even with twelve hundred I should be content, supposing music brought me in nothing. In short, I want to make my name; I want to leave some trace of my existence on the earth; and so strong is this feeling, which indeed in itself is wholly noble, that I would prefer to be Gluck or Méhul, dead, than what I am in the prime of life. . . .

Such is my way of thinking, such I am and nothing in the world can change me; you can withdraw all help from me or force me to leave Paris, but I don't believe it; you would not thus make me lose the best years of my life and break the charmed needle, being unable to prevent it from obeying the attraction of its pole.

Adieu, my dear father, reread my letter and do not attribute it to a momentary state of exaltation, for I have never been more calm.

Your respectful and affectionate son,

H. Berlioz

Arturo Toscanini

BY W. J. TURNER

MUSIC may be described as a print of eternity taken in time and lasting so long as it takes, remaining a whole until the last note is struck, then fading simultaneously. After that one can only recall it in memory. I use the simile of a "print," because it will serve best to explain in one direction where Toscanini's superiority as a conductor lies. Supposing that in reading poetry one were used to see poems only in a very poor print upon inferior-quality paper; imagine, for example, having only been able to procure Keats's Ode to a Nightingale printed in smudged ink on a piece of blotting paper with the stanzas scattered haphazard all over the sheet and either no punctuation or all the punctuation wrong! But this is how music is very often performed, and the first distinction between a good reproducing artist and an inferior one is that from the good artist we get an orderly, correct, audible impression. The average reader, like the average listener, is soon aware of certain differences in printing, but only an expert typographer is fully aware of all the fine distinctions, and he alone knows completely the different values produced by differing typographical settings of a poem. But in typographical prints the variations possible are limited compared with those possible in a photographic print, for example; so we must go on and compare the differences in musical reproduction to those possible with a camera and a lens, with all the latter's possibilities of light-variation, focusing, etc. Then we may compare one conductor's performance of a symphony with another's as we may compare a poor photograph taken with a mediocre camera by a not highly capable person with a first-rate print taken by an expert using the finest materials.

Now, although this is the mere basis of the art of musical reproduction, it is a surprising fact that this basis is so rarely adequately supplied by the reproducing artist—whether he be instrumentalist, vocalist, or conductor. I think that every music-lover who has heard the famous conductors of our time will admit that even on this presumably elementary ground the musical impression made by Toscanini when he conducts a work is incredibly clearer in detail, better proportioned as to parts, and more vivid as a whole, than those made by any other conductor.

The four concerts conducted by Toscanini, arranged as part of the London Music Festival by the B. B. C. in 1935, were the first occasion of Toscanini's conducting an English orchestra. There must have been a certain amount of apprehension on both sides. The reputation of Toscanini is a curious one. He is about sixty-eight years old, and it took the best German musicians many years before they could even bring themselves to contemplate the possibility that an Italian might actually surpass the finest of their native conductors. They went and heard, and came back impressed. . . . But Toscanini functioned chiefly at La Scala, Milan, of which wonders were constantly being told, and this being merely an Italian opera house these wonders were discounted. I remember some Viennese musical friends of mine writing to me a number of years ago describing a visit by Toscanini with an Italian opera company to their native town and how devastating to their preconceived notions this visit was. He performed "Falstaff" and "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Vienna went mad. "Not since the greatest days of Gustav Mahler has such an impression been made on the musical intelligentsia here," wrote one of my friends. Toscanini was invited to Bayreuth. There is a story told that on his first appearance there and at his first rehearsal he started with "Die Götterdämmerung" with the picked German orchestra that had played under the greatest German masters and went straight through the score without stopping once. The musicians were disconcerted, but went confidently on, to be, however, dumfounded when at the end he laid down his baton and merely said: "Gentlemen, it is terrible!"

The programs of Toscanini's four concerts in London in 1935, were actually more interesting than at first sight they seemed to be. The fact that he did not know the orchestra was no doubt responsible for the main items in each pair of concerts being the same. . . . Of the first two concerts, consisting of Brahms's E Minor Symphony, Cherubini's Anacreon overture, and Wagner excerpts, no doubt the Brahms made the deepest general impression. For my part I thought, especially of the first movement of the Brahms symphony, that Toscanini's ruthlessly musical rendering rather showed up the defects of the work and that only in the last movement, the passacaglia, did Brahms stand up fully to the treatment he received. The finer the music is structurally, the more magnificent it is in rhythmic design, the more clearly is revealed the greatness of Toscanini as a conductor. So it was that the passacaglia of the Brahms E Minor Symphony and the last movement of the Beethoven A Major Symphony were given with a convincing and satisfying purity and splendor such as I have never heard before. Here, indeed, Toscanini is unique among conductors. Steadiness, accuracy, sensitiveness, and rightness of proportion are combined with a vitality that is unique, as it is also so little manifested by outward physical exertion. . . .

In the second pair of concerts the two performances of Beethoven's A Major Symphony were incomparably finer than any performance of this work I have ever heard. It has not been a favorite of mine among Beethoven's symphonies, and it is more often badly, because crudely and heavily, played than any other; but in Toscanini's hands this "apotheosis of the dance" was given in its full rhythmical glory. Of the rest, I was most impressed with the two performances of Debussy's Symphonic Sketches, La Mer. To hear this work performed under Toscanini is a revelation of its musical qualities. Here again it is most conspicuous how much more lucid and well defined are Toscanini's reproductions of the music than those of other conductors. There is never anything feeble or tentative about his renderings, but everything is in its right place and firmly and satisfyingly there.

There is one other impression which it is necessary to convey in writing of Toscanini. As I sat in a different place and could watch exactly what he did and did not do when he conducted the Beethoven for the second time, I was suddenly reminded of Berlioz's remark: "Do you think I make music for my pleasure?" I am certain that it is not a pleasure for Toscanini to conduct, but rather that he suffers. It is because of his extreme musical sensibility and intense concentration. Here lies the essence of his superiority. He suffers because he loves music more and concentrates more than others. His self-forgetfulness is perfect, and his awareness of the music is complete. This is the real secret of Toscanini.

The Best and the Worst

A NEW edition of Professor Edward J. Dent's "Mozart's Operas" (Oxford, $5.50) has provided me with the occasion to read at last a book that I have long intended to read, and to discover that it is one of the great books on music. Like Tovey's writings it is the product of a scholarship that works hand in hand with aesthetic insight—the scholarship providing knowledge of Mozart's materials, problems, and methods with each opera; the aesthetic insight illuminating the completed work of art. And if it is without Tovey's flashing brilliance it is also free of the epigrammatic obscurities that Tovey's pyrotechnics of thought and statement sometimes result in—which is to say that it is written with an urbanity and clarity that make the reading of it a delight.

Another product of profitable scholarship is Dr. J. M. Coopersmith's new edition of Handel's "Messiah" (Carl Fisher, $1.25), which establishes from original sources a definitive corrected text not only of the work as it is usually performed but of all the variants that Handel made to fit the various conditions of the performances during his own lifetime. In addition it gives three examples from manuscript material—in the airs He was despised and I know that My Redeemer liveth and a cadenza for Every valley—of the vocal ornamentation that "was a common practice, . . . differed with each singer, and . . . was seldom written into the music" (since the editor has employed his scholarship for the practical end of correct performance I think he should have filled in the ornamentation throughout the work in smaller notation than the text). And finally it provides notes on details of text, tempo, and other matters of performance.

From the enjoyable I turn to the distasteful—Charles O'Connell's "The Other Side of the Record" (Knopf, $3.50), which professes to tell the truth about some of the celebrated musicians with whom he had dealings in the years when he was in charge of Victor's Red Seal recording. Mr. O'Connell says he doesn't tell all the truth: "I have 'put nothing in in malice,' I have omitted much in mercy, and if anywhere I have done violence to the truth it is only by suppressing the more unpleasant parts of it." Having outgrown earlier naivetes and learned that it is entirely possible for someone to think he is speaking truthfully or acting nobly when he is doing something quite different, I am sure Mr. O'Connell believes he has done as he says. Nor is the book without its occasional true statements; but it brings to mind a scientist friend's observation once that with any number of correct steps and only one incorrect he could prove two and two equal five. And the unpleasantness and distortion set down with venom on page after page gives one the cold horrors.

The detailed evidence for my statements is something for which there isn't the space; and I limit myself to one comparatively mild passage, from which one should get an idea of what has gone into Mr. O'Connell's writing about the people he discusses, and what his estimates of them are worth. Describing the origin of the Rubinstein-Heifetz-Feuermann recordings of chamber music, he writes:

When . . . the Budapest Quartet had left Victor, the company lost caste with devotees of chamber music and could no longer boast of leadership in this field. There was no permanently organized quartet that could compete with the Budapest in public acceptance. There were other quartets, such as the Pro Arte, the Musical Art, the Roth, and the Coolidge, which had fair claims to some share of public support, but they got very little. The Budapest Quartet, composed, oddly enough, of Russians exclusively, had the inside track, and was worshipfully regarded in those esoteric circles where chamber music is esteemed as the only music worthy of an intelligent man's attention, circles composed largely of bloodless snobs who regard any music involving more than five players as grossly overblown, whose tastes are so refined and aristocratic that they don't like even

■ program of chamber music if their neighbor does, and who think that anything popular is necessarily vulgar. These precious folks had grown in such numbers as to make chamber music not only important to Victor from an artistic point of view, but commercially profitable as well. It was evident that it would take mighty musicians indeed to compete with the Budapest Quartet or to regain for Victor the position in the field of chamber music that it had lost.

This was achieved, in his opinion, by the "peerless performances" of the Rubinstein-Heifetz-Feuermann combination. And from the passage one also gets an idea of the musical understanding that has gone into the statements about music in his book, and of what they are worth.

A great musician I know picked up the book, glanced at a few pages, and tossed it aside with the contemptuous exclamation: "Dirty laundry!" I can easily understand Mr. O'Connell's writing such a book but find it difficult to imagine how a publisher—that is, a publisher on a certain level of reputation and pretension—could publish it.

B. H. HAGGIN

The Ultimate Beethoven

THE QUARTETS OF BEETHOVEN.

By Daniel Gregory Mason. Oxford University Press. $4.75.

THE string quartets of Beethoven have become, thanks to the revival of the string ensemble and to the phonograph, more widely known in the last quarter-century than ever before in their history; have become, indeed, so supreme an aesthetic experience of any kind among living men that Toscanini's word for them, "il mio segreto vangelo," may be taken as the radical claim they impose on the modern moral sensibility. It is surprising to find that Dr. Mason's is the first book in English to be devoted exclusively to their analysis and interpretation. Helm's and Riemann's German treatises, academically doctrinaire when not ineptly rhapsodic, have never been translated, and Joseph de Marliave's "Quatours de Beethoven" of 1925, translated in London in 1928, was not the book to satisfy contemporary taste or criticism. Yet the quartets have come more and more to occupy a major place in appraisals of Beethoven's genius. They figure in the heroic evocations of Rolland; they have been more closely analyzed by English students like Gerald Abraham, A. E. F. Dickinson, W. H. Hadow, Roger Fiske, and the stimulating Marion Scott; definitive analysis has been provided by Vincent d'Indy (in his "Cours de composition musicale" and Cobbett's "Cyclopedic Survey of Chamber Music"), and by the indispensable essays of Tovey. But for the general reader none of this analysis and evaluation quite rivals a book unconcerned with technique or historical relations yet incomparable in fixing the mind and character of Beethoven in modern thought, and in defining the quartets as perhaps the essential clue to that character: I mean, of course, J. W. N. Sullivan's superb essay on "Beethoven: His Spiritual Development."

The astonishing thing about Sullivan's treatment was that, without any claim to formal analysis, it conveyed, besides the intellectual and spiritual values in the quartets, their varying styles and their progressive mastery of personal content and expressive structure. No other book has so succeeded in showing that music, which of all the arts furnishes the most exact language for verbal analysis, is done poor service when that language is employed to the exclusion of spiritual and stylistic insight—insight which, conversely, results in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred in futile impressionism and feeble subjectivity. Perhaps the quartets solicit, beyond almost anything else in music, the most intense and disinterested spiritual response in the listener. At the same time they show unmistakably the danger of such response when it is undisciplined by aesthetic principle or insights. They are an education in musical resources and method; they are also a continuous schooling against free interpretative license. From first to last they encourage programmatic and biographical interest, all the way from the Adagio of Opus 18 No. 1—where Beethoven confessed the suggestion of "the scene in the burial vault in 'Romeo and Juliet'"—through such episodes as the Molto Adagio of Opus 59. No. 2 (marked Si tratta questo pezzo con molto di sentimento, which becomes for Dr. Mason "a fused combination of the Promethean energy of Beethoven's youth with the sense of tragic frustration, slowly ripening into acquiescence"), the "brutal energy" of the concluding fugue of Opus 59 No. 3 (so "long-winded and devoid of real musical interest" to d'Indy's contrapuntist taste as to call for Cobbett's editorial plea for a "driving power . . . which cannot be expressed in terms of musical science"), and the reminiscent youthful humors of the musette or the passionately allusive introspection of the Heiliger Dankgesang of Opus 132, to the "Muss es sein? Es muss sein!" motifs in the finale of Opus 135.

This whole range of appeals in the quartets makes them singularly accessible to human exploration and recognition. Without that appeal they would, of course, not merely deny their spiritual origins but lose their spiritual and imaginative life. Taken together, they form a cycle of moral experience unrivaled in music or perhaps in any art but the highest poetry. Yet what Sullivan defined so aptly in his remarks on program music—that it communicates "musical experiences analogous to extra-musical experiences that may be associated with some definite external situation" but "does not, any more than any other music, depict any part of the external world"—is constantly emphasized even by these humanly accessible portions of the quartets. That fact becomes indisputable when we advance into their more purely harmonic utterances, which include not only the large majority of their movements but such supreme tests as the sublime Cavatina of Opus 130 (passing into which from the preceding Andante is for Dr. Mason a leaving of "the outspread world of nature, bright, wide, sparkling in sunlight, to enter the darkened chamber in which an agonized spirit struggles along against despair"—a "passionate cry of personal pain, a subjectivity almost pathological") or the complex riddle of the Grosse Fuge with its Mallarméan impenetrability (to Schindler "an anachronism" that "ought to belong to the primitive times when music was nothing but a mathematical combination," but to Sullivan a triumph which "more than anything else in music . . . justifies the ways of God to men").

A study of the quartets, then, demands the maximum of personal absorption, expressive skill, intellectual objectivity, and critical tact in their interpreter; and they do so precisely because the elements of human relevance and intellectual prodigality are so richly and complexly blended in their existence. Anyone with a long experience of listening and reacting to them will be aware of the slow and tentative stages in his emerging comprehension of them, his self-identification with them. Aware also, in opening a book about them, of how treacherous verbal discussion of anything but their purely technical features may be. D'Indy, discussing how Beethoven moved from one key to another on its dominant or its subdominant, contrasted these effects by the words éclaircissement and assombrissement. He did so convincingly, but are "brightening" and "darkening" the words for another man's sensation at these modulations? Will, in fact, the hundreds of occasions that arise for characterizing motifs, modes, sonorities, textures, rhythms, modulations, and structures in a musical context ever succeed in catching a universally valid expression once purely technical descrip-

In London in the Twenties, there was a gifted young Englishman who decided upon a literary career. The first few things he wrote were, to be as honest as he is, not so good . . . he's glad to forget about them now . . . but when he started writing about himself, and his attempts to become a writer, he turned out to be very good indeed.

"Lions and Shadows" could be called Christopher Isherwood's autobiography . . . except . . . that Isherwood is so completely a story-teller he couldn't stick to the facts. His characters, who are his friends, ran away with the book and turned it into a novel. Several of these friends are now just as famous as Christopher Isherwood himself, and you will enjoy penetrating their not too heavy disguises. Their doings make reading as diverting as anything Isherwood later wrote. If you liked "Prater Violet" or "The Berlin Stories" you'll want to get to know Isherwood himself through "Lions & Shadows." You'll find him quite as engaging as a personality as he is exceptional as a writer. "Lions & Shadows" has just been published for the first time in this country and costs $3. tion is abandoned? To ask these questions is to open the whole question of musical writing and its methods. Yet without such interpretative characterization discussion must lapse into the most arid of diagnoses. If the abstract jargonizing of a Helm, Riemann, or Paul Bekker is to be corrected, there arises the need of a critical and verbal sensibility among musical writers equaling, perhaps surpassing, anything achieved by interpreters of literature.

A book like Dr. Mason's calls, accordingly, for extended and detailed use—use with both printed scores and recordings—before its value can be exactly determined. I have so used it for only two weeks and thus have not fully determined the value its analyses, epithets, and judgments may eventually have for me. My present opinion is that he has done sound justice to the occasion his book is privileged to mark; that as the first full book in English on the quartets his volume is a good one, reasonable in its arguments, readably lucid and honestly compromising in rendering musical effects in words, judicious in curbing technical exposition, sensitive and suggestive—if not as trenchant as Tovey, as rigorous as d'Indy, or as evocative as Sullivan—in descriptive analysis and thematic elucidation. I have not room here to quote the large number of his phrases and epithets that strike me as acute and just; so it would be unfair to quote those that strike me as missing their mark. But he has managed, better than all but two or three living writers on music, in winning and sustaining confidence for his interpretation and in fertilizing his views by quotations from men like Tovey, Sullivan, d'Indy, and practicing interpreters of Beethoven. His actual musical quotations in the text are few. Fuller examples would certainly aid the student, who must, meanwhile, go to such handy guides as the Oxford "Musical Pilgrim" series, to d'Indy's or Paul Mies's works, or of course to Tovey's superb essays. Dr. Mason might also have used recorded performances as a basis of his analyses, though considering how deplorably unreliable the recording companies are in keeping these in print, his avoidance of this practice is pardonable. He should, however, have given a critically annotated list of such recordings in an appendix; his lumping together of performing groups on page 6 is indiscriminate, though one is pleased to see the book dedicated to Adolfo Batti of the unforgettable Flonzaley Quartet.

The best feature of Dr. Mason's book is the balance it strikes between Beethoven as craftsman and Beethoven as man, intellect, and visionary, and in what it does to show that these Beethovens are inseparable, indivisible, organic in the music. Here the example of both Tovey and Sullivan has counted for much, and reveals Dr. Mason as an interpreter of human feeling and sensitive open-mindedness. That openness of mind and prepared responsiveness of intelligence is the least a student must bring to the quartets if he is to achieve through their illumination that "definitely new state of consciousness" which they, like only the highest triumphs of creation, make accessible to the devoted listener.

Christ. God, Man or Myth?

Did Christ himself write down any record of his life? If so, where are these writings today? Do they exist in any museum or library or sacred shrine? Can you find a trace of them in the vast and mysterious subterranean archives of the Vatican in Rome? The answer is NO! Nowhere has any man been able to discover a single word that Jesus wrote!

Who, then, wrote the Christian Gospels? And when were they written? By some historian after the death of Christ? Or are these Gospels merely myths and legends handed down to us from a civilization that existed long before the time of Christ?

At last you can get the FACTS about Christ and the Christian Church in a startling new book just off the press called "A Shield Has Two Sides" written by the eminent author, scholar and historian Wallace Stockwell.

Here is a book for people who are not afraid to look reality in the face! A book for men and women who refuse to wear mental blindfolds! It reveals TRUTHS about the Christian Church of today—both Catholic and Protestant—that will shock many. For it pulls no punches and presents facts known to but few.

"A Shield Has Two Sides" is not sold through bookstores for reasons you will readily understand after you have read the first few pages. But the Publishers will gladly send a copy on approval to any sincere seeker of knowledge, over 21, who seeks unbiased facts about the Christian Church and how it functions today. Dramatic illustrations. Send only $1.00 in full payment.

All Over Jazz

WE CALLED IT MUSIC. By Eddie Condon. Narration by Thomas Sugrue. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

EDDIE CONDON, the guitarist who started the hot-jazz concerts in New York's Town Hall, has talked his musical autobiography to Thomas Sugrue. Sugrue has a fine ear for Condon's racy chatter and reproduces it, or the effect of it, with comic fidelity. He also interpolates a few sections in his own more intellectual tone of voice, purporting, among other things, to explain jazz in "understandable terms." These parts of the book I found a good deal less satisfactory. Having taken various unnamed persons to task for using technical terms—such as glissandi, antiphony, poly-rhythm—in the attempt to describe jazz, Mr. Sugrue then proceeds to some very highfaluting talk about the Negro unconscious—a region which would seem to call for a somewhat more tentative approach than it gets in his kibitzing paragraphs. Further, he leans considerably on those very technical terms he has excoriated in the mouths of others. Of course he does. One reason why technical terms exist in music is the fact that they have proved themselves of inestimable convenience for purposes of musical description. And one reason why jazz is so hard to explain to the layman is because it is a full-fledged musical language and he is unequipped with the technical vocabulary which would speed his understanding. To be sure, more than a technical vocabulary is needed. But that is true of any musical form.

However, Mr. Sugrue's arrogance toward other jazz writers may be forgiven; all jazz writers are arrogant toward others; it springs from the number of juveniles and nincompoops in the field—name your choices. Fortunately, Mr. Sugrue is largely concerned with the excellent reproduction of the sound of Eddie Condon's reminiscences, and since Eddie has been all over jazz, white, black, and mixed, the result is a stout piece of Americana. Hot jazz, an intense and unorthodox way of spending one's time, has always attracted men of a good deal of frenzy and eccentricity, the best of them remarkable lyric musicians, many of them comedians. The wry, ironic atmosphere in which they live has seldom been better suggested than here. For years Red McKenzie was noted as a comb-and-paper player:

One night a customer asked what special paper he used to get such amazing sounds from a comb.

"I use the Evening World," McKenzie said. "It has a certain texture."

"The customer looked concerned. 'The World is being sold. It's going over to the Telegram. What are you going to do then?'"

"I'm going over with it," McKenzie said.

Once Condon and some of his cronies got a job in the pit of a movie theater in the Mexican section of Chicago:

We were supposed to watch the news-reel and play appropriate accompaniment; we seldom did. One night in the middle of "Clarinet Marmalade" I looked up and saw a French general placing a wreath on the tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

The jazz temperament at its musical best was to be found in the late famous Bix Beiderbecke, and the portrait of him here is probably the finest that has yet been published, from the moment he appears on the Condon scene:

The third was a kid in a cap with the peak broken. He had on a green overcoat from the walk-up-one-and-save-ten district; the collar was off his neck. He had a round face and eyes that had no desire to focus on what was in front of him. . . . I've made a mistake, I thought. I'm stuck with this clam-digger for two months.

Here, too, is Louis Armstrong as a youth in Chicago; here are scores more of the boys observed at first hand, and scores of savory jazz anecdotes, such as the story of the recording date on which Condon made "The Minor Drag" with the late Fats Waller. This magnificent jazz performance was schemed up in the taxi on the way to the recording studio; afterward the studio manager said, "This is an excellent example of the wisdom of planning and preparation." His entire misunderstanding of everything going on around him still has its parallels wherever hot jazz is

Music and Dancing

THE STORY OF DANCE MUSIC. By Paul Nettl. The Philosophical Library. $4.75.

MR. NETTL, formerly of Prague and Vienna, now at the University of Indiana, follows his subject from animal forms of music and dancing to Ballet Theater's "Fancy Free." The book does not tell this "story" in a readable way—it is far too respectable as musicology for that. What it offers is a 340-page compendium of musicological lore and musicological opinion proper to the field. But Dr. Nettl has also put into it many lively scraps of antiquarian information and has quoted as illustrations many snatches of dance tunes—obscure ones of the fourteenth to eighteenth centuries. These brief illustrations, like a sheaf of musical snapshots, form the book's most vivid feature.

Among Dr. Nettl's specialties are the dance music of Gluck, Mozart, and Beethoven, dance tunes by forgotten Austrian and Czech musicians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Viennese court festivities, Renaissance dance manuals, the origins of the waltz, Czech "nationalist" composers. In such byways students will find the work excellent for reference.

For the general reader it is fun to hear that Mozart danced Harlequin in a half-hour pantomime he arranged for a party at his house, and that Beethoven liked very much to dance though he never quite learned to keep time. But as a history of its subject the book is poorly proportioned, its chronological sequences are blurred, and the text is afflicted with generalizations such as: "The [ancient Hebrew] dance was accompanied by the voices of the women, who were the bearers of culture in the first thousand years before Christ," or "One may say that around 1800 the principle of the 'free will' passed over into the field of rhythm."

There are also weaknesses in a few special fields. Many of the generalizations about dance forms, for instance, strike this reviewer as nonsense. The scholarly descriptions of extinct social dances turn out to be hopelessly confusing. There is no discussion of the dance music of Purcell, of Berlioz, of Glinka, of that of the eighteenth-century ballet composers, and almost none of Tchaikovsky's. The section on ballet history has many errors, and the well-meaning one on jazz is of little value.

But once these various drawbacks are clear—and in the present state of musicology they are not particularly shocking—they need not affect the usefulness of the immense mass of otherwise inaccessible material Dr. Nettl has so devotedly assembled and here offers as simply and as concisely as he can for the convenience of students.

EDWIN DENBY

All One

HOW TO BUILD A RECORD LIBRARY. By Paul Affelder. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

THE author has organized this book around the idea that a person who does not much like good music may be brought to a deep love of it by dietetic control and encouraging remarks. Accordingly, his early chapters contain extensive lists of short, melodious compositions and brief, rhythmical snippets of the sort known at Radio City as "light classics." Here as elsewhere the growing child is informed what popular songs have justified the composition. Chapter IV introduces the Symphony, Concerto, and Fugue, and by subtle application of principle a host of such good things as the Venusberg music, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" Suite, and the Bell Song from "Lakme." Unfortunately the author has forgotten to grade his remarks, and this diet is also accompanied by musical baby talk. Much of the commentary is merely odd, as when Mr. Affelder explains that the first movement of the Unfinished has "a touch of the dramatic" in it. At other times it is both odd and repulsive, as when he says that the D Minor of Franck is a "magic" symphony and that its "soaring melodies and rich, almost haunting harmonies have a wonderful inspirational quality about them, producing an exhilarating effect." The last quotation will serve as a fair example of Mr. Affelder's prose. For the rest it may be said that he has neither secure taste nor sound judgment. He does not greatly concern himself with the technical qualities of a recording, and he has no dislike of cut versions. Good and bad interpretations

Drama

KRUTCH

A "ALLEGRO" (Majestic Theater) is, of course, the most talked-of theatrical production of the season, and I offer somewhat belatedly my considered opinion. No one admired "Oklahoma!" more intemperately than I, and for that reason I have the less hesitation in letting myself go on the present occasion. "This," as one of the least respected of English critics said in a famous review, "will never do!" That the Messrs. Rodgers and Hammerstein wanted to give us something different is all to their credit, but that they gave us what they did is certainly not. They have, more than most, the right to failure, but the truth should be told. "Allegro" commits the unforgivable sin of being tedious beyond endurance. Lack of humor is not in itself fatal; lack of spirit and passion and joy certainly is. What was intended to be important is only pretentious and languid. What was intended to be serious is only sentimental and platitudinous.

The whole conception of the piece—both the story which is told and the method chosen to tell it—seems unfortunate. If anything fresh can be said about a young man who realizes just in time that worldly success is not worth what it costs in dignity and self-respect, then the present authors have not said it; if there is a new musico-dramatic form waiting to be discovered, they have certainly not discovered it. What we get dramatically is a morality play with all the obviousness of "Everyman" but without the simplicity which makes obviousness tolerable; and what we get by way of a new musical form is something which, for the sake of alliteration, I am tempted to call a cross between Handel and Hollywood—by which I mean that the choruses permitted to relate so much of the story are really parts of a bastard oratorio; while the big ensemble scenes suggest nothing so much as one of the "production numbers" in a technicolor movie.

In a dim and distant past the Shuberts were responsible for one of the most egregious productions in all history when they gave to the world their modern morality "Everywoman." More recently George Kaufman, who, like talented and so knowing as those at present under consideration should both have failed to recognize the emptiness and the languor of their creation can only be explained on the assumption that they fell victim to what I now find myself habitually thinking of as the Christopher Blake fallacy. Like the Moss Hart play, which deserves to be regarded as a locus classicus, "Allegro" proceeds on the premise that "big" and "important" are the same thing, that any story given a sufficiently costly production becomes thereby an "epic," that it is not the proportion but the disproportion between means and ends which distinguishes good art from bad. Here the production is no doubt fearfully expensive and is certainly fearfully elaborate. There is a revolving stage, there are huge crowds of performers, and there are all sorts of scenic devices, including projected backgrounds. There are also ballets and tableaux as well as various strange dramatic expedients, such as a long painful stretch in which the audience, supposed to be identifying itself with the infant hero in his crib, is cooed at by the fond parents while he or it—this is specifically referred to in one of the choruses—wets his or its bed. But none of these things make the story any more impressive. They merely weigh it down and smother it under an intolerable weight of meaningless elaboration until one is ready to cry out, like the Queen to Polonius, "More matter and less art!" Understandably under the circumstances Mr. Rodgers' melodic inspiration appears to have deserted him, for the serious music seems, at least to my uninstructed ears, quite undistinguished, and of the occasional musical-comedy songs not one is nearly so good as half a dozen in "Oklahoma!" The whole thing, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along, and as my musical companion whispered to me about the middle of the first act, "This show was misnamed; it should have been called 'Largo Sustainato.'"

Rodgers and Hammerstein, suffered a momentary lapse, told essentially their story in "Merrily We Roll Along." From either the authors of "Allegro" might have taken warning.

No doubt it is only fair for me to add the fact that though a good many spectators agree with me, some of the reviewers have hailed "Allegro" as a masterpiece. In any event, however, there is not much point in advising readers either to go or not to go, since the advance sale was so phenomenally large that no one who has not already bought his tickets is likely to be able to get any for many months to come. In my opinion, nevertheless, the case is very similar to that of the Ford car from which the engine had inadvertently been left out. For a thousand miles, you will remember, it ran on Mr. Ford's reputation.

Unfortunately this seems to be my week for belaboring the Theater Guild, and I must regretfully report that "This Time Tomorrow" (Barrymore Theater) is an even more obvious mistake, though certainly not one so grand a scale. Undoubtedly it was produced with the best of intentions and because of a genuine desire to give an experiment a chance, but the play serves only to recall the dismal days when such feebly mystical Germans as Hasenclever deluded the experimental producers of the twenties. "This Time Tomorrow" is about a tubercular girl with a gift of second sight. It is also about the search for a cure for cancer, the folly of war, and the fear of death. I shudder at the thought of trying to give any clear account of what goes on in the course of its action, and perhaps it will be enough to say only two things. Near the end, when the girl has just been killed by the passionate embrace of the hero, he explains: "I kissed her in order that she would not know that the rat is dead." The other significant fact is simply that the moral of the whole turns out to be "God is love."

Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5; Kletski and Philharmonia Orchestra; C Set 701, $8.35.

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Toscanini and N. B. C. Symphony; V 11-9385, $1. "Siegfried-Idyll" and "A Faust Overture"; Toscanini and N. B. C. Symphony; V Set 1135, $5.

To these I would add the RCA Victor reissue of Battistini's recordings of arias from "La Favorita" and "Marta" (15-1010, $2.50). And for hot jazz, Columbia's reissues of performances by Louis Armstrong and his Hot Five (Set C-139), and by Bix Beiderbecke and the Trumbauer Orchestra (Set C-144).

The new Collegiate Chorale recording of Bach's B minor Mass (V Sets 1145/6, $19) was on my list; but I was led to remove it by the results of further listening to it. In Hunter College there was room for the sound to spread out, and therefore for the contrapuntal lines of the instrumental and choral textures to be heard clearly and followed in their progression; in the recording they are jammed together into solid masses of instrumental or choral sound in which they cannot be distinguished and followed. Moreover, the recording reveals not only Shaw's failure to create clarity and musical continuity in the texture but his failure even to shape and inflect the mass of sound: it is beautiful, but it is mostly on one high level of volume; and while again this was not so apparent and disturbing in the hall, the cumulative impact of the concentrated sound from the record is hard to stand. Also, the chorus blankets the orchestra as it did not in the hall.

Other works that I did not include on my list because of defects of performance or recording are Bach's Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden" sung by the Collegiate Chorale (V Set 1096, $4; disturbing noises and distortions); Bach's Suites Nos. 2 and 3 played by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (V Set 1123, $6; No. 3 poorly played); Beethoven's Violin Concerto played by Szigeti with Walter and the New York Philharmonic (C Set 697, $7.10; badly recorded); Handel's Concerti Grossi played by the Busch Chamber Players

(C Set 685, about $34; poorly played, harshly recorded); Mozart Sonatas for violin and piano played by Alexander Schneider and Ralph Kirkpatrick on the violin and harpsichord (C Set 650, $8.35; occasional pounding and clatter by Kirkpatrick, harsh recording); Mozart's Quartet K. 493 for piano and strings played by Szell and members of the Budapest Quartet (C Set 669, $4.60; poorly recorded); Mozart's Quintet K. 593 for strings played by the Budapest Quartet and Katims (C Set 708, $4.60; badly recorded); Mozart's Quintet K. 581 for clarinet and strings played by Kell and the Philharmonia Quartet (C Set 702, $5.85; poorly played and recorded); Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 450 played by Kathleen Long with the National Symphony under Neel (ED Set 25, $7; poorly played and recorded); Schubert's Piano Sonata Opus 122 played by Kathleen Long (ED Set 26, $7; poorly played and recorded); Mozart arias sung by Pinza with Walter and the Metropolitan Orchestra (C Set 643, $5.85; orchestra poorly recorded); Schubert's Symphony No. 9 played by Walter with the New York Philharmonic (C Set 679, $8.35; not at all well played, poorly recorded).

Corrections: What the recorded sound of Toscanini's performance of the "Romeo and Juliet" excerpts lacks is not, as the printer had it last week, expressive but expansive sensuous warmth. And it was the Budapest Quartet's old H. M. V. Victor recording of Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 2, not No. 3, that I referred to.

NO ONE IS SAFE FROM CANCER

This year, 184,300 Americans will die of Cancer . . . one every three minutes.

YET . . . one in three could be saved thru early detection and prompt treatment.

PROTECT YOURSELF! CANCER'S DANGER SIGNALS

1. Any sore that does not heal, particularly about the tongue, mouth or lips.
2. A painless lump or thickening, especially in the breast, lip or tongue.
3. Progressive change in the color or size of a wart or mole.
4. Persistent indigestion.
5. Persistent hoarseness, unexplained cough, or difficulty in swallowing.
6. Bloody discharge from the nipple or irregular bleeding from any of the natural body openings.
7. Any radical change in normal bowel habits.

GIVE to help win mankind's great war — the fight against cancer.

The Shape of Things

THE LONDON CONFERENCE OPENS IN AN atmosphere heavy with prospects of stalemate. Relations between Russia and the West have worsened rapidly since the Foreign Ministers deadlocked in Moscow, last April. There, the impact of the Truman Doctrine, announced just before the conference began, flattened out whatever conciliatory impulses the Russian leaders may have had—and a few such were reliably reported at the start. Today, American policy has been stiffened, in Russian eyes, by our insistence on the United Nations Balkan commission and by the "imperialist" purposes concealed in the Marshall Plan. On the other side, America has set to work to resist the Communist offensive with every political weapon at its command, in the U. N. and in every country where Russian interests clash with ours. This will be reflected in London, to complicate the issues left unresolved last spring. Moscow's plan for a centralized Germany is still in sharp conflict with the British-American plan for a federated German state and the French plan for a loose union of states. Russian and French proposals for international control of the Ruhr run directly counter to the program of the Ruhr's present rulers, which anticipates full German management under Anglo-American top direction. The old clashes on reparations are sure to recur. And over the whole debate will hang the vast uncertainty created by the Marshall Plan. If Congress comes through with even the first instalment of the proposed twenty-odd billions, Western Europe, including Western Germany, will be more or less insulated against Communist activities and Russian influence; whereas a Europe losing ground economically and denied adequate financial help from America will listen more willingly to Moscow's plans for coordinated Continental trade based on bilateral agreements. With the Marshall Plan still in the laps of the Congressional gods, the Foreign Ministers can do relatively little. For all of us must know that the future of Europe is being decided, not in London, but in Washington.

EXCLUSIVE OF THE COST OF FOOD IMPORTS and emergency aid, western Germany will receive some $2,200,000,000 during the next four years if General Clay's estimates, published last week, are accepted; the money will be used, under the terms of the Marshall program, for industrial rehabilitation. These estimates, it seems, are not new. They were confidentially submitted to the sixteen-nation conference in Paris, presumably after the premature publication of the plan to raise the level of German production had thrown the Western representatives into a state of alarm and provided the Eastern group with their best reason for boycotting the conference and the Marshall Plan. What the conference thought of the proposed donation is not reported. Obviously, the idea of appropriating more than two billion dollars for "our" zones of Germany is acceptable only if the money is used in ways which will contribute directly to the recovery of Europe as a whole and particularly of countries which were overrun by Hitler. Under no circumstances should it be pumped into businesses operated for private profit; American taxpayers' dollars can be put to better purposes than providing dividends for German industrialists and bankers. Any profits resulting from American contributions to the Marshall Plan should be used to take Germany off the relief rolls and restore its productive capacity within the boundaries set by the governing powers. All this adds up to one simple proposition: that German big industry, in so far as it is to be revived, should be socialized—owned and run by public corporations under Allied control. This obvious formula for preventing the birth of a new crop of fascist-minded German capitalists is, unfortunately, not likely to be applied by a nation which has just turned the Ruhr coal mines over to Germans to run while forbidding nationalization for at least five years. By the end of that time, the old system, supported by American funds, may again be firmly entrenched. Thus, like a feeble-minded child, history repeats itself.

LEON BLUM MADE A VALIANT EFFORT to rally a "third force" for the defense of Republican institutions, but his uncompromising opposition to the extremists of both right and left led to his defeat. Where he failed, Robert Schuman, a veteran member of the Catholic M. R. P., has succeeded, though the government he has formed would seem to be precariously based. It includes representatives of all parties except the Communists and Gaullists, which makes it a very heterogeneous body. The new Premier's problems are illustrated by the difficulties he encountered in filling the key Ministry of Finance. His first choice for this post, Paul Reynaud, the Prime Minister of 1940, was vetoed by the Socialists, who objected because of his well-known view that the way to deal with the desperate economic situation was a return to orthodox financial policies. Similar opposition to René Mayer, the final choice, was overcome only when Schuman agreed that his program would be based on a compromise with Socialist principles. The struggle between dirigisme—economic planning—and free enterprise is clearly destined to continue inside the Cabinet. Yet decisions cannot be long postponed. France is being paralyzed by a wave of strikes which, even if they are promoted to forward Communist political ends, tend to gain support because of genuine discontent with wages that have lagged far behind the cost of living. Some concessions will have to be made to the workers, but a new general advance in wages can only result in still greater inflation unless really drastic steps are taken to check profiteering and unlock hoards of goods and foreign currencies. It seems unlikely that a weak government, wavering uncertainly between the principles of socialism and free enterprise, will prove capable of freeing France from the vicious economic circle in which it is unhappily imprisoned.

GENERAL BENNETT E. MEYERS APPEARS TO have been guilty of every crime of malfeasance a general in war time is capable of committing. He speculated in war bonds, at a profit of $90,000; while acting as a procurement officer in the Army Air Forces, he not only owned aviation stock but was the secret organizer of a company which received juicy war contracts and charged the government $44.58 for fuse boxes worth $11. He covered his tracks by the use of devices as grotesque as they were revolting. It would be hard to invent three characters as unbelievable and as shoddy as "Bennie" Meyers, Bleriot Lamarre, and his wife, the general's secretary; while the fact that the plot was played out in the higher reaches of the A. A. F. during World War II is so fantastic that it is no wonder the testimony before the Senate War Investigating Committee, much of it obviously made up of shabby lies and counter-lies, has read like a monstrous joke. Indictments will follow—the "clever" General Meyers is open to at least seven charges, including war fraud, perjury, subornation of perjury, and bribery—but no one will ever explain why Lamarre settled for so little and why "Benny" Meyers's fellow-generals were so convinced of his "integrity." The only reassuring aspects of the sordid affair are that it has been exposed and that Meyers had to resort to such elaborate maneuvers to hide his crimes—which would indicate at least that they were not common practice among generals. Yet the story stands. It is not likely that the disabled veterans who sat through the recital will forget it—or General Arnold's tears wipe out a word of it.

THANKS TO THREE PERSISTENT LAWYERS and a small but vigorous sector of the press, the State Department has been saved from committing an inexcusable breach of justice, not to say decency. Two weeks ago, seven of its former employees stood condemned as "potential security risks." Confronted by no statement of charges, denied all chance to defend themselves, and deprived of the right of appeal, they faced the drastic penalty of joblessness without having enjoyed those legal guaranties which any backwoods magistrate would grant a burglar caught cracking a safe. Paul Porter, Abe Fortas, and Thurman Arnold, their attorneys, appealed to the department either to give the seven a fair hearing or to let them resign, a modest request but one that Assistant Secretary Lovett arbitrarily turned down. Bombarded by the press—most effectively, we think, by the New York Herald Tribune—Secretary Marshall last week sent the department into a sudden reverse. Not only have the seven been allowed to resign "without prejudice," but employees who, in the future, find themselves similarly condemned are assured an appeal to the newly established Loyalty Review Board. We are not satisfied that full justice has been done in the case of the seven, who have still been fired without a hearing, but the department's about-face is encouraging. We take it as a sign that, even in the present heated atmosphere, high-handed officials may be held within bounds by determined citizens and vigilant newspapers.

FOR REPRESENTATIVE HOFFMAN OF Michigan, the press is apparently too vigilant. Protected by Congressional immunity, that gentleman can and frequently does blast away at any of his fellow-citizens with whom he finds himself in disagreement. But from now on, any writer who returns the fire by way of the public press may find himself summoned to Capitol Hill to explain himself to the gentleman from Michigan. "Every time one of these papers charges a committee of Congress of which I am chairman of unfair or disreputable conduct or something of that kind," he warns, "the writer of that article, if I can find him, is going to be called up to justify his charge." Writers for the Washington Star and the Washington Post have already been called for questioning before Mr. Hoffman's private bar of justice. The Congressman, a savage opponent of the New Deal, always struck us as at least a defender of the rights of the individual business man against the encroachments of government, but he appears to take a different view where his own branch of government is concerned. We know of absolutely no right under the Constitution or the law whereby a Congressman may summon citizens to Washington to account for criticisms of their representatives. We suspect Hoffman knows of none, either, or he would not have added the remark that "if that's wrong, well, it will have to be wrong." It is high time the courts made clear to the Hoffmans of Capitol Hill that they are the paid servants of the people and not their judges.

IN THE END, THE SPANISH RESOLUTION adopted by the General Assembly was watered down to suit the taste of the American delegation. In the Political Committee, the nations opposed to the single surviving fascist state in Europe had scored an important victory (commented on last week by Mr. del Vayo) by forcing through a vote reaffirming the anti-Franco resolution of last December and asking the Security Council to continue to exercise vigilance in a situation whose gravity had not diminished. This was accomplished in the face of open American opposition. In the plenary session, the paragraph reaffirming the Assembly's previous action failed by one vote to get the required two-thirds. Primary credit for this small service to Franco goes to Carlos Romulo. In one of the most cynical performances any assembly of serious people ever witnessed, the Philippine delegate voted "no" on the critical paragraph about an hour after declaring publicly and oratorically his decision to reverse the negative vote he had cast in the Political Committee and support the resolution. By that single switched vote, procured no one quite knows how, the second paragraph met defeat. But even after this sorry exhibition of back-tracking, the effect of last year's decision is legally unimpaired. This was promptly pointed out by Dr. Oscar Lange who, immediately after the vote, rushed to the platform to remind the Assembly that the resolution of last December, not having been rescinded, remained in force. This view was challenged by only one delegate, the verbose Sr. Arce of Argentina, whose government long ago showed its contempt for the Assembly by sending a new Ambassador to Madrid.

Beacon or Monument?

MANY of the mutual tariff concessions embodied in the twenty-three-nation "General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs," negotiated at Geneva, will become formally effective on January 1, 1948, but it will be years before we can assess its practical results. Today, it is not tariff walls that are impending the entry of American goods into other lands: it is the almost universal shortage of dollars. Nor is it existing American tariffs that prevent a large expansion of imports into this country: it is rather the inability of foreign producers to meet demand. Until these conditions change, the main objective of the agreement—the growth of profitable multilateral trade among nations—cannot be realized.

A question raised by some skeptics is whether that objective can ever be realized, whether the agreement will not prove merely a massive monument to a dead economic system. In support of their doubts, they point to the ever-growing network of bilateral trade pacts, not only between Russia and the states in its bloc but between the Western nations. They observe that devices abhorrent to the whole spirit of the Geneva meeting, such as quotas and discriminatory deals of various sorts, are being more and more widely adopted. On the very day that the agreement was published, Canada, one of the strongest advocates of the principle of multi-lateralism, announced that reduction of its dollar reserves necessitated a quota system specifically designed to check imports from the United States.

The discrepancy between the precepts of the Geneva pact and the current practices of many of the signatory nations was not blithely ignored by the draftsmen of that instrument. On the contrary, it was their knowledge of the new barriers to world trade that were constantly arising which spurred them on. They knew that such barriers could not be swept away in a day, that they were essential defenses for many nations whose international trade positions had been knocked out of kilter by the war. But they wanted to insure, if possible, that post-war emergency measures did not become frozen into a permanent pattern.

With this end in view, the general clauses of the new agreement include the prohibition, in principle, of a number of practices that offset tariff reductions and vitiate any system of free, multilateral trade. Thus provision is made for equal tax treatment of imported articles, for the regulation of anti-dumping duties, for common standards in customs valuations, and so forth. Of still greater importance are the bans placed on trade quotas and on the discriminatory treatment of imports from different nations.

However, these bans are not absolute. They could not be, for no nation would be willing to sign away its right to adopt quotas in emergencies. But the agreement does provide that nations availing themselves of this right will follow definite rules and procedures. So if France, say, wishes to restrict imports by imposing quotas in order to safeguard its balance-of-payments position, it must consult with other countries affected and with the International Monetary Fund. The Fund, also, is accepted as the ultimate authority in all findings of fact relating to balance-of-payment problems. Again, the agreement seeks to insure that, when discriminatory quotas are permitted, it will be on a temporary basis. It therefore provides that, after March 1, 1952, nations will annually review their economic positions, and, if balance-of-payment difficulties have ceased to exist, will end discriminations within six months.

These are just a few examples of the way in which the agreement tries to reconcile current necessities with the ideal of unrestricted freedom of world trade.

Whether the long-term optimism which inspires it will be justified depends on present efforts to promote recovery in Europe and Asia. If these succeed, and the lopsided state of the world economy is corrected, history may record that the Geneva agreement of 1947 was not a monument to the past but a beacon for the future.

Who's on the Spot?

THERE seems to be a disposition in some quarters to regard President Truman's anti-inflation proposals as nothing more than a mean trick designed to embarrass the Republican Party. Cries of anguish from G. O. P. leaders in Congress were to be expected as a matter of course, but we were surprised to find the detached Walter Lippmann referring to the rationing and price-control recommendations as a "partisan monkey wrench." The President, he writes, played the statesman in his appeal for aid to Europe, but "on inflation, he was, alas, the politician and the candidate trying to put the other party in a hole."

This analysis, it seems to us, is, at best, wide of the mark and, in any case, irrelevant. The argument is that if the Republican-controlled Congress gives the President the powers he asks, he will be credited by the voters with whatever benefits ensue and the Republicans will only have confessed to the grave error of having killed the OPA in the first place. If they reject the proposals, on the other hand, and prices remain in the stratosphere, as they are likely to, the Republicans will be at an even greater disadvantage before the electorate.

What this interpretation overlooks is that the Republican Party is already "in a hole" as far as prices are concerned. Its leaders said repeatedly and emphatically last year that, if only the OPA were abolished, prices would come down and free enterprise would take care of everything. But since the middle of 1946, as the President pointed out in his message to Congress, the over-all cost of living has gone up 23 per cent, with retail food prices 40 per cent higher than in the days of the OPA. It was evident in this month's elections that the Republican tide of 1946 had already ceased to run, a phenomenon that can only be attributed to the monumental blunder of the Tafts and Wherrys in lifting the lid on inflation. What Mr. Truman has actually done, then, is to give his opponents a second chance. They ought to be grateful instead of crying "politics."

It may be argued, moreover, that if the Republicans really believe controls would be ineffective, it is they who can put the President on the spot rather than the other way round. Indeed, some of them appear to be flirting with this notion. Senator Taft himself, for example, has suggested that "it might be better for Congress to give the President the power which he demands."

... It could only result in failure, and a revolt of public opinion against any man who is trying to enforce the law." And another party stalwart talked darkly of letting Mr. Truman "stew in his own juice." The truth is that the President has made himself especially vulnerable, in a political sense, by the particular formula he proposed. Congress would merely authorize him to apply price ceilings in "a relatively few danger spots." It would be entirely up to him to decide which commodities were to be affected and when. Thus the entire burden of applying the power would be on him; he would have to produce results in an election year—or else.

This interpretation obviously points to the conviction that the President, having no ulterior political motive, genuinely wants the program he outlined to Congress. And it is at this point that his opponents logically, if uncharitably, recall his comment of a few weeks ago to the effect that price controls are characteristic of the police state. That was an extraordinarily inept remark, which may now do his cause untold harm and for which there is no defense. We can only conclude that, since he made it, the President has been severely jolted by the reports he has seen and the cogent arguments of certain of his advisers. Elsewhere in this issue, the reader may put himself in the President's place by reading a few of the findings of several Congressional committees, cited in the article by I. F. Stone. When it is remembered that these reports were drawn up by Republicans, devoted to the freest of free enterprise, it will be all the more understandable that the President should have reversed himself. Some of these Republicans are themselves shocked at the appearance of fabulous profits and the simultaneous emergence of new sectors of acute want in the population. In consequence, as Mr. Stone points out, a growing number are in rebellion against the moth-eaten bourbonism of the Taft leadership.

On top of these reports, Mr. Truman is reliably reported to have experienced strong pressure from his own political family. If it was the voice of the Forrestals, Snyders, and Andersons that spoke in the "police-state" pronouncement a few weeks ago, it is that of the Hanne-gans, Schwellenbachs, and McGraths that prevails today, backed up by the dire warnings of the President's Economic Committee.

In the last analysis, however, the request for power to impose limited controls, as well as the milder anti-inflation devices suggested by the President, must not be argued on the basis of either campaign tactics or individual motives. They form the minimum domestic program, needed to support a genuine policy of European rehabilitation—a policy so obviously appealing that it has won the tribute of lip-service, at least, from the whole section of American opinion that lies between the Chicago Tribune and the Daily Worker.

TOO MANY COOKS

The G. O. P. Discovers Poverty

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 20

LAST summer two subcommittees of the Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report held field hearings on the price situation, one in the East, the other in the Middle West. Each of these subcommittees had a Republican chairman. The one which toured the East was under the chairmanship of Senator Flanders of Vermont, an intelligent, liberal business man in the machine-tools industry. The one which toured the Middle West was under George H. Bender, Republican Congressman-at-large from Ohio.

Their reports indicate why there is dissatisfaction inside Republican ranks with the dogmatic and demagogic position taken by Senator Taft in opposition to all but the most minor and least controversial aspects of the President's anti-inflationary program. This dissatisfaction must not be overestimated politically. Taft is the most powerful single figure in Republican Congressional councils. The revolt against him is covert, marginal, and confused, and since the Democrats in Congress, and even within the Cabinet itself, are not united behind the Truman price-control program, there is little doubt that Taft will succeed in his campaign to commit the party to foreign aid in principle but to block the domestic measures needed to make it fully effective. But by next spring, after new wage increases, some strikes, and a poor winter-wheat crop, there may be a different story.

With the Flanders and Bender reports it is useful to examine the preliminary reports of the House Special Committee on Foreign Aid, known by the name of its active vice-chairman, Christian A. Herter (Rep., of Massachusetts). The reports of the Herter committee deal with the immediate crises in France and Italy and with the availability of coal, steel, fertilizer, petroleum, and grain for foreign relief. The Flanders, Bender, and Herter reports, taken together, provide a vivid picture of the contradictions, economic and political, which hobble the efforts of a society which is at once capitalist and democratic to protect itself and its allies at one of the turning-points of history. They demonstrate that the crisis with which the special session has been called upon to deal is as much a domestic as a foreign crisis; that the planning which free-enterprise forces so strongly resist could do much to alleviate this crisis; and that the problem of meeting emergency needs abroad is inextricably linked with that of expanding basic capacity here so as to maintain full employment.

The Herter reports reflect the strategy of American big business and finance, but the Flanders and Bender reports reflect the impact of inescapable facts and democratic pressures at home on some of the more thoughtful younger Republicans. There is an air of naive surprise about the Flanders report, for this subcommittee's wanderings became a voyage of discovery. The discovery was of the reemergence of a desperate poverty in the midst of an unparalleled boom, a poverty created by soaring prices and coupled with a rate of profit so high as to shock even Republicans.

WE HAVE found," the Flanders report says, "that important information is concealed in the averages with which the statistics deal." The information is that a "substantial part" of the American people "is not enjoying an adequate standard of living under present circumstances," that "the high average consumption of such things as meat conceals both serious waste at one end of the scale and undernourishment at the other." The Flanders subcommittee found that food prices have gone so high as to "limit . . . purchases of clothing and other necessities of life" by a "substantial group," among which are not only Negroes and those normally thought of as the more poorly paid but many white-collar workers, including "teachers, social workers in general, and the younger clergymen." The report adds, in a tone of muffled thunder, "The pressure toward radical economic and social doctrine on these important groups must be strong indeed."

The danger, as these Republicans found it, was more than ideological. "There is danger," the Flanders report says, "that the reduction of the proportion of income available for commodities other than food may have a disruptive effect on our whole economy." Nervously the subcommittee realized that there was some connection between this danger and current profits. It comforted itself with computations which show that although food-industry profits are extraordinarily high in terms of net worth, they take only a minor part of the average consumer's dollar.

These computations may not comfort the consumer as easily as they did the committee; one company cited, while it was making only 3.6 cents on the sales dollar, was earning 59 cents before taxes and 36 cents after taxes on each dollar of its net worth. This is profit with a capital P, and there is more than coincidence between such profit and the new proletariat uncovered by the committee. Even the committee, after its sales-dollar computations, says there are areas in food, textiles, clothing, and consumer durables "in which profits will not so easily withstand public scrutiny." The committee hastens to add apologetically that "in questioning prices at this time we are going contrary to the spirit of the free-enterprise system." It pleads in extenuation that "at this particular time in the world's history, with the overwhelming importance of inflation both for our present safety and the present safety of the world, we have reached a period in which both wages and profits take on an aspect of public interest which is abnormal." From a Republican source this is quite a plea.

THE growing distress at the bottom of American society and the rash and greedy profits being drawn at the top are likewise reflected in the Bender report. This also spells out one of the basic dilemmas in which the American economy finds itself. It both needs and fears abnormal requirements abroad for its goods. The Bender subcommittee says that the business men who appeared before it expressed "deep and genuine concern over price rises, although"—and this is a graphic qualification—"their testimony may not have struck the same personal note" as that of the low-income groups. The business men "were fearful that an acceleration of the inflationary spiral would hurl us into economic chaos"—a general fear, be it noted, which does not prevent most business men from fighting effective control.

But while abnormal demand from abroad on top of full employment at home threatens disaster, disaster is also feared from cessation of this abnormal demand. "It is recognized," the Bender report says, "that the wheat supply-and-demand situation is such that if foreign shipments were not being made at the present time the bottom would literally drop out of wheat prices." This would "soon result in lower dairy and poultry and meat prices." A downward spiral might thus be set in motion throughout the economy. This makes it easier to understand the Bender subcommittee's conclusion that "despite an inflationary pressure we cannot and should not refuse requests from abroad based on humanitarian appeals." It adds, "Especially in view of the United States bumper wheat crop and the short European crop we should undertake emergency shipments of food and fuel this winter." The italics are mine; the humanitarianism is Bender's.

Is Atom Control Obsolete?

BY LEONARD ENGEL

DURING the past few months atomic energy's promise of boundless prosperity has been more and more obscured by the atomic arms race and the mounting fear of an atomic war. Nevertheless, with every passing day new possibilities are opening up for the use of the atom as a source of power. The latest is offered by a new kind of atomic pile, based on the fission of plutonium by fast neutrons, recently completed at the Los Alamos atomic laboratory.

The new Los Alamos pile, the eighth to go into operation in the United States, will make possible smaller, more compact atomic-power plants. It also points toward a new, extremely economical atomic-energy process fueled by thorium, which is three times as abundant in nature as uranium.

Its promise is wrapped up in the phrase, "fast neutrons." And I am afraid it will take some explaining to make clear why a fast-neutron pile is of such great economic and political importance. The key to atomic power and the atom bomb is the neutron, a tiny particle which is one of the fundamental constituents of the atom. Neutrons make up half or more of the central parts or nuclei of all atoms except hydrogen and are responsible for the energy-producing miracle of fission. The nuclei of uranium 235 atoms, for example, when struck by neutrons, are shattered, and some of their "binding energy" appears as heat. The shattering of the nuclei also releases additional neutrons, which cause other U-235 nuclei to undergo fission in turn; and so on in a swift chain reaction.

U-235, plutonium, and one or two other materials of lesser importance are extremely unstable and may be shattered by slow, low-energy neutrons. In fact, all piles so far built except the new one at Los Alamos operate on slow neutrons and have "moderators" to slow neutrons down lest an undesirable side reaction take place. Now, materials fissionable by slow neutrons are by no means the only ones with potentially useful binding energy. Binding energy is locked away in all heavy elements, such as gold or lead. But these elements are comparatively stable and can be shattered only by fast, high-energy neutrons.

The energy of neutrons is measured by a unit titled formally the M. E. V. and informally the "crocodile"—a humorous tribute to the late Lord Rutherford, the British atomic pioneer, whose booming voice warned students he was coming as the ticking of the watch swallowed by the crocodile in "Peter Pan" warned the crocodile's intended victims. An M. E. V., or crocodile, is a million electron-volts. U-235 and plutonium are fissionable by neutrons with energy as low as a forty-millionth of a crocodile. Fission of gold, on the other hand, requires neutrons of at least seven crocodiles.

The new Los Alamos pile generates fast neutrons with energy of about one crocodile. This is plainly not enough to split atoms of gold. But it may be adequate to tap the energy of thorium, for the fissionability threshold of thorium has been found to be 1.1 crocodile or less.

BY ITSELF this fact—that pile-generated fast neutrons are probably powerful enough to crack thorium—does not guarantee a new atomic-energy process. A chain reaction is a compound of several factors, of which the energy of the neutrons is only one. In addition, fission of thorium must release enough neutrons, and thorium must absorb enough neutrons, to keep the reaction going. No one can be certain that thorium meets these requirements, for its properties have still to be thoroughly investigated; during the war atomic-energy research was overwhelmingly concentrated on uranium and plutonium. However, thorium resembles uranium and plutonium in the properties that have to do with neutron production and fast-neutron absorption. Thus the outlook for atomic energy from fission of thorium by fast neutrons is bright.

In recent months thorium has been mentioned frequently as a potential fuel for atomic piles. This refers to a proposal to make uranium 233, which resembles U-235, from thorium, just as plutonium is made from uranium 238 in the great piles at Hanford, Washington. One day U-233 will doubtless be made as a by-product of atomic-power production, but fast-neutron fission of thorium itself would be much cheaper.

Before saying more about atomic energy from thorium, I want to touch on the other promise of fast neutrons. As mentioned above, all piles save the new Los Alamos unit employ a moderator—bricks of highly purified graphite in most American piles and heavy water in the Canadian government pile at Chalk River, Ontario; and both heavy water and highly purified graphite are expensive. Hence the fast neutron pile, which has no moderator, is simpler and less costly.

This brings us to an important point. In the endless debates over atomic energy, figures are often presented to show that atomic power will not be economical. The basis of these figures, so far as they have any, is the production process used by the United States during the war, without any allowance for new developments. But new developments that promise incredibly cheap power are already in prospect, at least at the level of "pure" science. The fast neutron pile, though far and away the most important, is only one. If no atomic-power plant is in operation in 1950, it will not be for want of scientific knowledge. It will be the result of politics—of the long-drawn-out fight over the Atomic Energy Act and Lilienthal's chairmanship of the Atomic Energy Commission—of industry's lack of interest in non-military atomic research, and of our continuing preoccupation with the development and manufacture of weapons.

TO RETURN to thorium. Like uranium and plutonium, thorium is a metal. It is nearly as abundant as lead. Every country has an ample supply of ore. Thorianite (65 per cent thorium), the richest thorium ore, is found principally in Ceylon. Monazite sand, which used to be mined extensively for thorium for gas mantles, is found in India, Brazil, Australia, Malaya, and the United States. Other important thorium ores occur in the Belgian Congo, Madagascar, Norway, and the U. S. S. R. And every ton of granite, one of the world's most common rocks, contains between one-third and two-thirds of an ounce of nuclear fuel—mostly thorium, but with some uranium—an amount that is certainly capable of economical extraction, since gold, a less valuable material, has long been profitably taken from ores in which it assays only half an ounce a ton. Workable thorium ores are far more widely distributed than workable ores of uranium.

As a matter of fact, the wide distribution of thorium, coupled with the fact that it is as easily made into bombs as into power plants, raises a vital question with regard to international controls. A few weeks ago the American Association of Scientific Workers presented to the United Nations a memorandum on biological warfare which pointed out that "BW," potentially even more destructive than the atom bomb, is inherently incapable of control. The raw materials of biological war are everywhere, and the basic techniques are known to every biologist. Only peace can provide security against it.

This is equally true of the atom bomb, for a control plan is essentially a device, and no device, however fool-proof it seems, can take the place of what is in the hearts of men. If men really work for peace, no control plan will be necessary; if they don't, in the end no technological scheme will save them. Sooner or later new discoveries are bound to upset the technical considerations underlying any control scheme. This may already be happening to the Baruch plan as a result of the discovery of controllable fast-neutron fission.

The Baruch plan calls for control of thorium mining, but its real basis is the monopoly of technical "know-how" and of high-grade uranium ores by an international atomic authority. No monopoly of knowledge, however, has ever endured, and the uranium-ore monopoly is being chipped away before it is established. It will be immeasurably more difficult to keep a watch on the world's thorium resources than on its uranium ores. Instead of a dozen mine sites, the authority will have to watch hundreds; instead of a regiment of inspectors, it will need an army. It seems to me it would make more sense to work for settlement of our differences with Russia. Then we could put away the bombs and the fear of atomic war, and take advantage of the fast-neutron pile—and the other opportunities which scientific advance offers to mankind—for the purposes of peace.

Italy's New Fascists

BY MARIO ROSSI

[Left-wing rioters in Italy are attacking fascist and near-fascist meetings, breaking up the offices of rightist organizations, staging parades and demonstrations. De Gasperi's centrist government, attempting to restore order by police action, blames the Communists for instigating the violence. The Communists on their part attack the government for its refusal to eradicate organized fascist elements which they claim have provoked the workers into acts of reprisal. Last week, in a stormy debate in the Assembly, the Communist deputy Giuseppe di Vittorio said, "The only way to avoid civil war is to suppress fascism and abolish its press."]

The following account of fascist activities by our Rome correspondent provides a revealing background for the events of the last two weeks.]

Rome, November 3

A FEW days before the municipal elections in Rome I happened to be in the Piazza Santi Apostoli, just around the corner from the Palazzo Venezia, from whose famous balcony Mussolini once enjoyed addressing the populace. A platform had been erected in the square, flags were flying everywhere, and a large map of Italy leaned against the side of a palace. Soon people began to gather around the platform, and as the notes of Puccini's beautiful Hymn to Rome came from a loudspeaker the crowd seemed to be moved by a kind of mystic exaltation. They were middle-class people for the most part, with a few workmen, many wearing decorations acquired in the war against the Allies. That was the mark of their patriotism, and everything around them was meant to remind them to be "patriots"—not only the flags but the posters pasted on all the walls in the neighborhood urging them to "Honor Italy," "Love Italy," "Work for Italy." A big banner explained that the meeting was sponsored by the Nationalist Movement for Social Democracy, whose emblem is the map of Italy. One poster said, "Don't abandon the country to hyenas and jackals brought into Italy by foreigners," meaning the anti-Fascist exiles who returned after the war.

The crowd stopped singing and began to applaud when Italy's outstanding nationalist, Emilio Patrissi, appeared on the platform. With the easy elegance of a skilful demagogue Patrissi entertained his audience for about an hour. He told them that they were right and everybody else was wrong—that the left would lead the country to destruction and that the conservative Liberals were scared. Nor did he spare the Uomo Qualunque front. Having broken with Giannini, whom he did not consider enough of a "patriot," Patrissi was bitter against him and his party. When his speech was over, the crowd again sang the Hymn to Rome and then moved to the Piazza Colonna, where another fascist meeting was being held, sponsored by the Italian Social Movement. Here democracy, the republic, and Parliament were violently slandered amid wild cheers from the crowd. Some deputies on their way to the Constituent Assembly in a building at one corner of the square were handled roughly.

It would be unfair to the Italian people to attach too much importance to manifestations of this kind. Still, it is significant that today a sizable number of persons are not ashamed to tell you how much happier they were under Mussolini. Something must have happened; at the end of the war no one in this country dared to admit former Fascist connections, and those who could not hide them took pains to give all sorts of excuses. The Italian people had taken Allied propaganda seriously. They truly believed that a new Italy was to be built on the ruins of fascism; they placed their trust in democracy. Rightly or wrongly, they now believe that the Allies did not mean what they said and never intended to keep their promises. Italians expected democracy to perform miracles, and when it did not, began to mistrust democratic procedures. Some of the parties formed since the liberation are ably exploiting this feeling. With the exception of the Liberal Party all the rightist parties are post-war products.

By introducing the idea of the "administrative state," run by technicians only, and by denying politicians any role in it, Giannini rallied to the Uomo Qualunque many people who had collaborated with fascism and hated being reminded of it by anti-Fascists. Their argument was that they had worked for the good of the country and, not caring about politics, were willing to do so again irrespective of who was in power. This was not quite satisfying to the extremists in the Uomo Qualunque, who wished the party to save as much as possible of the positive program of fascism; they broke therefore with Giannini and under the leadership of Patrissi and others formed the Italian Social Movement and the Nationalist Movement for Social Democracy.

TO LEARN more about these groups I went to see Giovanni Tonelli, who claims to have inspired the Italian Social Movement. Now editor of Revolta Ideale, Tonelli had been a reporter for Giornale d'Italia until the day after the King dismissed Mussolini on July 25, 1943. I put the following questions to him and received these answers:

Q. Who do you think was responsible for the last war?

A. Roosevelt. His only aim was to conquer the European markets for American capital.

Q. You implicitly deny that the war was ideological?

A. Yes. The war was a consequence of the Treaty of Versailles and not of so-called Italian and German imperialism. Germany and Italy, being proletarian nations, had an ideal to defend against American and British plutocracy. Roosevelt's Four Freedoms were an infamous mockery.

Q. Would you have preferred an Italian-German victory?

A. Obviously. And not only for ideological reasons; also because I am always on the side of my country, whether right or wrong.

Q. What do you think of the partisans?

A. The rank and file was made up of poor fellows dragged into the movement by force or deceit. The leaders were traitors to the fatherland.

Q. What about the King and Badoglio?

A. They were super-traitors; so were the Italian speakers for Radio London and Radio New York.

Q. What do you think of fascism?

A. Fascism cannot be considered apart from Mussolini. He had an irresistible fascination and was able to bind the Italian people to him. Fascism was a great thing under Mussolini. There was collaboration among classes then.

Q. How much of Mussolini's Fascist program would you revive?

A. First, the cooperative idea. This idea is bound to triumph not only in Italy but throughout the world. It means no class war and a government run by technicians, not politicians, whom nobody knows anyhow. Second, its love of country: we must be free within our borders and get back Trieste, Briga, and Tenda. Third, its national dignity—Italy had great prestige under Mussolini.

Q. And what would you reject of fascism?

A. Its bossism. We didn't like to have so many gerarchi. Nor did we like restrictions on the freedom of the press.

Q. What do you think of Mussolini's last experiment, the Italian Social Republic?

A. It will be remembered for the "Eighteen Points of Verona," the finest social document ever written.

Q. Now that the peace treaty has been signed, how do you feel about America?

A. We still hate the British but feel kindlier toward the Americans. They are trying to keep bolshevism out of Europe, and this is also our aim. So far America has won a battle but not the war. The war will be won when Russia has been defeated.

These are the views of the fascist movement in Italy today. The present neo-fascism is the projection of Mussolini's eighteen points, and they in turn were based on his 1919 program, which he said the King had prevented him from achieving. Of course, today as in 1919, fascism must hide its real face. Should it proclaim aspirations to dictatorship, the government, however lenient it felt, would have to intervene.

The core of these parties is formed by the forty thousand or so Fascists released from jail by amnesty and by special legislation which was itself confused and was made more so by the benevolent rulings of the courts. Fascists sentenced to death for collaboration with the enemy were frequently freed overnight and given their old jobs; some even got their back salaries. Fascism has also attracted the embittered veterans of a lost war.

UNFORTUNATELY, the openly recognized fascist parties are not the only such movements in Italy. There are also clandestine organizations: some purely local, others with a central organization and branches in most Italian cities. Among the latter the Fasces of Revolutionary Action (F. A. R.) is the most important. This was founded on October 28, 1946, on the twenty-fourth anniversary of the March on Rome, when a proclamation in the underground paper Rivoluzione declared: "In the supreme interest of renewing the energies and efforts of all clandestine groups which have up to this moment struggled for the defense of Mussolinian principles, we are forming as of today the Fasces of Revolutionary Action." To obtain funds, F. A. R. members and sympathizers are subscribing to a loan called Prestito della Riscossa (Loan for Revenge). In Milan the F. A. R. works hand in glove with the local Democratic Fascist Party, which had an hour of international renown when it stole Mussolini's body. Its organ is Lotta Fascista (Fascist Struggle). Wealthy industrialists still longing for a Fascist monarchy are its chief financial support. Last June the police arrested a number of F. A. R. members in Rome, but a "communiqué" appearing in the clandestine paper Mussolini was reassuring. "The high command," it said, "has the situation under control, and the organization has not been affected."

Closely connected with the F. A. R. is another organization called Squadre d'Azione Mussolini (S. A. M.), which is said to be partly financed by Spanish Falangists. Milan is said to have sixteen such neo-fascist groups.

Many monarchist and Fascist generals boast that they head a "powerful" organization which at the proper moment will start fighting. The Anti-Communist Clandestine Army, which has connections with the F. A. R. and the S. A. M., is said to be able to count on 2,000 armed men. The League for Uniting Anti-Communist Patriots is believed to have large caches of arms. This organization seems to have close connections with the Italian Social movement and claims to get support from America. One of its leaders has declared: "In case of a conflict between America and Russia, the sole hope for us Fascists, there will come into operation a program reached in agreement with certain Americans: (1) fascism will watch the rear of the American army, preventing Communist sabotage by liquidating the Communist Party; (2) the United States will give us back Briga, Tenda, Trieste, and the colonies, and will fully support the Italian Social Movement. Our movement is made up 80 per cent of Fascists and 20 per cent of monarchists."

The Political Section of the police is certainly aware of the existence of these clandestine movements but does not seem much interested. Perhaps it believes they will gradually disappear as political and economic conditions become more normal. Or perhaps the police do not dare touch the powerful industrialists and high officers and clergy who are secretly behind those organizations but at the same time have very good connections with the Christian Democratic Party. Since the conservative wing gained control of that party, all rightist movements and individuals have felt encouraged.

It is interesting that the clandestine monarchist organizations are counting on fascism to bring back the king. Official monarchist organizations, of which there are six or seven in Rome alone, contain many former Fascists.

Movements with a similar ideology may exist in the United States, but in a healthy democratic society they do not grow strong. In Italy, still unstable and weak after a lost war, taking its first steps as a republic, such organizations can create conditions that lead to civil war.

Earl Warren—a Likely Dark Horse

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, November 19

GOVERNOR EARL WARREN of California is now officially a candidate for the Presidency and will go to the next Republican convention with the important California delegation in his vest pocket. For months now Warren has been holding open house in Sacramento for other would-be candidates, greeting each visitor with a great show of cordiality but maintaining an impeccable neutrality. It must have occurred to these candidates as they returned from the Sacramento pilgrimage that the principal consequence of their visits had been to enhance Warren's reputation. The thirty-five correspondents who accompanied Taft to California wrote as much about Warren as they did about the Senator from Ohio. In one sense Taft, Dewey, and Stassen have already run and been defeated in the West, for none of them succeeded in striking fire. In his role as the genial host Warren has neatly disposed of his principal opponents by simply exposing them to the intense light that shines in California.

In the scramble for delegates candidates can make reasonably accurate counts for the Eastern, Middle Western, and Southern states, but in the West politics by calculation breaks down. Here are the "free" delegations that will tip the scales. California has the largest delegation in the West, and in a close election the vote in California could prove decisive. Not only will Warren have the California contingent in his pocket, but his active support would probably carry the state for any Republican nominee with the exception of Taft. He is obviously the strongest candidate the Republicans could nominate for the vice-presidency, and he is also a likely "dark horse" for the Presidency. Should he fail to win either nomination, he would seem assured of the post of attorney general, which he is said to covet.

JUST what manner of man is Earl Warren, the outstanding Republican in the Western states today?

The question is a difficult one to answer simply, not because of any complexities about Warren but because the political background from which he stems, the kind of politics he has been compelled to play in California, is most complex, and only by reference to this background can he be understood. There are really no political machines in California, and party regularity has been reduced to a minimum by a system of cross-filing, in effect

CAREY McWILLIAMS, a staff contributor of The Nation, has long been active in liberal politics in California.

Seligson

Governor Warren

since 1911, which permits a candidate to enter the primaries of both parties. While a similar system is found in five other states, party organization in these states has been strong enough to counteract the confusion inherent in the system. But, for many reasons, party loyalty has not been strong in California since Hiram Johnson defeated the Southern Pacific machine, and heavy immigration has given the cross-filing system there a unique significance. More than half the Congressional delegation and two-thirds of the state legislators are regularly elected at the primary by capturing both party nominations. This has made for a type of free-wheeling politics in which every candidate is out for himself and, since he hopes to win in the primary, usually poses as a "non-partisan." The lobbyist has replaced the party boss or machine politician. It is also important to keep in mind that state senators are elected from districts divided on the basis of territory, not population, so that Los Angeles County, for example, has only one state senator. Liberal governors may come and go, but as long as this basis of representation prevails, the lobbyists will have a firm control of the state senate.

In 1938 the prospect for the Republicans in California looked bleak. Outnumbered two to one, embarrassed by an inept governor, their decrepit machine in a state of collapse, they were scraping the bottom of the barrel. Having failed to develop any new leaders, they decided to reconvert an old one. Up to this time Californians had known Earl Warren as a professional Republican politician—a stereotyped district attorney, a product of the Knowland machine in Alameda County, the man who had headed a Hoover delegation to the Republican convention in 1936. To the amazement of the people, this tight-lipped, unsmiling district attorney suddenly became the most affable of candidates for the attorney generalship, with a new smile, a new chuckle, and an eager if somewhat awkward bonhomie. It was during this campaign that Warren was first photographed splashing around in the Pacific with his numerous brood during the annual grunion run in Southern California. Nowadays word that the grunion are running is certain to bring the Warrens to Santa Monica for the annual action photographs.

Though he had been given a new political personality, Warren's performance as attorney general was quite in keeping with his record. He was the chief fingerman in the campaign to exclude the Japanese from the West Coast. Appearing before a Congressional committee, he urged immediate evacuation of all persons of Japanese descent and went so far as to say that the American-born generation, the product of California schools, was more dangerous than the alien generation. He also ruled that residents of Farm Security Administration migratory-labor camps in California lacked legal residence and could not qualify as voters. As attorney general, Warren was a member of the Water Project Authority, and as such he voted against a series of measures designed to carry forward the Central Valley project. Certainly nothing that he did during his four-year term as attorney general was out of character. He performed as one would expect a protégé of Herbert Hoover and Joe Knowland to perform.

IN FACT, it was only after he was first elected governor in 1942 that Warren really began to cultivate a new political personality. This he was, in effect, compelled to do, for his one chance of defeating Governor Olson lay in his ability to capture a large section of the heavily preponderant Democratic vote. With party discipline reduced to a minimum, only a liberal-appearing and "non-partisan" Republican could have won in 1942. Once in office, Warren began to impersonate Hiram Johnson and surprised many people in California by seeming to champion certain liberal or reform measures. But when his record is examined in detail, it is apparent that his new liberalism is largely rhetorical.

For example, in 1945 he proposed a huge highway-construction program to be financed by raising the gasoline tax. This brought the unsavory "oil interests" into the drama as sordid villains opposing a righteous chief executive. Raymond Moley, in an article entitled Battle Royal in California, gave a thrilling account of this sham struggle. "Not since Hiram Johnson's battles with the Southern Pacific," he wrote, "has anything like this been seen in California." But he omitted to point out that, ironically, the Southern Pacific was heartily in favor of Warren's proposal. With some form of highway expansion inevitable, the Southern Pacific was quite willing to saddle the tax burden on its principal competitors, the independent truckers. In this instance Warren had not "opposed the vested interests" in the early Johnson manner; he had merely isolated one lobby with the active support of the rest. But it was, nevertheless, a clever and perfectly staged performance.

Today Governor Warren's reputation as a liberal in California rests largely on his advocacy of a compulsory health-insurance program, the one major social reform he has sponsored in his six years as governor. If he wished to gain a reputation as a liberal, Warren could not have chosen a better proposal to back; nor could he have found a safer issue to toy with politically. Of course, the ire of the doctors was aroused, but the practice of medicine is not big business, and the medical lobby is one of the less powerful lobbies in Sacramento. Warren "fought" for this proposal as he "fought" against the oil companies—firmly enough to give an appearance of advocacy, but not with sufficient energy to force a show-down.

Warren's current performance in the role of a latter-day Hiram Johnson has been so good that it has kept his liberal opponents in a strategically impossible position. It is difficult to prove a negative, in politics as elsewhere. For example, Bob Kenny found in 1946 that it was very difficult to prove that Warren had not really fought for some of the measures he had proposed. The appearance of support had just enough verisimilitude to seem convincing. A well-disciplined minority in the legislature might have forced a real test of Warren's sincerity, but the Democratic legislators, like Warren, are "non-partisan" cross-filers, each man out for himself. In less affluent times also a real test might have arisen, but all during Warren's six years as governor California has been enjoying great prosperity.

Where tests have come up, as they have in a few cases, Warren has not stood his ground. In his first speech before the Conference of Governors he expressed unalterable opposition to allowing Japanese American evacuees to return to the West Coast, and as late as July 2, 1943, he warned the federal authorities that another Pearl Harbor disaster would follow the return of a single evacuee. When the state Board of Agriculture, on the motion of Dr. Paul S. Taylor, adopted a resolution urging fair play, he promptly replaced Dr. Taylor and issued a statement expressing intense annoyance with the resolution. But by the end of 1944 he realized that race-baiting, of the political variety, was no longer popular in California, and he became an advocate of "tolerance" and fair play. At the first real test, however, he promptly welched. He not only refused to support a Fair Employment Practices measure in the legislature but artfully sabotaged it by urging the appointment of a committee "to study the problem." Later, when an FEPC measure was placed on the ballot as an initiative proposal in 1946, he maintained a profound silence.

With a record of opposition to the Central Valley project as attorney general, Warren surprised many Californians by appearing before a Congressional appropriations committee in the spring of 1947 in support of the budget requested by the Bureau of Reclamation, which included a request for funds to construct public transmission lines. But as recent articles in The Nation have pointed out, a serious power famine had developed on the West Coast by March of this year. When one realizes that private-utility executives on the West Coast also urged passage of the bureau's budget—executives who had been fighting the bureau as late as December, 1946—it is apparent that Warren was playing safe, conservative politics. On the crucial issue of the Central Valley project—whether the 160-acre limitation, which would force large land-owning concerns to dispose of their "surplus" holdings, will be retained—he has cannily said nothing.

During his first term as governor Warren tried hard to overcome the reputation of being anti-labor which he had earned by his prosecution of King, Ramsey, and Connor in the famous "ship-murder" case in 1935. He managed to avoid taking either a pro-labor or anti-labor position and was supported for reelection in 1946 by the state Federation of Labor. Shortly after his reelection, however, he was forced to declare himself. In rapid succession he permitted a "hot-cargo" bill to become a law without his signature and signed a bill outlawing jurisdictional strikes. Today the A. F. of L., with the exception of the Teamsters' Union, has turned against him. "Labor can expect nothing but opposition from Governor Warren," announced W. J. Bassett, secretary of the Central Labor Council in Los Angeles; "the friendly cloak of hypocrisy has been discarded and the true spots of the Republican leopard are now exposed."

ALTHOUGH Warren has not added a single major social-reform measure to the statute books in six years as governor, he has given the state an efficient and honest administration. The most skilful of politicians, he never ventures a comment on any issue until he has determined exactly where the balance of power rests. His statements are shrewd, carefully considered, and economically phrased. It is his practice to settle each issue as it arises and never to say or do more than the immediate situation requires. On the whole question of foreign policy he has kept completely silent. Having an excellent understanding of the state he governs, he has consistently avoided involvement in "red hunts" but has never combated any that were being conducted. Essentially, he is a very able conservative politician, not a reactionary. Unlike a Bricker, for example, he would not set the clock back; but he would never advance it a second unless he felt compelled to do so by a clear majority opinion. On the record the occasional liberalism which he has shown since 1942 must be dismissed as opportunistic. But as Henry James once demonstrated in a famous short story, the impersonator often makes a better model than "the real thing." Ordinarily this is true only in art, but in California, as Morrow Mayo has observed, sincerity, like virtue, is one of the arts.

U. N. Box Score

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, November 22

THE Assembly opened when the Dodgers and the Cardinals were battling for first place in the National League. It is ending as New York's first Christmas trees are coming out on the sidewalks. All that remains to be settled is Palestine.

As delegates are getting their reservations on ships and planes or making last-minute forays into the Fifth Avenue shops, they must be asking themselves what they have been doing for the past ten weeks.

On Friday afternoon Mr. Vishinsky, in a final sunburst of oratory on the veto question, took time out to list some of the Assembly's achievements—achievements in which the Soviet delegation took very little joy: a watch-dog commission for the Balkans, an election commission for Korea, an all-year-round Little Assembly to keep an eye on matters that might flare up and cause unpleasantness, a recommendation to the Security Council to consider again some black-balled applications for membership. All these actions, Mr. Vishinsky thought, had been attempts to pull the Charter out of shape, to make the world safe for American imperialism.

There were other achievements, of course. Eventually the three vacancies on the Security Council were filled; Mrs. Pandit's graceful withdrawal made it possible for delegates to view with good humor the replacement of Dr. Lange of Poland by Mr. Manuilevich of the Ukraine. The Trusteeship Council was brought up to strength after some jockeying among the colonial powers, and a new trusteeship over a small Pacific island was set up. But there was no trusteeship for South West Africa: the Assembly watered down a weakened Indian resolution reminding South Africa of its obligations as a good member of the United Nations. There was the shocking emasculation of the anti-Franco resolution. There was the successful fight to defend next year's budget from crippling cuts. There was the allocation of $30,000,000 to the International Children's Emergency Fund—when $200,000,000 had been originally called for—and Chester Bowles's appeal to do the bigger job by voluntary contributions through the U. N. Appeal for Children.

It is not a very impressive record. I came out to Lake Success this morning with a young French journalist. The news from France deepened the gloom that had been building up in him over the past weeks. "The worst thing about this Assembly," he said, "is its effect on nations like mine. The French really believe in the United Nations. To them it was the one hope of the world. They are losing that hope. We expected during these weeks to see the rift between the East and the West, between Russia and the United States, made narrower. It has been widened." Then he said: "Both countries are basing their foreign policy on the same kind of false premise. Russia is counting on an American economic collapse; the United States is counting on a Russian political collapse. Both are wrong. From that kind of false reasoning only evil can come."

People will remember this Assembly for its political fireworks. The Russian and other Slav orators have been the most voluble, colorful, vituperative. In the war-mongering debate, for example, their attacks on prominent Americans were so ferocious that their victims appeared by contrast to be halo-crowned pacifists. And it is just shockingly bad politics to put George Marshall in a class with former Governor Earle, or to link together Senator McMahon and W. R. Hearst. The same broad criticism may be made of their debating tactics on almost every controversial issue. Their talk won over the doubters—to the other side.

The other side, of course, had the votes: they did not need to do much talking. Thirty-eight or forty to six became the familiar division, with a dozen or so abstentions. But the Russians made a mistake in believing that these votes simply represented successful American whip-cracking. In many cases an American proposal would never have carried a two-thirds' majority had it not been substantially modified by middle- and small-power action in committee. The Balkan-commission resolution had the guilt clause eliminated. The small powers insisted on passing a resolution against war talk in all countries after a slanted Russian resolution had been killed. The Interim Committee as first proposed by the Americans had such loosely defined powers as to be wide open to the Soviet charge that it challenged the authority of both Assembly and Security Council. As it was revised, the Little Assembly resolution established a body well within the jurisdiction of the General Assembly. In fact, in all cases in which a majority vote was answered by a Soviet boycott the increased functions assigned the Assembly were well within the scheme of the Charter and were no more than might be expected in an organization responding dynamically to a changing world.

While the over-all picture, therefore, may not seem bright—and until Washington and Moscow lose some of their hysteria it will not be bright—this Assembly has shown a certain toughness. In the case of Palestine, where Russian-American accord was reached, it showed some competence for constructive international action. The United Nations is not going to collapse tomorrow. Nor has Russia shown signs of wanting to pull out. Moreover, we have seen in the Assembly the emergence of a middle force devoting itself more to finding ways to make the United Nations function than to trying to gain a victory for one side or the other. The Russians would be wise to recognize this force as a war check, a solvent in a world hardening into antagonistic divisions.

Del Vayo—Needed, an East-West Conference

FOR many weeks past we have been in a curious situation; one morning we wake up to read the report of some authority on foreign affairs that Europe is about to be politically overrun by the Russians; next morning we are told that the Communists and the left generally are in disorderly retreat. Confronted with such contradictory diagnoses, it is rather difficult to arrive at a cool, objective view. But I would like to cite just a few facts to reinforce my obstinate belief that Europe is moving in the direction of socialism, no matter how many incidental and transitory setbacks may occur; and that a rapprochement between East and West, if only on economic matters, is nearer than the majority of people think.

Those who insist the European left is in retreat seem to believe that a couple of papal pronouncements, a few injections of dollars, and some aids to reaction like the American attitude on Spain in the General Assembly will be enough to liquidate socialism on the old Continent. To this line of thinking I would like to oppose a single, in my opinion, more important fact. De Gaulle has won to his side in France the center parties and a large section of the worried, depressed middle class; he has not succeeded, as Hitler and Mussolini did, in winning a comparable proportion of the workers. The same goes for De Gasperi. In post-war France and Italy the workers have refused to respond to right-wing appeals. The present Communist-led labor offensive, the strikes and demonstrations, may be dangerous and strategically foolish, but a careful study of what has happened in Italy, for example, in the last two weeks shows that both methods and objectives are different from those of the left in the time before the March on Rome. Then the Italian workers tried, through seizure of the factories, to establish socialism by force; this time they are using force against what they consider a threat of fascist revival. Having once made the experiment of succumbing to fascism without recourse to violence, they do not wish to repeat it. The more enlightened of them must realize that to call De Gaulle or De Gasperi a fascist is a distortion, but they rightly fear, in the light of the past, any kind of Schuschnigg or Brüning government which might open the way to fascism.

This temper of the working masses is the new fact in the situation. Of course it is painful to see the Communists concentrating their attacks on the Socialists, repeating the same tactical blunder which in Germany led to disaster; it is little more encouraging to see so many Socialists acting like the old stupid Social Democrats of pre-war years—considering every battle won against the Communists a great victory even if the benefit goes solely to reaction. But even here one discovers a new attitude on the part of the Socialist rank and file, a determination to resist the unnatural alliance of Socialists with their rightist "grave-diggers." In France the mere proposal of a Reynaud-Blum Cabinet met with flat disapproval in the Socialist membership; in Italy Saragat, though he has not much of a mass following to lose, hesitated for many days before joining the Gasperi government.

On the second point, the prospect of at least a limited rapprochement between East and West, I feel justified in insisting that such a thing is not only possible but bound to come. The initial step in such a development would be taken on purely economic grounds, but with political repercussions sure to follow.

Paradoxically, the Marshall Plan itself, although in its present stage universally regarded as a makeweight against Russia, will tend to encourage closer relations between East and West. The decisive facts are given in the report of the sixteen nations, which envisages a balance of nearly four billion dollars in favor of Western Europe in its trade with Eastern Europe and other "non-participating" countries. The sixteen nations worked out their program in Paris after Molotov left and in full knowledge of the atmosphere existing in the United States in regard to Russia and its satellites. They knew very well that the idea of economic collaboration between West and East would not be agreeable to those who hope to use the Marshall Plan primarily as an instrument against Russia. Yet the force of economic necessity prevailed over political considerations. The alternative is clear: either the United States takes on the whole burden of financing Western Europe, or it limits that responsibility by encouraging the reestablishment of trade and other sorts of economic cooperation between the West and the East. And the moment you begin to build up trade, you bring Eastern Europe indirectly into the Marshall Plan; the barrier is cracked and the first step taken toward better political relations.

A healthy approach to the problem of helping and reuniting Europe would be to call a conference of economic experts from both the Western and Eastern countries to find practical means for applying the recommendations of the Paris report. It is not enough to be willing to accept much-needed Polish coal for the factories of the West. The production of Polish coal can only reach a level sufficient to take care of a reasonable part of Western Europe's needs if Poland receives from America the machinery required to increase its output. The Paris program assumes "the anticipated reappearance of traditional exportable surpluses in the U. S. S. R. and Europe." Only a few weeks ago, and in spite of the aggravation in the general international situation, France was asking Russia for wheat because the French bread ration was in danger of having to be reduced even below the present 200 grams. West and East are being driven closer together as hunger and cold prove stronger than political antagonism.

This idea of an economic conference including all Europe is not a piece of wishful imagining. Delegates to the United Nations Assembly last week were confidentially talking among themselves about such a possibility. It was suggested that the European Economic Commission might call it, in that way averting the political difficulties that would confront Secretary Marshall if he were to take the initiative in such a move while Congress was still discussing his plan.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Does This Make Sense?

A RECENT American Military Government report stated that while industrial output in most European countries had been restored to about 90 per cent of the pre-war figure, German production, taking the four zones together, was no better than 40 per cent of what it was in 1936. In the American zone the figure was around 45 per cent, but in the industrially much more important area occupied by the British it was considerably lower.

All plans, not only for preventing Germany from becoming an expensive slum supported by outside charity but for the general recovery of Europe, depend on the rapid improvement of these figures. Economically, Germany cannot be separated from its neighbors; in order to prosper they need both its products and its markets. As the report of the sixteen Western European nations on the Marshall Plan put it when explaining the lag in recovery during the past year: "Further advance from the levels of the autumn of 1946 would, in any case, have been difficult in view of the continued inability of the German economy to supply the coal and other products upon which so much of Europe's economic life depends."

Since the American and British zones were unified for economic purposes, the occupation authorities have striven manfully to get industry back on its feet. The difficulties they face can hardly be exaggerated. Fuel, power, and raw materials are scarce; transport is near the breaking-point; the monetary system is chaotic; malnutrition saps the workers' energy, and the consumer-goods famine robs them of incentive.

With so many obstacles to surmount, it seems strange that the occupation authorities should have conjured up a new one. Yet a few weeks ago they published a list of 682 plants in "Bizonia" which were to be dismantled forthwith so that their equipment could be distributed in reparations. Of these plants, 302 are said to be strictly war factories, and the necessity for their destruction cannot be gainsaid. However, there seems to be a ruling requiring the blowing up of such structures after their machinery has been removed. This surely is unnecessarily wasteful in a country already half-buried in rubble. Cannot any of these buildings be used as warehouses or for other peaceful purposes?

Three hundred and eighty of the plants on the list are doomed as "surplus" in the light of the new level-of-industry plan, which provides for an ultimate German industrial capacity equal to that of 1936. Among them are steel mills, metal-working and machine shops of all kinds, chemical factories, shipyards, and power stations. Some of the selections appear extremely arbitrary. Why, for instance, should the Henckel soap-powder plant be included when the soap shortage in Germany is acute? Germans, reports H. N. Brailsford in the New Statesman and Nation of October 25, are convinced that the reason is the normal strong competitive position of this firm in export markets.

The outstanding economic problem of Western Europe and of Germany is the fuel shortage, and a vital element in all reconstruction plans is the maximum possible increase in the production of the Ruhr mines. At first sight it would appear that the dismantling program will not directly affect the mines. However, Mr. Brailsford was told by a mine union leader that no fewer than ninety-seven plants on the list supply equipment—winding gear, pumps, conveyor-belts, coal-cutting machines, and so forth—to the mines.

The parlous condition of German transport, intensified by the drought which has halted river and canal traffic, is another major bottleneck. Nevertheless, Mr. Brailsford learned, the reparations schedule includes a plant considered so vital for repair and reconstruction of freight cars that it has top priority for coal and power.

Defending their policy, the Anglo-American authorities point out that they have drastically reduced the original reparations schedule of 1,600 plants. This downward revision followed the decision last August to raise the permitted level of industry in "Bizonia" to that of 1936—a fairly prosperous year. Consequently Military Government officials feel that the outcry in Germany about the new list is quite unjustified. Moreover, they claim that "surplus plants" have been selected "with great care to insure that a balanced German economy, capable of self-support and of making a large contribution to the rehabilitation not only of Germany but also of Europe, is left in Germany."

In a recent statement General Clay, American Military Governor, asserted that the dismantled factories will serve Europe equally well after transplantation to other countries. This argument disregards a number of important factors. Dismantling and reassembling a factory is an expensive and time-consuming operation: it probably means that production is stopped for a year or more. It also involves a large unproductive use of man-power and transport facilities. And when finally set up in its new location, with a totally new body of workers, the plant will very probably be less efficient than before. Russia's experience in the bodily removal of industry from eastern Germany has not been encouraging, and its policy now seems to be to leave plants in Germany and take a large part of their production as reparations.

Anyone advocating modification of reparations policies is apt to find himself accused of encouraging German rearmament and of wishing to relieve the Germans of punishment for their crimes. Personally, I believe there are better ways—strict control of imported raw materials, for example—of preventing German rearmament than the dismantling of factories. As to making the Germans pay, I am all for it, but I want payment in ways that will contribute to Europe's recovery, not hinder it. The dismantling program means inevitable loss of output from the listed plants and, what is more serious, dislocation of production in the interrelated industries which are theoretically untouched. An industrial complex such as exists in western Germany is organic; if you start to extract segments, you upset its whole balance. Countries entitled to reparations will gain in the long run by allowing Germany to become an efficient producer and then taking as payment a share of its production.

In the Wind

WHICH PART," asked the Wind, shall we give to the Parkway Community Council, of Brooklyn?"

"What has it done?" asked the Candle.

"Scheduled a forum on the topic Must We Aid Europe? and announced that Earl Browder and Hamilton Fish will share the platform."

"Oh," said the Candle. "Give it a drumstick."

"Well, then," asked the Wind, "What shall we give Morgan L. Fitch, of the—you know—National Association of Real Estate Boards. Mr. Fitch tells us that 'our housing shortage is actually a measure of today's high standard of living.'"

"Give Mr. Fitch a small wing," said the Candle. "And some burnt feathers to William E. Russell, Sr., chairman of the board of the Lawyers' Mortgage Company, of New York, who told Representative Gamble's housing investigation committee that 'I was born in a substandard house, and I am not satisfied that we need to eliminate such houses.'"

"Who gets white meat?" asked the Wind.

"The editor of the Transvaaler, a South African newspaper," answered the Candle. "For writing this editorial: 'By an overwhelming majority the students of the University of the Witwatersrand have decided to ask the Hospital Board to allow natives, colored, and Indians to attend post-mortems. The European demands "separateness" while he lives. He cannot allow different treatment of the dead. The authorities must immediately quash this movement at the university.'"

"Don't give him all of it," said the Wind. "Save some for the members of a jury in Glenwood, Iowa, which found six men from Pacific Junction, Iowa, including the high-school basketball coach, guilty of a breach of the peace for protesting against the arrest of a young Negro. The mayor of Pacific Junction picked the Negro up on a charge of begging in the street. The six men, who happened to be watching, said it wasn't so. A discussion ensued. No violence. Peace is awfully breachable these days."

"Yes," said the Candle, "and so is the sanctity of the home. Here's a man called Henry Kappler, in Los Angeles, who divorced his wife 'because of her political beliefs.' Her friends, he testified, were members of the Communist Party. Then his friends stopped talking to him. What'll we give him?"

"Stuffing," said the Wind. "And gizzards to Hedda Hopper, who quips, in a recent column, 'Call Me Mister, the supposedly Commie-inspired play which starred Melvyn Douglas. . . . It didn't star him, by the way, it was backed by him.'"

"And the part that goes over the fence last," said the Wind, "goes to Russel Porter, who wrote a piece for the New York Times the other day on Semantics—a Red Weapon, and somehow let this slip in: 'Responsible business men are agreed they must keep it [the American system] free of private monopoly and government control, restrict production, and . . .'"

"And a happy Thanksgiving to you, Mr. Porter," said the Candle with dispatch.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE OTHER ROBERT FROST

BY RANDALL JARRELL

BESIDES the Frost that everybody knows there is one whom no one even talks about. Everybody knows what the regular Frost is; the one living poet who has written good poems that ordinary readers like without any trouble and understand without any trouble; the conservative editorialist and self-made apothegm-joiner, full of dry wisdom and free, complacent, Yankee enterprise; the Farmer-Poet—this is an imposing private role perfected for public use, a sort of Olympian Will Rogers out of "Tanglewood Tales"; and—last or first of all—Frost is the standing, speaking reproach to any other good modern poet: "If Frost can write poetry that's just as easy as Longfellow, you can too—you do too." It's this "easy" side of Frost that is more attractive to academic readers, who are eager to canonize any modern poet who condemns in example the modern poetry which they condemn in precept; and it is this side that has helped to get him neglected or depreciated by intellectuals—the reader of Eliot or Auden usually dismisses Frost as something inconsequentially good that he knew all about long ago. Ordinary readers think Frost the greatest poet alive, and love some of his best poems almost as much as they love some of his worst ones. He seems to them a sensible, tender, humorous poet who knows all about trees and farms and folks in New England, and still has managed to get an individualistic, fairly optimistic, thoroughly American philosophy out of what he knows; there's something reassuring about his poetry, they feel—almost like prose. Certainly there's nothing hard or queer or gloomy about it.

These views of Frost, it seems to me, come from not knowing his poems well enough or from knowing the wrong poems too well. Frost's best-known poems, with two or three exceptions, are not his best poems at all; when you read, say, the selections in Untermeyer, you are getting a good synopsis of the ordinary idea of Frost and a bad misrepresentation of the real Frost (my real). It would be hard to make a novel list of Eliot's best poems, but my list of ten or twelve of Frost's best poems is likely to seem to anybody too new to be true. This is it: The Witch of Coös, Neither Out Far Nor In Deep, Design, A Servant to Servants, Directive, Provide Provide, Home-Burial, Acquainted with the Night, The Pauper Witch of Grafton, An Old Man's Winter Night, The Gift Outright, Desert Places, and The Fear.

Nothing I say about these poems can make you see what they are like, or what the Frost that matters most is like; if you read them you will see. The Witch of Coös is the best thing of its kind since Chaucer; I've read it to schoolgirls and I've read it to soldiers, and I've never seen an audience that wasn't so amused, scared, and saddened that it shocked them to have to wake up at the end. Home-Burial and A Servant to Servants are two of the most moving and appalling dramatic poems ever written; and how could lyrics be more ingeniously and conclusively merciless than Neither Out Far Nor In Deep, or Design? or more grotesquely and subtly and mercilessly disenchanting than the tender An Old Man's Winter Night? or more unsparingly truthful than Provide Provide? And so far from being obvious, optimistic, orthodox, most of these poems are extraordinarily subtle and strange, poems which express an attitude that, at its most extreme, makes pessimism seem a hopeful evasion; they begin with a flat and terrible reproduction of the evil in the world and end by saying: It's so; and there's nothing you can do about it; and if there were, would you ever do it? The limits which existence approaches and falls back from have seldom been stated with such bare composure.

Frost's virtues are extraordinary. No other living poet has written so well about the actions of ordinary men: his wonderful dramatic monologues or dramatic scenes come out of a knowledge of people that few poets have ever had, and they are written in a verse that uses, with absolute mastery, the rhythms of actual speech. Particularly in his blank verse there is a movement so characteristic, so unmistakably and overwhelmingly Frost's, that one feels about it almost as the Duchesse de Guermantes felt about the Frans Halses at Haarlem: that even if you caught just a glimpse of them, going by in the street car, you could tell that they were something pretty unusual. It is hard to exaggerate the effect of this exact, spaced-out, prosaic, truthful rhythm, whose objects have the tremendous strength—you find it in Hardy's best poems—of things merely put down and left to speak for themselves. (Though Frost has little of Hardy's self-effacement, his matter-of-fact, lifelong humility; Frost's tenderness, sadness, and humor are adulterated with vanity and a hard complacency.) Frost's seriousness and honesty; the bare sorrow with which things are accepted as they are, neither exaggerated nor explained away; the many, many poems in which there are real people with their real speech and real thoughts and real emotions—all this, in conjunction with so much gentleness and subtlety and exactness, such classical understatement and restraint, makes the reader feel that he is not in a book but in a world, and a world that has in common with his own some of the things that are most important in both. I don't need to praise anything so justly famous as Frost's observation of and empathy with everything in Nature from a hornet to a hill-side; and he has observed his own nature, one person's random or consequential chains of thoughts and feelings and perceptions, quite as well. (And this person, in the poems, is not the "alienated artist" cut off from everybody who isn't, yum-yum, another alienated artist, but someone like normal people only more so—a normal person in the less common and more important sense of normal.) The least crevice of the good poems is saturated with imagination, an imagination that expresses itself in the continuous wit and humor and particularity of what is said, in the hand-hewn or hand-polished texture of its saying. The responsibility and seriousness of Frost's best work are nowhere better manifested than in the organization of these poems—an organization that in its concern for any involution or ramification that really belongs to its subject, and in its severity toward anything else, expresses that absorption into a subject that is prior even to affection.

The organization of Frost's poems is often rather simple or—as people say—"old-fashioned." But, as people ought to know, very complicated organizations are excessively rare in poetry, although in our time a very complicated disorganization has been excessively common; there is more successful organization in Home-Burial or The Witch of Coös than in The Cantos and The Bridge put together. These titles will remind anyone of what is scarcest in Frost: rhetoric and romance, hypnotic verbal excitement, Original Hart Crane—Frost's word-magic is generally of a quiet, sober, bewitching sort, though the contrasts he gets from his grayed or unsaturated shades are often more satisfying to a thoughtful rhetorician than some dazzling arrangements of prismatic colors. Yet there are dazzling passages in Frost:

"... So desert it would have to be, so walled

By mountain ranges half in summer snow,

No one would covet it or think it worth
The pains of conquering to force change on.

Scattered oases where men dwelt, but mostly

Sand dunes held loosely in tamarisk
Blown over and over themselves in idleness.

Sand grains should sugar in the natal dew

The babe born to the desert, the sand storm

Retard mid-waste my cowering caravans—

There are bees in this wall." He struck the clapboards,

Fierce heads looked out; small bodies pivoted.

We rose to go. Sunset blazed on the windows.

Frost has written, as everybody knows: "I never dared be radical when young/For fear it would make me conservative when old." This is about as truthful as it is metrical. Frost was radical when young—he was a very odd and very radical radical, a much more interesting sort than the standard PM brand—and now that he's old he's sometimes callously and unimaginatively conservative. Take, for instance, his poems about the atomic bomb in "Steeple Bush"; these amount to a very old and very successful man saying, "I've had my life—why should you worry about yours?" Sometimes it is this public figure, this official role—the Only Genuine Robert Frost in Captivity—that writes the poems, and not the poet himself; and then one gets a self-made man's political editorials, full of cracker-box philosophizing, almanac joke-cracking, of a snake-oil salesman's mysticism; one gets the public figure's relishing consciousness of himself, a surprising constriction of imagination and sympathy; one gets an arch complacency, a complacent archness; and one gets Homely Wisdom till the cows come home. Often the later Frost makes demands on himself that are minimal; he uses a little wit and a little observation and a little sentiment to stuff—not very tight—a little sonnet; and it's not bad, but not good enough to matter, either. The extremely rare, extremely wonderful dramatic and narrative element that is more important than anything else in his early poetry almost disappears from his later work; in it the best poems are usually special-case, rather than all-out, full-scale affairs. The younger Frost is surrounded by his characters, living beings he has known or created; the older Frost is alone. But it is this loneliness that is responsible for the cold finality of poems like Neither Out Far Nor in Deep and Provide Provide.

Frost's new books have few of his virtues, most of his vices, and all of his tricks; the heathen who would be converted to Frost by them is hard to construct. "Steeple Bush" (Henry Holt, $2.50) has one wonderful poem, Directive; a fairly good, dazzlingly heartless one, The Ingenuities of Debt; and nothing else that is not better done somewhere else in Frost. "A Masque of Mercy" (Henry Holt, $2.50), though no great shakes—as you see, its style is catching—is a great improvement on the earlier "A Masque of Reason," which is a trivial, frivolous, and bewilderingly corny affair, full of jokes inexplicable except as the contemptuous patter of an old magician perfectly certain that he can get away with anything in the world: What fools these readers be! Besides, Frost has long ago divorced reason for common sense, and is basking complacently in his bargain; consequently, when common sense has God justify His ways by saying, "I was just showing off to Satan, Job," the performance has all the bleak wisdom of Calvin Coolidge telling you what life comes to at 2½%.

The plot of "A Masque of Mercy" is as simple as that of "Merope," but it is one that is more likely to get Frost recognized as another precursor of surrealism than to get him looked askance at as one of Arnold's Greeks. A bookstore-keeper named My Brother's Keeper has a wife named Jesse Bel; one night Jonah—who, having forgotten both his gourd and what God made of it, is feeling for New York City all that he used to feel for Nineveh—seeks refuge in the bookstore; after a little talk from St. Paul (Jesse Bel's psychiatrist) and a lot from Keeper (a character who develops so much that he finally develops into Robert Frost), Jonah comes to realize that "justice doesn't really matter."

Frost lavishes some care and a lot more self-indulgence on this congenial subject: he has a thorough skepticism about that tame revenge; justice, and a cold certainty that nothing but mercy will do for us. What he really warms to is a rejection beyond either justice or mercy, and the most felt and moving part of his poem is the unshaken recognition that

Our sacrifice, the best we have to offer,
And not our worst nor second best, our best,
Our very lives, our lives laid down like
Jonah's,
Our lives laid down in war and peace, may not
Be found acceptable in Heaven's sight....

ahead in spite of it, Frost says, is man's principal virtue, courage. WILSON AMONG THE RUINS

BY STEPHEN SPENDER

EUROPE WITHOUT BAEDEKER.

Sketches among the Ruins of Italy, Greece, and England. By Edmund Wilson. Doubleday and Company. $4.

WHEN an intellectual of the reputation of Edmund Wilson travels to Europe and reports on events among the ruins to a public accustomed to reading his excellent literary criticism, one does not expect him to write as an authority on economics or politics, or even as a trained reporter. Nevertheless, one does have a reasonable expectation that he will bring to the lives of human beings the same qualities of scrupulous fair-mindedness, sympathy, and cultivated wisdom as he brings to books. Moreover, one would expect that his reason for going into the world and writing about it was because he had something serious to say: and by "serious" I mean that one expects an intellectual who is not a political expert to endeavor to increase understanding between people, to defend liberty, to sympathize with human suffering, to be patient of small inconveniences, to have a certain humility when he meets men and women who are engaged in strenuous and exhausting practical tasks, and to realize that the most important need in the world today can be summed up in the one word peace.

I do not think that anyone who admires Mr. Wilson's criticism as much as I myself do would expect less of him. Therefore when I say that "Europe Without Baedeker" leaves me with a sense of betrayal, I mean by this that Mr. Wilson betrays the reader, betrays himself, and betrays the role of the intellectual in our time.

When Mr. Wilson reviews books, he has certain critical standards. When he reviews Europe, he has almost no standards except those which are improvised for the purpose of comparing an unflattering view of most of the Europeans whom he meets with a most flattering picture of the American as an innocent abroad. For example, he writes that Americans, in judging the English, have to reckon with a picture which they find in Thackeray, Dickens, and Butler—"the passion for social privilege, the rapacious attitude for property, the egoism that damns one's neighbor, the dependence on inherited advantages, and the almost equally deep-fibered instinct, often not deliberate or conscious, to make all these appear forms of virtue." Then, invoking Henry James in "The Wings of the Dove" as a fellow Anglophobe with Dickens, Thackeray, and Butler, he goes on to write of Americans:

We find making money exhilarating, but we also find it exhilarating to spend it. Money for us is a medium, a condition of life, like air. But with the English it means always property. A dollar is something that you multiply—something that causes an expansion of your house and your mechanical equipment, something that accelerates like speed; and that may be also slowed up or deflated. It is a value that may be totally imaginary, yet can for a time provide half-realized dreams. But pounds, shillings, and pence are tangible, solid, heavy; they are objects one gains and possesses. And every good in England is bound up with the things one can handle and hold.

I am bewildered here to look for the moral values which entitle Mr. Wilson to claim that the English differ from the Americans in hypocritically making their materialism appear under the guise of "forms of virtue."

A great deal of this book is taken up with the kind of stories which school-children tell about one another, told to Mr. Wilson by people working under exasperating conditions, which he conscientiously takes down. For example, L—, an American officer, tells him:

In Sicily a British officer had been living in a castle with a local countess and levying a personal tax on every cargo of wine that went north. He was now in Italy proper and the authorities were supposed to have the goods on him; but did you ever hear of an officer—especially a British officer—being convicted by a court martial?

Of course, Mr. Wilson does not reply to this rhetorical question that he has heard of dozens of British, and American, officers being convicted, because he never hears of anything unless he is told. Nor does it occur to him that there are American officers—and French officers and Russian officers—who have lived with "local countesses" and done deals on the black market. In fact, Mr. Wilson must hold the world's record as the most innocent American traveler who has ever been abroad. One has the impression that he had never heard about anything nasty happening anywhere until he was sent to a ruined Europe by the New Yorker. Next L— tells him about the father of an Italian family, with whom L— has been living, who proposes that L— "should supply him with flints that the Americans were shipping in for cigarette-lighters for the soldiers."

It never seems to occur to Mr. Wilson that the depicting of the Americans as an army of Daisy Millers and Milly Theales marching out of the pages of Henry James to be exploited and corrupted by rapacious Europeans is an argument which cuts both ways. For any American or European who knows anything about the facts, reading Mr. Wilson's pages, could match every one of Mr. Wilson's stories against Europeans with one as bad or worse against Americans. For example, Mr. Wilson complains that the British once delayed his journey from London to Italy because his papers were not quite in order. Now I myself in the autumn of 1946 was given an order by a British officer to travel on the train that goes from Frankfurt to Paris. The American transport officer to whom I showed this order handed it back to me saying, "British orders are not worth the paper they are written on."

If everyone had the passion for petty recrimination of Mr. Wilson, and made no allowance for the fact that such irritation is really to be discounted as a by-product of the sheer misery of events themselves, we could have a war about such trifles. Indeed, in the concluding passage of an essay in fiction called Through the Abruzzi Mr. Wilson's irritation reaches a point of hysteria. This story is a sketch of two girls—one English and one American—who are working together in UNRRA. Of course the American girl discovers that the English girl has the heart of a blue-blooded codfish, and she, poor warm-hearted thing, cries out to an American major at the mess (he is kept in the rank of major in order that the British colonel can order him to make up a fourth in bridge when he wants him): "Oh, come on! Are we men or are we mice? Did we beat the hell out of these limics at Lexington and Bunker Hill just to let them push us around after we'd saved them from being chewed up by the Germans?"

One can best answer this foolish question by saying that considering that the British and Americans have been allies in two wars during the past thirty years, to ask it is an insult to thousands of American and British dead. In fact, the picture of friction between English and Americans presented in this one-sided way, if it does a slight service in describing a genuine hatred, does a regrettable disservice to a genuine and less publicized love which existed and exists between thousands of Americans and British who fought in Europe together. During the war I myself was a fireman in London with the English whom Mr. Wilson did not meet, and often we used to invite into our fire stations the Americans whom Mr. Wilson also did not meet, and in those meetings I do not remember a single example of the ill-will of which he makes so much.

In a sketch of life in Rome Mr. Wilson takes up much time complaining of

The following letter has been received from a ten-year-old boy by The Foster Parents' Plan for War Children:—

"IT IS A LONG DISTANCE TO SCHOOL. BUT I COME EVERY DAY BECAUSE IT IS WARM AND THERE IS FOOD. TODAY IT IS RAINING. MY MOTHER WILL CARRY ME OVER THE RUBBLE BECAUSE I HAVE NO SHOES. IN MY HOME THERE LIVED A LITTLE BOY WHO DID NOT HAVE SHOES AND A COAT AND CAUGHT COLD AND DIED. I DON'T WANT TO DIE."

You can help the thousands of children now in desperate need overseas by becoming a foster parent. You will receive a case history and a photograph of the child. Correspondence with the child through our office is encouraged.

The Plan is helping children of fourteen different nationalities in France, Poland, Italy, Belgium, Holland, England, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia and China.

The Foster Parents' Plan does not do mass relief. Each child is treated as an individual with the idea that besides food, clothing, shelter and education, the child will live in a homelike atmosphere and receive the loving care that so rightfully belongs to childhood.

Please send clean used clothing to the Plan Collection Depot, 122 East 34th Street, New York 16, New York, for immediate shipment overseas.

the food at the hotel for correspondents, and he reports without irony a story of an American officer in the mess throwing an unappetizing dish on the floor as a demonstration. It is only when he goes to see the film "Open City" that it occurs to Mr. Wilson that there is something odd in this behavior, and at this point—inspired by a film which he might have seen in New York—the faintest note of self-dissatisfaction is struck in these pages: "How could we correspondents, drowsing and grumbling about Rome in our antiquated tourist hotel, have imagined that a work of such power, at the same time intense and restrained, had been produced in the Via del Tritone, where the prostitutes thronged every evening . . .," and so on. It is still, of course, the film which makes him ashamed and not the people starving. If Mr. Wilson has now seen the film "Shoeshine," it might occur to him that those clever Italian producers, living among the prostitutes and the Roman excrement which he so insists on, might make a very ironic film of the journey of Edmund Wilson among the European ruins and without a Baedeker.

Finally Mr. Wilson pops up in Greece in the role of an international socialist, criticizing the British for suppressing the E. A. M., and imagining that like the American girl in Abruzzi he is "just an old-fashioned American who wanted equal opportunity for everybody and trusted in F. D. R." In his innocence he seems to imagine that in supporting the Greek people against the British he is just being an American. That, of course, is one of the places where he is wrong. I agree with Mr. Wilson in deploring the British attitude in Greece, just as I agree with him in many of his criticisms of the British character. But unfortunately his opinions are not connected with any fundamental values either for judging situations or for understanding human beings. Thus he completely fails to understand that the British role in Europe of yesterday is inevitably the American role of today, just as he fails to understand that the little hatreds between officers working in Europe are the result of a situation which one can only judge if one understands and sympathizes with the terrible conditions in which occupiers and occupied are living in Europe today.

This book does not help Americans to understand Europeans or Europeans to understand Americans; nor does it help the best elements in America to join with the best elements in Europe to overcome the terrible European situation. It may slightly increase the prejudice of some Americans against the British, and it could not possibly do otherwise than increase the bitterness of most Europeans who read it against America, especially when they consider that Mr. Wilson is, as I have always considered, an extremely intelligent man. My own wish is to protest against it, as I have done here, and then try to forget it and reestablish in my own mind the respect I have always felt for Mr. Wilson as a critic. For the rest, it makes me feel more strongly than ever that intellectual workers do have a role to play in public events, but that the qualities required for this role are patience, understanding, and an absolute refusal to flatter the prejudices of people in favor of their own national systems and against those of other nations.

Parkman and the Forest

THE JOURNALS OF FRANCIS

PARKMAN. Edited by Mason Wade.

Two Volumes. Harper and Brothers.
$10.

PARKMAN'S journals and notebooks, mislaid for many years, were recovered through the enterprise of their present editor. They had been drawn on sparingly by Parkman's early biographers, and Mr. Wade paraphrased and quoted from them extensively in his own life of Parkman, published in 1942; now for the first time they are printed complete. Mr. Wade has written useful prefaces for each notebook and thoroughly annotated them. They are impressive documents, almost unique in the view they give of a historian's workshop. In this respect they will keep a corps of scholars busy for a long time piecing together their bearings on Parkman's methods and results. Much of the material is fragmentary—lists of books and manuscripts; addresses of antiquarians, booksellers, copyists; bibliographical information from fellow-Americanists; memoranda for corrections; incidents of the Indian wars from eyewitnesses; notes on historic localities; thumbnail sketches of scenery; accounts of expenditures. The full diaries, however—particularly those of Parkman's college-vacation trips to northern New England in 1841 and 1842, of his European tour in 1844, and of the Oregon Trail trip in 1846—are extremely good reading in themselves as well as for the light they throw on the background of his work.

In them we see Parkman in the first flush of his grand design, ranging from Europe to the far West in search of what he needed in the way of experience as the scope of his project took shape for him. Before he was twenty-three and in spite of his Bostonian handicaps he had explored the oldest of human societies and the youngest in his quest. In Italy he sought out the institutions of Roman Catholicism and brought his trip to a climax with a stay at a Passionist convent in Rome. So on the Great Plains he was part for a while of a living frontier and drove himself through illness and danger to spend three weeks in the lodges of the Ogalala Sioux. This is "research" of a very rare kind—a polarization of all the faculties in the pursuit of a design that engaged to the fullest intellect, imagination, and a craving for physical adventure. The record of it is exhilarating.

The most rewarding of the diaries are perhaps the first two. Important as was the knowledge they gave him, Europe and the West were for Parkman only the circumference of a circle whose charmed center was the forest wilderness, or what was left of it, of his own Northeast. Here his instinct led him first of all, and to it he looked back nostalgically on his later trips. In these first diaries we find more than anywhere else the sources of what most deeply engaged his imagination. They are, so to speak, his Oregon Trail of the East. In the White Mountains, at Lake George, and above all in the Magalloway country, beyond the edge of settlement in northern New Hampshire, he formed the richest of the impressions of forest life that give such actuality to his history. The few days of his Magalloway excursions—both together came to less than two weeks—yielded an extraordinary harvest. Here for the first and only time he had the experience of forest river travel and learned its techniques; here he first slept in the open (he grew up long before the days of "summer camps"); here, on the second trip across the rough country to the north, he made the most ambitious of his woods journeys. The forest, not the Western plains, was his great, central theme, and he here came closest to its heart.

But Parkman's great project, early in life as he conceived it, was carried out only at a price. The path from idea to realization was for him a peculiarly thorny one. Under the surface of these early diaries is a sense of tensions only partially released, and what little direct revelation of personal feeling is to be found in them strikes a note of conflict and frustration. An entry in a fragmentary journal of a walking trip in the Berkshires in 1844 indicates a devastating struggle to repress a powerful sexual instinct. "Lee is full of factory girls. The very devil beset me there. I never suffered so much from certain longings I resolved not to gratify, and which got me into such a nervous state that I scarcely slept all night." A feeling of frustration is also evident in the sardonic comments on friends and classmates which color his diary of the following year, when he had enrolled at the Harvard Law School, at his father's request and against his own will. But the chief source of the complex of nervous and physical disorders that later overtook him seems to have been the conflict between the role he had conceived for himself as leader and man of action and the hardly acknowledged promptings of his genius as writer and creator ("holding the pen with the hand that should have grasped the sword," as he phrased it at the time of the Civil War).

Externally, Parkman's instinct for leadership was frustrated by the position of his class, exiled from national affairs by the Jacksonian revolution. Embittered by this sense of exclusion, he is violent in his rejection of attempts at social initiative on the part of any other class. Yet this state of being cut off gave rise to doubts, if not of the qualifications, at least of the capacities, of his fellow-Brahmans and himself—a suspicion of the sort of inner flaw which he later was to trace in the personality of La Salle, the character in his histories with whom he most identified himself ("too shy for society and too reserved for popularity, often unsympathetic and always seeming so, smothering emotions he could not utter, schooled to universal distrust"). In one entry of his law-school diary he notes "that remarkable constraint to which the presence of a person of inferior sense, acuteness, and energy will sometimes subject one far his superior." In another he asks, "Is a man a coward, because he feels less than himself in a crowd?" And his sketch of young Cerré in St. Louis has a strongly autobiographical flavor, as of a man recognizing his own traits. "Young, silent through bashfulness, observing all, feeling all, and constantly in hostility to external influences—though resolute and determined, acting ever under the burden of constitutional diffidence. . . . How hostile is such a quality to a commanding character. . . . Some men have a sort of power from their very vanity. . . . Others there are who, with many of the internal qualities of command, can never assume its outward features—and fail in consequence."

The conception of himself as a man of action died hard with Parkman. Of his role as artist he never doubted, because he never consciously recognized it. But the great project he embraced so eagerly as physical and intellectual adventure was to hold him to its purposes in a deeper way than he knew. Through fifteen years of agonizing struggle "the pen" finally established mastery over "the sword."

Drama of Complicity

THE AXE OF WANDSBEK. By Arnold Zweig. Translated by Eric Sutton. The Viking Press. $3.50.

THE AXE OF WANDSBEK" will surely find its way on to university bookshelves a few years hence as collateral reading for courses on Nazi Germany. Even a very Chaplinesque Hitler—perhaps the "real" Hitler after all—is seen on two occasions: once shrieking as he rushes through a room; once exhausted after a violent speech of denunciation and drinking a glass of beer. But these pages hardly belong in this serious and ambitious study of German political confusion in 1937 and 1938. As a novel, indeed, "The Axe of Wandsbek" is nearly destroyed by its massive probability, its inordinate patience, its high, serious intention. The characters not only drink tea and cognac but particular blends of tea and Martell cognac from a particular kind of bottle; in conversation they not merely adumbrate theories but exhaust them. The novel is perhaps 200 pages too long. Yet it finally persuades—persuades even the reader who thought such antiquated realism dead.

Arnold Zweig makes no real effort to

A NEW INTERPRETATION OF THE LIVES OF 4 GREAT AMERICANS

ARCHITECTS of the REPUBLIC

by

FRANK KINGDON

Four master architects have planned and guided the building of the Republic. Frank Kingdon, distinguished writer and commentator, has told their stories simply and forthrightly. He has related them to their times, analyzing with brilliant directness their place in the development of the nation. To George Washington, Dr. Kingdon attributes the Cornerstone of Order; to Thomas Jefferson, the principle of Individual Liberty; to Abraham Lincoln, the establishment of the principle of Equality; to Franklin Roosevelt, the capstone of Security. He has treated Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln humanly, as men alive to the needs of the people, the issues of their times and the direction of the growing Republic. And he has written a fine, warm, understanding story of Franklin Roosevelt, whose memory as a man is still poignantly fresh among us.

explain Hitler or National Socialism, which appears only as a complicated swindle. He is concerned rather with the moral drama of complicity, with the nearly universal acquiescence in accomplished facts, with the daily rationalizations which could argue away guilt or transfer it to somebody else. The two parts of the book sum up, a trifle schematically, the intellectual's betrayal of value and the workingman's betrayal of his class. "Man is inclined, my father always says, to call his neighbor to account for everything he discovers in his own soul." The master-butcher Albert Teetjen—whose talents are enlisted as the substitute executioner of four innocent men—can blame the "reds" for all his subsequent difficulties. His pieces of silver are consumed in just a year, and even his fellow S. S. troopers demand their share of the loot. But the humane and civilized Dr. Koldewey, neither wholly corrupted by his reading of Nietzsche nor wholly saved by his reading of Freud, is a still more sinister figure. He is the silky "man of good-will" who argues—as in what country did he not so argue?—that revolutions have to be violent, and who long turns his back on what seems to him merely vulgar. Who in Wandsbek is not finally involved in the execution of these four innocent men? The army officer, Lintze, defends the execution as a lesson in military authority. The doctor, Käte Neumeier, pursues her troubled conscience by pursuing Teetjen, the simple ax-wielder and mere instrument of unseen powers—whose hands are always moved as by a divining-rod. The Koldewey children, devoted to astrology and jazz, were the infants of "Disorder and Early Sorrow." They can even use the ax for a wedding-party prank. Zweig's younger women are wholly unmoral. But so too is Hans Peter Footh, shipowner and rising opportunist, recognizably a degenerate Buddenbrook. For this is still, in some respects, the gray Buddenbrook world. Everyone in Wandsbek loves good food, cheerful family life, music, poetry, order and cleanliness in the home, excursions, flowers, animals—have precisely those affections which charmed the G. I. of 1945, and made him wonder how such a kindly people could have been universally traduced.

The Munich crisis, so immediate to Sartre's "Reprieve," hovers distantly over the last pages of "The Axe of Wandsbek." It is a rather astounding coincidence that these two frankly "major" novels, both translated by Eric Sutton, should have appeared within a few weeks. They are bound to be compared, as historical interpretation and as art. We are given, but nine years too late, the German and French orders of battle, the confronted energies and discouragements. In detail one must prefer Sartre's portrait—though it is as hard to believe that so many Frenchmen thought they were going to die in battle as that so many Germans thought they would never fight at all. The Frenchmen of Sartre's novel were indeed demoralized. They saw, that is, the subtle exception to every rule of their own existence; they had witnessed the destruction of each saving illusion; they were thrown back on their solitude, and on the minutiae of a still pleasant daily existence. Zweig's detached Germans of Wandsbek were not on the other hand de-moralized enough; or demoralized only by universal ambiguity. They were insufficiently subtle and had a terrible capacity for easy belief. And so they could accept the most obvious lies—lies about the Versailles treaty, the Weimar Republic, the Communists, the Jews, the oppressed German minorities. Few books have demonstrated more frighteningly than these two novels the gap between political reality and public illusion, and—a memo for 1947—the sinister quality which all highly publicized—"innocence" of intention is likely to take on.

Arnold Zweig has a professorial affection for curiosa, and Sartre is of course a philosopher. It has been argued rather too glibly, however, that neither man is a true novelist, capable of escaping his ideas. For Sartre's illiterate shepherd, Gros-Louis, is a stunningly realized fiction. And so too is Zweig's master-butcher, who tries to bury his ax, who practices every day with his divining rod, and who reads Jules Verne for information on the center of the earth. The true novelist appears in the dryness of this portrait: in the precarious but maintained balance of sympathy and detachment, understanding and disgust. The exile who wrote this book wrote no doubt from unappeased hatred, and in memorial sympathy for the victims.

But he was sufficiently a true novelist to see Teetjen not as an S. S. trooper only but also as a baffled and beaten man—who wants very little more from life than it is reasonable to want (survival), who is capable of occasional kindnesses, and who has a very real love for his red-haired Stine. This imaginative effort, which must have been enormous, largely compensates for the vastly overextended realism—a realism only occasionally relieved, otherwise, by macabre and symbolic coincidence. So the extreme paradox that this Jewish exile's novel may well be remembered for its moving and even sympathetic account of a Nazi executioner's love, decline, and suicide.

ALBERT GUERARD, JR.

America in Pastels

THE TIMES OF MELVILLE AND WHITMAN. By Van Wyck Brooks. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

MOST readers are familiar with the manner and range of what Mr. Brooks now calls his "history of the literary life in America." "The Times of Melville and Whitman," the fourth volume to be published, is intended to be read as the third in the series. Taking up more or less where "The World of Washington Irving" left off, it covers writers of New York, the South, and the West from about 1840 to sometime after the Civil War and is vaguely oriented around Melville, Whitman, and Mark Twain.

What can one say about the book? Mr. Brooks's method is well known and has become a convention of his own. He has long since abandoned any recognizable critical function in favor of lengthy and tender exercises in nostalgia. As usual, the leading characters tend to dissolve into the cluster of minor figures. The prose is as lush as ever and as lovingly preoccupied with antiquarian detail. The result is not literary criticism, or the "literary history of the United States" which "The Flowering of New England" promised, or even a history of the literary life in America, but only Van Wyck Brooks's charming, gentle, and poetic fantasies, through which we may dimly discern the contours of the American cultural past. It is history by magic-lantern slides.

His method and his prose, moreover, have a peculiar effect of eviscerating the past—of divesting it of its dark and tragic strains and making it something graceful and innocuous. Thus, when Mr. Brooks writes of Horace Binney Wallace, he notes Wallace's essays on medieval churches, not his brooding anxiety over the rise of democracy in the United States; and the chapter on Philadelphia finds no space at all for the lurid proletarian imaginings of George Lippard. No one would guess from the serene cadences of "The Times of Melville and Whitman" that this was a nation torn by savage fraternal strife. The Civil War appears chiefly as an unobtrusive backdrop to some experiences of Whitman.

Our tradition, as Mr. Brooks sees it, lacks tension and tragedy. This recoil from trauma inevitably wrecks Brooks's treatment of his main figures. Thus we have a Melville almost indifferent to the problem of evil, a Whitman whose ambiguities are muted and denied, a Lincoln without internal agonies. The author of "The Ordeal of Mark Twain," clearly benefiting by a study of the works of Bernard DeVoto, has reconstructed his theory of Mark Twain's frustration along more sensible lines; but even this frustration appears to have largely a literary existence, lacking intensity, and Mr. Brooks's projection of it is genteel and diffident compared to Twain's black despair as revealed in DeVoto's "Mark Twain at Work."

The American past is neither this pretty nor this trivial. It has had its moments of heroism and of evil, of grandeur and of cowardice, of failure and of defeat. But the Brooks palette appears to have run out of everything except pastel. The cumulative effect of Brooks's ambitious design is diffuseness. The light radiates so evenly, the colors are so soft, that everyone begins to look like everyone else. Sentimentality, in the long run, can be no substitute for a firm intellectual structure, nor erudition for analysis. In abdicating criticism and ignoring history, Mr. Brooks has created his private dream world, rich and placid and ultimately cloying. The fact that its inhabitants bear familiar names should not lead readers to confuse the dream with reality.

ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR.

The "Slighter Gestures" of E. M. Forster

ABINGER HARVEST. By E. M. Forster. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

ABINGER HARVEST," first printed in 1936, is a collection of essays which E. M. Forster contributed over a period of some thirty years to various periodicals. They are arranged under the headings: The Present, Books, The Past, The East, and The Abinger Pageant. As English, simple, natural, clear English, they are a joy to read. It doesn't matter whether the subject of the essay is a vaudeville troupe entertaining soldiers in 1917, Ibsen's Peer Gyntishness, Marco Polo, Forster's own century, or life as a game of chess; it doesn't matter when the essay was written, 1903 or 1935—they are all beautifully written.

It doesn't even matter much what he says, or at least it doesn't seem to, or at least it wouldn't be well-mannered to notice if it did. Forster is so civilized. He is so very much at ease. He doesn't at all want to sound important and imposing. He knows that the reader knows he is writing an essay. And the essay form seems to suit him as if it were made for him. He finds most congenial the easy relationship which the writer of the informal essay must establish with the reader. (The pleasure in the form is the pleasure in the relationship.) Of the reader's requirements, of his personality almost, he is always aware; in fact, he takes the relationship so firmly for granted that one feels he counts on the reader's understanding, passing over with a friendly smile if need be those tricks and trivialities of his own or of anyone's personality which he finds himself admiring or deprecating, and which he entertains the reader by presenting. And that's the wisdom of his being civilized. For behind the easy manner there lies the hard fact—and Forster's tacit recognition of it as the only way to get along—that the essay form has a way of its own of pointing up the trivial and the merely personal. But to recognize the danger is not always to avoid it, even if it is welcomed as a friend. There are the writer's limitations, too, to be considered. In many of the essays the merely personal, at times the over-concern with the manner in which something is said rather than with what is said, comes out transposed into the slightly arch accents—not the fault of the form—of My Wood. Usually the archness is heard when he is poking fun at himself or at others, as if to prove that, despite the way in which he and others may differ from or resemble the always visible norm of behavior, both are human. There may be neither wit nor laughter in the pages of Punch, as Forster says, but even with wit and laughter it's still Punch.

For all Forster's pliant handling of the essay form it makes one demand he does not often fulfil: the ability of the essayist to relate his sensibility to whatever he is writing about without turning it into a mere reflection of that sensibility. As cleverly and amusingly as he writes of Voltaire and Mme du Châtelet ("Madame du Châtelet was certainly a most remarkable creature—tiresome, but not too tiresome, and therefore an ideal mate for a very tiresome man"), the result is trivial, since he drowns the pair in his own lighter element. They serve simply as his "subject," as the young Coleridge does, or Keats's guardians, the Abbays, or Gemistus Pletho.

Forster's own limitations are also evident in his views on general, impersonal questions, about which he either refuses to generalize or declines to judge on the ground of "no one can know"—that, despite the honesty of: "I am actually what my age and upbringing have made me—a bourgeois who adheres to the British constitution, adheres to it rather than supports it, and the fact that this isn't dignified doesn't worry me." Writing in 1922 about the new nationalism of India, after his second visit there, he says: "Would that I could conclude with a eulogy of it! But that must be left to writers who can see into the future and who know in what human happiness consists."

But the best essays are another matter. In the essays on Howard Overing Sturgis, for instance, or in the one on Proust, his subjects are so sympathetic that he feels no need to "humanize" or "normalize" them. The well-known Notes on the English Character, written in 1920, and the best in the collection, is still applicable knowledge. In this analysis of the English character—really a gloss on the characters in his novels—the barrier between the personal and the impersonal disappears, and all the positive virtues of his age and upbringing unite to serve him in what is almost a meeting of process and product. The personal recollections and reconstructions of his Clapham Sect forbears are also delightful, as is the novelized series called Adrift in India. Besides, there is always Forster's wit. My favorite instance is this penetrating remark about the undeservedly ignored Minnie Mouse: "To be approached so often by Mickey, and always for the first time, must make any mouse mechanical."

"Abinger Harvest" is not, of course, important alongside the novels. But I do suggest that the basic limitations of

"Abinger Harvest" are general. In the essay on T. S. Eliot (1928) Forster tells of his discovery during the First World War of Eliot's first poems: "Here was a protest, and a feeble one, and the more congenial for being feeble. For what, in that world of gigantic horror, was tolerable except the slighter gestures of dissent?" The slighter gestures of dissent—yes, fine. But beyond them? "It is just a personal comment on the universe," Forster says of "The Waste Land," "as individual and as isolated as Shelley's 'Prometheus.'"

The larger gestures, he would appear to say throughout his work, are impossible; if not impossible, useless, nothing one can live with, recognized and recognizable. Yet what about Forster's interest in the East? Do his larger gestures lie there? I think not. His interest in India and in Indian philosophy and religion is part and parcel of his personal limitations; it confirms them. Ideas are delusory and the larger gesture is negated, destroyed. "God is love" of "A Passage to India" becomes "God si love"; the answer to everything (not only in the Marabar Caves) is "Boum." The great negations of our time are common property; they also appear in "The Waste Land," and in Yeats's "The best lack all conviction, while the worst/ Are full of passionate intensity"—but not as the slighter gestures of dissent.

Now that the popularity of E. M. Forster's novels has reached the stage of a cult, which in turn has mustered the inevitable sturdy squadron of unbelievers, it is time to evaluate his work on the solid basis of its positive merits, not by the attribution to it of qualities Forster neither possesses nor desires to possess. By saying that Forster is limited, that his sensibility is limited, that his general intellectual scope is in no way extraordinary, I am not trying to belittle his work. Nor am I trying to belittle the "slighter gestures." They are the greatness of his novels; they explain the comfort his readers find in them as reader and character meet their common fate, the fate of middle-class individualism. Forster, as he himself says, is the product of the oldest middle class in Europe. And the impasse of that class is his impasse and that of his characters; its limitations are his limitations.

The novels present the great negations, the "lostness," of the upper middle class: the "undeveloped heart," the fundamental despair of human relationships, the separateness of the individual life, the inherited dreariness, the helplessness; and the courageous but impossible attempts to deny, even to understand, the negations, brave fluttering flights clearing the tops of the Victorian cannons, but leaving nothing in their wake save the poetry of the forced descent and the acceptance of it—and the altered consciousness of the flier. The vitality of his characters is as great as that and as small. Their depth is too often the depth of a pinprick: there is little breadth to the depth. And there are great expanses, expanses broad and deep, into which they do not enter, which they scarcely recognize in their self-constricted, untranscendable small worlds.

Challenge of the Far East

DANGER FROM THE EAST. By Richard E. Lauterbach. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

IF THE Marshall Plan for Europe succeeds as we hope, it may shift the center of Russo-American friction to Asia. The United States' post-war hegemony in most of the Far East has thus far gone unchallenged; if Russia is checked in Western Europe, it may be stimulated to challenge us more directly in Asia.

In any case, success of Marshall Plan aid to Europe will raise the question of similar aid in the Far East. Many may assume that a formula which works for France or Italy should work for China, that Japan is a Far Eastern Germany and South Korea a Far Eastern Greece. The more positively the Marshall Plan succeeds in Europe, the greater will be the danger of our trying to apply it uncritically to Asia.

Such a direct transposition, to the underskilled and overpopulated Far East, of formulas and programs developed for the highly industrialized area of Europe would be economically impractical. Certainly it would be politically unrealistic. The authoritarian tradition of Asiatic government is a far cry from the libertarian and constitutional processes of the Atlantic community.

For this reason Richard Lauterbach

The Little Volumes Are Important . . .

IN A RECENT article in The New York Times, "The Literary Market Place Today," by Harvey Breit, the writer quotes a distinguished publisher: "... We used to break even on a sale of 5,000 copies. Now ... we need 10,000 copies. The result? We're shopping for sure-fire stuff. ... And that means that we simply haven't got room ... for the little volume of verse, or the first novel that we used to publish. ... And so," concludes Mr. Breit, "... publishers' lists are growing smaller, tighter. More big novels, fewer critical essays ... fewer scholarly studies."

WE THINK the little volume of verse, the first novel, the scholarly study, the critical essay are important. We can bring them to the discerning reader. Our books, generally published on a cooperative basis, are produced at comparatively low cost. Because of this, even so limited a sale as 600 copies of, for example, a 64-page book of verse will yield a profit to the author over and above investment.

new book, "Danger from the East," could hardly be more timely. It is a careful and courageous dissection of our successes and failures in post-war Japan, Korea, and China. More squarely than anyone has yet done, Lauterbach poses our problem: if in our cold war we choose to fight Russia in Asia by backing reaction, we court disaster. The peoples of the Far East are over-ready for change. Our only security lies in helping and guiding, not in opposing, the social revolution which is overtaking the backward East.

This we undoubtedly tried to do. Our post-surrender directive for MacArthur in Japan, our policy statement of December 15, 1945, which inaugurated Marshall's mediation in China, were broadly conceived and vigorously democratic documents. Yet our efforts to carry them out have succeeded only in part. What went wrong? Have our failures been due to unforeseen contingencies, bad luck, or Russian machinations? Or does one cause of our trouble lie within us, in our assumptions and our fears? What must we learn from our post-war programs in Asia if we are to profit by our mistakes before it is too late?

"Danger from the East" tells a fascinating story and offers one observer's keen and critical comments on it. It is a fast-moving narrative, analytical yet colorful and full of incident, written with all the neat phrasing and telling personal detail to be expected of a former Life correspondent. (The author is now editor of the magazine '47. It is some satisfaction that the same far-flung domain which insidiously sets its weekly line for 26,000,000 bedazzled readers has given us another rebate, in the antithetical work of a former staff member.) Lauterbach conveys the look and feel of flattened Tokyo and inflated Shanghai, gives us sketches of the great Hirohito, MacArthur, Chiang) and the small Japanese farmers, soldiers in Manchuria, patriots in Korea); but underneath this running account he presents a substantial study of the various aspects of the occupation in Japan, summarizes our problems in Korea, and offers one of the first connected narratives to become available on the Marshall mediation in China. In an appendix is an excellent selection of key documents—Cairo, Yalta, Potsdam, Moscow, the Initial Post-Surrender Policy for Japan, Truman (before) and Marshall (after) on China. Successive chapters on Japan deal with the position of the Emperor ("from God to Man"), the position of MacArthur ("from Man to God"), the constitution, education, the political parties, problems of the Zaibatsu, the land, and the labor unions, and the Russian-American antagonism. The section on Korea is briefer (68 pages). That on China (120 pages) deals with the year of Marshall ("the God of Peace") and includes a first-hand story of a truce team at work in "Operation Dove" in Manchuria.

Within this framework of narrative and topic, "Danger from the East" develops several major themes: that our success in Japan, though greater than many anticipated, is not as real as it seems, that the old politicians still rule, the new constitution is ahead of the facts, industrial monopoly and landlordism are by no means dead or even weak, and Japan's post-war revolution still has far to go. In Korea our military government ("the Liberator's Conquest"), unprepared and uninstructed from the first, inadequately staffed and meagerly supported throughout, has made egregious economic and political errors. In China, while urging coalition government, we undercut our own mediation by continued military support of one side in the civil struggle.

From this comparison of American activity in three separate areas one factor in our policy emerges time after time—our fear that social revolution is the ally of Russia. Writing long before Mr. Byrnes, speaking frankly, told us of the hardening process which our policy underwent in the spring of 1946, Lauterbach as an on-the-scene observer notes the apparent repercussions: "The sudden mushrooming of the left gave MacArthur a bad scare. . . . When the trend in United States domestic and foreign policies veered sharply right, MacArthur stopped giving lip service to the progressive directive given him at the beginning of the occupation." In such measures as its support of the old-guard Yoshida government, SCAP really "declared for the status quo in Japan, dressed up with democratic furbelows." In the same period the Soviet-American Commission in Korea was reaching a stalemate, with AMG fearful of the left and often ready to suppress it, and the hope of coalition government in China was being thwarted while American aid to Chiang continued.

This record of frustration suggests that our American democratic values must somehow be applied to Asia more creatively, not through an "interpreter's government" as in Korea or through the local vested interests in China and Japan. In revolutionary Asia today we will find strength on the left of center rather than the right. Two things endanger us—Russian or Communist organization of a Marxist left; our own fear of Russia, Marxism, and revolution. The first we cannot eliminate, but the second danger is within us. It has already worked against us, for when our military men think in military terms they soon have us backing the right. As Lauterbach puts it, "the inherent danger of America's present position in Asia, if not in the whole world, is that we may force people to make a choice—which they do not want to make—between the American way and the Soviet way. It is dangerous to us because our way will be represented to the people of Asia by the Chiangs, the Yoshidas, and the Syngman Rhee whom we have at some time supported and befriended."

Our view of Asia today is partly a study in the psychology of fear. "Danger from the East" documents the theme that the scared men in the Kremlin have no monopoly on the thought process by which suspicion of an assumed enemy becomes the source of mistakes in power politics. If we are to build for long-term stability in Asia and not solely for short-term strategic advantage, we must support social change—but this can be done only on Asia's terms, not ours. This brings us up against the fact that some features of Marxism seem to offer more social results, among Asia's peasant masses, than our American way of life when mediated, distorted, and prostituted through Asiatic ruling classes in China or Japan. We cannot hope for eventual security in Asia unless and until we face this problem frankly. As we become daily more awake to the stark danger which Communist totalitarianism offers to our liberal individualist tradition, it is more than ever necessary to keep our perspective on Asia's actual needs and our own American emotions.

Mr. Lauterbach has performed a signal service in marshaling and evaluating the criticisms of our post-war programs in the Far East. As far as the rather scanty evidence permits, he indicates the Russian, or Japanese leftist, or Chinese Communist sides of the picture. But his main focus is on what our administrators and diplomats have done, how, and why. Some of his strictures may not be sustained by future historians, but most of them have been affirmed by other observers, whom Lauterbach quotes with care. The result is the most challenging survey of our Far Eastern hegemony that has yet appeared.

You can try this book on your friends. If they complain that it spends little time berating Russians and Communists, they illustrate Lauterbach's point. Our recent power in the Far East has given us great and golden opportunities to assume the lead of new social forces there. On the whole, we have not succeeded. If Russian-American tension increases there, our opportunities may diminish. We must study our record critically.

ACROSS THE WIDE MISSOURI. By Bernard DeVoto. With an Account of the Discovery of the Miller Collection by Mae Reed Porter. Houghton Mifflin Company. $10.

HERE, splendidly told and splendidly illustrated by contemporary painters, is the story of the mountain men, the fur-trappers and traders who filtered through the vast region along the upper Missouri and the Rockies beyond, exploring it and preparing the way for the settlers who made the United States a continental nation. This story flows out of Mr. DeVoto's deep interest in the opening of his native West—an interest already reflected in his "Mark Twain's America" and "The Year of Decision"—and so it commands not only all his thoroughness as a historian but also all his enthusiasm and skill as a writer.

"Across the Wide Missouri" covers the years 1832-38, which saw the climax and rapid decline of the fur trade—a trade chiefly in beaver pelts to be made into felt for Eastern and European hatters. It is an account of the ruthless effort of Astor's American Fur Company—the trust—to monopolize the trade. Pierre Chouteau, Jr., Astor's St. Louis partner and generalissimo in this war, minced no words about this objective. His standing order was, Ecraser toute opposition. And opposition there was—from the Rocky Mountain Fur Company of St. Louis, whose men were better acquainted with the mountains than were the employees of the trust, and from lesser partnerships and such adventurers as Nathaniel Wyeth, the Cambridge business man. The trust won in the end, but by the time it did there were few beavers left and almost no demand for their pelts.

These few years covered a wide canvass. To fill in its rich details Mr. DeVoto has organized his story along the lines of trips made into the West with mountain men by two European veterans of the Napoleonic wars. One was Captain William Drummond Stewart, who took with him the Baltimore artist, Alfred Jacob Miller, so that his castle in Scotland might be filled with pictures of the land in which he had adventured. The other was Maximilian, Prince of Wied-Neuwied, full of scientific curiosity and eager for specimens of every variety. The prince, too, was accompanied by a painter, Charles Bodmer. There are ninety-six pages of reproductions of the sketches by these artists and by George Caulin—thirty-two pages in full color—to round out the story. They are faithful pictorial reportage of the utmost historical interest.

Stewart went with the Rocky Mountain Fur Company brigades overland to the Platte, the Sweetwater, and South Pass in Wyoming. Maximilian boarded the Astor company's steamer Yellowstone for its struggle up the river from St. Louis to the big company post, Fort Union. The trust sought to do most of its business at such permanent locations; the opposition, however, pressed more deeply into the mountain country, holding a periodic trading rendezvous from which it sent furs back to St. Louis by pack train. But in this struggle there was no stubborn adherence to a set pattern. There was always a race to be first on the scene. No device—whether it was ruinously outbidding a rival or stirring up Indians against him—was left untried. Shrewdest of all under these circumstances probably was the St. Louis firm of Sublette and Campbell, which early confined itself to purveying and transport. But after its original owners sold out, it was soon absorbed by the monopolists.

It was a versatile crew that played out this game in the wilderness—Jim Bridger, Tom Fitzpatrick, Joe Walker, Vasques, the Sublettes, Joe Meek, Bonneville—on leave from the army and probably under orders to spy on the British in Oregon—and others to whose names Mr. DeVoto gives the prominence they deserve in American history. These men were amazingly adapted to a horse-and-buffalo economy. They were expert explorers and astute diplomats in dealing with the Indians—the Sioux, Pawnees, Cheyennes, Flatheads, Gros Ventres, Blackfeet, Nez Percés. They were hardy roisterers and above all men who found deep satisfaction in their rugged way of life. It is well that they were infatuated with plain and mountain, for, with the exception of the "free traders," they were forever in debt to their employers, and their ultimate reward usually was bankruptcy.

The backers of the trade, however, accumulated princely fortunes, and no wonder. They generally marked up prices about 2,000 per cent. They sold coarse cloth for $10 a yard and fine cloth for $20, although domestic calicoes were worth only 14 cents a yard in St. Louis, and French calicoes from 20 to 35 cents. In St. Louis coffee brought 15 cents a pound wholesale, sugar 9 cents, and flour 2 cents. All three were sold at a rendezvous for $2 a pound. Whiskey was forbidden by the government, but it was a leading item in the trade. The stuff sold was no more than raw alcohol diluted with river water. Alcohol was worth 15 cents a gallon in St. Louis, but firewater brought several dollars a pint in the West—and the more a man bought the thinner it was likely to be. Except when the trust wanted to keep furs out of the opposition's hands at all costs, this pricing policy was reversed when it came to buying the trappers' pelts.

The rendezvous, however, was—as Mr. DeVoto calls it—a Paul Bunyan's fair. The mountain men sauntered between booths full of tempting merchandise. Whole villages of garishly bedizened Indians arrived like so many sections of a circus parade. They as well as the trappers and traders engaged in noisy feats of skill. There was gambling all over the place, the Indians, men and women, being fantastically addicted to it. And whiskey. And squaws. And fights. And the trapper would remember not always in time that he needed an outfit for the next year—a horse, clothing, powder, lead, traps, tobacco, beads, scalpings, and other trading items.

Whatever his economic fate, the mountain man was not pathetic. Joe Walker led a party across the last mountain range into warm and opulent California. The men were welcomed by the mission friars and the señoritas. Their tables were set with the lush abundance of that sunny land. They were offered high pay for their skill in carpentry and other crafts. Yet after a few months of luxury the men turned their backs on it and headed again into the Rockies. Perhaps they had a sense of destiny. Perhaps they realized that they had to put an end to all the silly Eastern talk about wild deserts, salt mountains, and Welsh Indians. Perhaps they knew what role they were playing. But they must have had a doubt or two when they saw the ravages of cholera and smallpox, the Indians dying and changing, the fur trade so depressed that they had to hire out as guides to quarreling missionaries on the Oregon Trail.

Still, the story of the life and times of the mountain men is romantic, thrilling, and important. It should live long in this book which Mr. DeVoto has written with such obvious gusto.

THE UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA. By Vera Micheles Dean. Harvard University Press. $3.

THIS handy and readable volume in the series The American Foreign Policy Library provides up-to-date material for understanding Russia and Soviet policies. There are tables on Russo-American trade, a bibliography, and an index.

The link with the United States in the title is demonstrated more by way of parallels than by analysis of relations between the two. I miss the significant parallel between the slow and reluctant emergence of the United States from an isolationist position in regard to international administrative unions and the reluctance of the Soviet government to participate in what we now call specialized agencies of the United Nations.

The book describes Soviet planning along familiar lines. An elaboration of the inflation theme, mentioned on page 119 but not in the index, would have added interest and realism. If the bibliography had included periodical articles, serious references on the subject would not be wanting.

Mrs. Dean is diligent in seeking constructive elements in Soviet foreign policy. Useful as this may be for purposes of sympathetic exposition, nobody will be pleased by the remark on pages 205-06 that "Russia itself invaded Finland in 1939 on the ground that that country was to have served as a base for German attack on Russian territory." A broader approach in her chapter on The Atom Bomb and the Veto would have brought to light areas of agreement between ourselves and the Soviet delegation—for instance, on a working definition of aggression as conceded in the Soviet recommendations of February 18 last. Concentrating on the veto angle, Mrs. Dean misses an implicit answer to her plea at the end for "some adjustment, if not reconciliation, between two rival economic systems."

Drama Note

REVIVED after nineteen years, St. John Irvine's "The First Mrs. Fraser" (Shubert Theater) makes a pleasant enough little play which serves as an occasion for Jane Cowl to give a characteristic performance. Two decades is not, however, quite long enough to mature even a period piece, much less a classic, and I have serious doubts whether this particular play will ever be either. In its own day its special tone of half-moralistic, half bantering concern with the problem of multiple divorce no doubt seemed just right, but in order to last, the play should have been either less serious or more so. In 1947 it seems neither especially funny nor especially searching. Henry Daniell does very well a difficult job with the humorless Scotch hero, but the more convincingly he plays, the harder it is to believe that Miss Cowl would want him back or to consider the fact that she gets him a happy ending. He seems to be one of those exasperatingly solemn egotists whom only a Barry heroine could love, and that is perhaps the reason why his wife is, indeed, a bit Barryish. Frances Tannehill does very nicely as a particularly unlikable representative of what was the younger generation during the late twenties, and Reginald Mason gives one of his characteristically suave performances as a bachelor who has spent most of his life unsuccessfully proposing to Mrs. Fraser whenever she was not married to the first and only Mr.

raphy for "Dances Concertantes," which was like the additional line of counterpoint that completes a musical texture and gives it the significance it lacked without such completion: when I heard another work I heard it with what such a Balanchine counterpoint would have imparted to it. Another factor was the score of "Le Baiser de la fée," which, even without what Balanchine imparted to it, had seemed to me years ago to be an unusually beautiful result of Stravinsky's manipulation of materials borrowed from other composers: now I was struck not only by the beauty of what Stravinsky contrived with Tchaikovsky's materials, but with its direct expressiveness, something almost unique in Stravinsky's music, which I could recall in only one other work, "The Firebird"; and I was fascinated by the way the beautiful and expressive details were contrived—which is to say by the operation of Stravinsky's mind. It was this operation of his mind that I began to be aware of, interested, fascinated, and amused by, in the ostinato figures and rhythms, the perverse accents, the distorted melodies, the strident harmonies and sonorities in "Dances Concertantes," the Symphony in Three Movements, and now the Dumbarton Oaks Concerto recorded by Stravinsky with a chamber orchestra headed by Alexander Schneider for Keynote (Set DM-1; $3.85, on vinylite). That mind is evident in the powerfully controlled performance, the sound of which on the records is spaced out, clear, hard, and bright, except on side 3, where it is made fuzzy by the bad surface (a second copy had noisy surfaces throughout).

On a single record (K-2003; $1.75, on vinylite) Keynote offers Vivaldi's beautiful Concerto Grosso in D minor in its original form, for two solo violins and solo cello and a small group of strings. The performance led by Alexander Schneider—with Schneider, Eddie Bachman, and Bernard Greenhouse as the solo group—is very fine, except that the Largo is played Andantino, presumably to get the work on one record. Its recorded sound is spaced out and clear, but not natural and pleasant.

It may be that some day I will have the same experience with Bartok's music as I have had with Stravinsky's; but it hasn't happened yet, and my mind still cannot follow where his goes in his major works. But the piano pieces in Vox's memorial album (Set 625; $5.25, on vinylite)—"Bear Dance," "Evening in Transylvania," and fifteen pieces from the collection "For Children"—all derived from Hungarian folk music, are intelligible, and sometimes engaging, but sometimes too burdened with the modernism of the arrangement. The records, processed from the recording of a broadcast by Bartok himself, reproduce his performances with clarity and good sound; their surfaces are not entirely quiet.

Beethoven's Great Fugue Opus 133, his original conclusion for the Quartet Opus 130, is a work in which also my mind cannot always follow where Beethoven's goes, but in which there are some wonderful moments. Musicraft has issued an excellent and well-reproduced performance by the Kroll Quartet (Set 73; $2.85); but the records sent to me are very noisy and badly warped.

Musicraft also offers the fine A Minor Violin Concerto of Bach, played by Roman Totenberg with a small group of strings (Set 78; $2.85). The ensemble performance is very good; and so is Totenberg's own playing in it, even with its occasional defects of tone. The recorded sound is a little coarse with the Astatic QT-J pickup, but quite good with the Brush PL-20; and the surfaces again are very noisy.

And another Musicraft set (84; $3.85) offers harpsichord music—Rameau's charming "La Poule" and a not especially interesting Gavotte and Variations from his Suite in A Minor, Couperin's charming "Le Tic-toc-choc" and the occasionally engaging "Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Ménestrandise"—played by Sylvia Marlowe. Miss Marlowe doesn't pound her instrument as she did in the Scarlatti set; but that means her playing is stodgy and dull. The records again are very noisy; and one is so badly warped that the QT-J cannot track—which the PL-20 manages to do.

The more normal Marlowe hammered-out spectacular sonority and nervous excitement in full blast spoil what should have been an outstanding set: the Gramophone Shop's of eight Suites of Purcell ($11.50, on-vinylite).

•Leonard Bernstein's music for Jerome Robbins's "Facsimile," which he has recorded for RCA Victor (Set 1142; $3), is not worth listening to apart from the ballet. The performance is well reproduced; surfaces are noisy with the QT-J, but not with the PL-20.

The Brazilian piano music recorded by Novas for Columbia (Set 692; $3.75) is a series of little and light pieces—arrangements of folk-songs by Villa-Lobos, Pinto's "Memories of Childhood," a Toccata by Guarneri—which get to be tiresome. Her performances are charming and are well reproduced.

The performance of Bach's Suite No. 2 for flute and strings that Reiner has recorded with the Pittsburgh Symphony for Columbia (Set 695; $4.60) is a sonorous large-orchestra performance, and a fairly good one of that kind, but without the sensitive inflection and inner animation of texture of the old Busch Chamber Players performance that the work calls for. The recorded sound is good, except for a slight sharpness of the violins, which is more pronounced with the QT-J.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Semantics and Revolution

Dear Sirs: I think that Nation readers, to whom democratic concepts of political justice presumably are not mere exercises in semantics, should expect a much more forthright treatise on Political Justice in Eastern Europe than appeared in the October 11 issue. It seems to me that Freda Kirchwey's muted alarm over "the mounting attacks on non-Communist leftists" in Soviet-dominated Balkan and Danube countries is little more than a whisper of the outraged protests The Nation should voice against police states which murder men for expressing pro-democratic sentiments.

Miss Kirchwey says she is unconvinced that such people as Nikola Petkov deserve to be shot, but she would welcome any "evidence" to the contrary, however post mortem. Meanwhile she points out that "Communists strongly advocate 'unity' among the left forces," and she accepts "as valid therapy the purge of those men who would, if they could, undo the revolution." In my book, at least, her "revolution" is the revolting process by which totalitarian governments by terror have been imposed on much of Eastern Europe.

WILBUR H. BALDINGER

Washington, November 20

[It would be comfortable to simplify events in Eastern Europe as Mr. Baldinger has done; to dispose of a complex social-political upheaval—following a struggle which was at once international war, civil war, and revolution—in a pigeonhole labeled "revolting process." Comfortable but not very sensible. In fact I would think that only a person insulated from contemporary events and unacquainted with history could so easily ignore the realities of the revolutionary conflict now in progress in many parts of the world.

I am not going to waste space correcting Mr. Baldinger's curious distortion of my point of view. Interested readers can refer to the original editorial if they still have it. But I would suggest that Mr. Baldinger, before finally dismissing as "exercises in semantics" views more "muted" than his own, take time off to read a good history of the French Revolution and perhaps one or two objective studies of the background of the struggle in Eastern Europe, Seton-Watson's "Eastern Europe Between the Wars, 1918-1941," for example. He might even read Rustem Vambery's "Hungary—To Be or Not to Be" for the context of recent events in that country.

The Philadelphia Outrage

Dear Sirs: On November 1 I went to hear some speakers in Independence Square, Philadelphia. The meeting was sponsored by the Progressive Citizens of America, a group with which I am not affiliated. As I stood there waiting for the speaking to start it became evident that there were elements present who intended to break up the meeting. When the speaking began the din grew louder—so that the speakers could scarcely be heard. Lines of men forced their way through the crowd. One of them stepped on my foot and another hit me a sharp blow in the ribs with his elbow.

One of the speakers was former United States Attorney Francis Fisher Kane, a man eighty-one years old, known to many Philadelphians as a loved and respected citizen. As he stood at the microphone he was pelted with pennies and other missiles. One of the missiles broke the glasses of another man on the platform, and I learned later that the Wills Eye Hospital removed a piece of glass from his eye.

A man behind me said in a voice choked with emotion, "I was in Germany when the Nazis rose to power. I never thought it could happen here—but this is it!" A sweet-faced, neatly dressed, elderly lady beside me was sure that Communists were breaking up the meeting—she had heard that Communists did such dreadful things.

But it soon became evident that the disturbers of the peace were quite a different group. The Order of the Purple Heart announced itself, and the American Legion insignia were in evidence on a large piece of noise-making apparatus.

Apparently there are some people who do not realize that when they destroy free speech for someone else they destroy it for themselves also, who do not realize that when they destroy free speech they destroy democracy as well. Why couldn't the groups that disagreed with the Progressive Citizens of America have used democratic methods? Why couldn't they have said, "We will allow this meeting to proceed, but next Saturday we will hold a meeting in Independence Square and tell our side of the story."

Even if the American Legion and the Order of the Purple Heart apparently have no respect for our Constitution, some of us plain citizens have, and we are outraged by this demonstration against free speech.

The Shape of Things

PROCEEDINGS DURING THE FIRST WEEK OF the London conference provided little reason for revising the gloomy estimate of its success that we gave in our last issue. True, the Foreign Ministers managed to agree on an agenda—a task that had defeated their deputies—but in the discussion of basic issues there seemed to be no meeting of minds. The chief matter in dispute has been the form and scope of a provisional German government. All four powers—France, with many reservations—favor a politically and economically unified Germany, but at that point agreement ends. The United States, Britain, and France want a loose federation with large powers left to the constituent states; Russia, a strong centralized government. Both sides, of course, are concerned about the way in which the balance of power will be tilted by the new Germany. Russia fears that our aim is to build up the Reich as an American bastion in Central Europe; we dread a Communist Germany allied to the U.S.S.R. Since, unfortunately, neither fear can be dismissed as absurd, it would seem that Russia and the United States can hardly hope to make a joint peace with a unified Germany until they end their "cold war." The strong probability of stalemate in the present conference has been underlined by Molotov's demand that America and Britain renounce all thought of making a separate peace with a truncated Germany. Naturally, Marshall and Bevin have refused to commit themselves on this point. There is good reason to suppose that they are not anxious to play this trump card of dubious value, but at the present stage of the game they cannot afford to throw it away.

THE BRITISH LABOR GOVERNMENT, WHICH has suffered some hard knocks lately, has good cause to be jubilant at the victory of its candidate, Sir Richard Acland, at the Gravesend parliamentary by-election. In the recent municipal elections, as Aylmer Vallance reminds us in his article on page 617, the Tories exploited popular discontent over "enforced austerity" with very gratifying results from their point of view. Their successes, they claimed, showed that the tide had turned against the Labor Party, and they looked to Gravesend to provide a clinching proof. They had some reason to be optimistic. Gravesend is not a typical industrial constituency; it is a mixed urban, suburban and rural district at the mouth of the Thames, with large farming and middle-class elements to balance a considerable population of longshoremen and factory workers. At the general election in 1945, when Labor ousted a Tory who had held the seat firmly for twenty-one years, a Liberal had intervened, polling 5,000 votes. This time, there was a straight fight, and the Tories confidently expected most of the Liberal votes to go to their candidate. Another point in their favor was that the election was called just after the inauguration of potato rationing, an unpopular if necessary measure. The Tories made much of this issue, even though they could not explain how or why the Labor government had created last summer's drought which caused the potato shortage. It was, they tried to suggest, just another example of bad Labor planning, and they extolled, with Winston Churchill, "the marvelous results of sweeping away controls" in the United States. At this point, President Truman unwittingly provided Acland with a powerful counter-argument by his request to Congress to reimpose controls and rationing. That seems to have been the turning point in a ding-dong battle which Labor won with a reduced but handy majority.

BOSTON IS A CITY THAT BLANCHES AT A naughty word in type and keeps a convicted crook for its Mayor. Normally, we would not be too exercised over a commutation of sentence that freed a seventy-two-year-old man a month before his eligibility for parole, and we would not even be vindictive in the case of the Honorable James M. Curley if his release were not enveloped in a cloud of dubious politics. It is not every prisoner who has the minority whip of the House of Representatives circulating petitions in his behalf. Still fewer have a champion in the Cabinet, as Curley did in the person of Robert Hannegan, recently resigned. And no jailbird we ever heard of had the mayoralty of a great city held open for him while he served his time. By commuting Curley's sentence after five months, President Truman not only assured the venerable Mayor of a Thanksgiving dinner at home, a touching sentiment in itself, but left intact his civil rights. Cynical Republicans, with an eye on Curley's usefulness to his party in 1948, may puff up in righteous wrath, as some already have done, but their indignation cannot be pushed far without coming up against the strange behavior of their own party colleagues in Massachusetts. After all, it was a Republican legislature that, in ninety minutes, rushed through the so-called "Curley law," whereby the city clerk of Boston was made temporary mayor until the moment the convict, specifically named in the legislation, should again set foot in City Hall. And it was Republican Governor Bradford who signed the bill, presumably out of gratitude to Curley for making him governor by quietly knifing his own party's candidate a year ago. Curley was greeted outside his home by a band playing "Hail to the Chief," but the country has still to hear an outcry from those forces of piety in Boston to whom mail fraud apparently is the merest peccadillo beside the monstrous sin of birth control.

THE MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY'S BOAST that it has not produced anything un-American was blown to pieces when its "leaders," meeting in New York, announced to the world that they were firing the ten men cited for contempt of Congress for refusing to answer the questions of J. Parnell Thomas's egregious committee. There is good reason for taking into account the political beliefs of people employed in the policy-making departments of government; but when private industry begins to fire people for their suspected sympathy with, or membership in, a political group which is, after all, a legal party, every individual is laid open to an attack upon his right and his opportunity to work—and to think as he pleases. The actions of the House Committee on Un-American Activities have been outrageous enough; complete subservience to its whims by the heads of Hollywood is even more so. Those heads have always touched their heels, as it were, leaning over backward to conform to the mores of morons, as laid down in the Hays code. But this time, their antics are not merely ridiculous; they are also dangerous. A court test is very much in order, and we hope it will be pressed. For the defendants are not just those few fellow-travelers who have the means to fight back and who don't mind being martyrs anyway, but everyone who does not hold the thoroughly un-American view that all's right with the world.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN, IN HIS MESSAGE TO Congress on November 17, asked that "some restraint should be placed on inflationary bank credit." In this generalized form, the request seemed one of the least controversial in the Presidential program, and even Senator Taft indicated willingness to support it. However, if Congress gets down to brass tacks on the subject, it is likely to find that "restraint of credit" can create just as much heat as price control. That fact has been made clear by the loud protests of the banking community against a plan offered last week to the House Banking and Currency Committee by Federal Reserve Chairman Marriner Eccles. Mr. Eccles suggested that the Federal Reserve Board be given new powers to require all banks to hold special additional reserves of cash or short-term government securities. He proposed a maximum of 25 per cent against demand deposits and 10 per cent against time deposits, which, combined with existing requirements, could mean that banks would be obliged to keep in reserve 39 to 51 per cent of their time deposits, the actual ratio varying with location. This would increase the influence of the Reserve System on the money market and serve to constrict the banks' ability to make commercial loans, which have been expanding at a phenomenal rate in recent months. We can see certain technical objections to his plan, but, since maximum legal reserves have previously been moved up and down by Congress, there does not seem to be anything startlingly revolutionary about it. Nevertheless, the bankers view Mr. Eccles's idea as nothing less than "a step toward socialization of banking," and they obviously are prepared to fight it tooth and nail. Their chances of successful resistance are good, since Administration councils are divided, with Secretary of the Treasury Snyder taking his stand with his former banking associates.

The Meyers Crackdown

THE sudden ferocity with which his former comrades in top echelons of the armed services have turned on Major General Bennett E. Meyers (retired) must be a shattering blow to even so cynical a character as "Benny." Without the formality of civil trial or court martial, he has been denied further disability pension, stripped of his medals, and branded a "disgrace to the uniform" by his war-time commander. The self-portrait which the kiss-and-tell general painted in his curious "defense" before the Senate War Investigating Committee will still any protests which this summary crackdown might arouse among civil libertarians. Yet the haste and hysteria displayed are somewhat disturbing for other reasons.

General Meyers's version of his relations with Mrs. Lamarre and the resulting complexities will be weighed in the courts. On the record so far, we are inclined to agree with Senator Ferguson that the General's explanation is even more damaging than the charges against him; that if, in actuality, he promoted the Aviation Electric Corporation in order to retain the favor of the lady—and her husband—he was using government contracts to subsidize his sex life. This is not usually considered conduct becoming a model major general. Mrs. Lamarre, in turn, accuses Meyers of rank boastfulness and insists he steadfastly pursued profit, not pleasure. This narrow dispute has undoubtedly buried some significant disclosures about the war-time A. A. F. But even so, the current military offensive against Meyers takes on a rather hollow sound when the following items are considered:

1. In the summer of 1945, an anonymous member of the Air Forces wrote a letter to the FBI offering plain clues to Meyers's "profiteering." It was promptly transmitted to the A. A. F., whose Major General Junius Jones, Air Inspector, has admitted that the charges were never investigated. With notable arrogance, he said he still thought it read like the work of a "reformer" and "crackpot," and he deplored the failure of the author to sign his name. On further questioning, it developed that General Jones is the author of a manual stressing the need for investigation of leads in all anonymous letters.

2. The letter was routed—inexplicably—to the office of General H. H. Arnold, war-time A. A. F. chief, where it gathered dust. Arnold had meanwhile sent a questionnaire to top procurement officers asking them to list their stockholdings. He assured them no "investigation" was contemplated; he wanted the material as the basis for a "public-relations" campaign to refute ugly "rumors" about the procurement setup. When General Jones was asked why no effort was made to look behind the replies, he said the Air Forces had no power to "force" an officer to divulge his financial records.

3. General Arnold, in his angry public condemnation of Meyers, confessed that the errant general had discussed speculation in government bonds with him in 1943. Yet the discussion apparently stirred no suspicions about the scope of Meyers's extra-curricular activities; Arnold simply declined to join in the deal.

4. Colonel John W. Price acknowledged that he wrote a memorandum earlier this year recommending that the Air Forces, having pigeonholed the anonymous letter, withhold it from the Senate probers. It was only by accident that the document fell into the committee's hands. General Jones thereupon announced that, "for reasons independent of this investigation," Colonel Price would be transferred to another post. Will General Jones get a medal?

General Arnold and Mr. Symington now express confidence that General Meyers was "just one rotten apple" in a big barrel. We are also told that a new day in procurement is at hand and that the unified services will prevent a repetition of these "errors." The reorganization referred to will be welcome. But we have a lingering fear that the archaic caste system will be only gently jarred in the process. It was that system as much as any other factor which protected General Meyers, sparing him such discomforts as inspection of his war-time financial operations. We hope the Senate investigators will not reduce the Meyers case to a saga of individual sin when they write their final report.

United Nations Victory

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE Palestine decision was a victory not to be diminished by the grimy background of intrigue and vote-trading from which it emerged. Nothing that went before can blur the outlines of the new Jewish state, defined in the language of the resolution, if not yet in structural form, and approved by more than two-thirds of the members. This is the Assembly's one great accomplishment, and it went far to restore faith in the capacity of the United Nations to act positively.

The decision has been challenged by the Arab states and rejected by the Palestine Arab Higher Committee, but many signs already point to ultimate reluctant acquiescence rather than all-out rebellion. Not one Arab state has said it would withdraw from the United Nations; as for the Arabs of Palestine, they may never accept partition but also they may not resist it—not, at least, as a whole people. Undoubtedly, there will be violence; the warlike threats and preparations of the Mufti, across the border in Lebanon, have already touched off ugly outbursts in Palestine and Syria. But his efforts may be partly offset by the activities of certain opposition Palestinian Arabs, known even now to be in contact with King Abdullah and ready to take advantage of a possible future absorption of Arab Palestine by Transjordan. Faced with a United Nations decision carried out by a United Nations commission, Arab intransigence is likely to fade.

In any case, the decision will neither be reversed nor nullified. Even Britain has officially stated its willingness "not to obstruct" any plan adopted by the Assembly. So we may assume that the Assembly plan will be put in effect, at least in Jewish Palestine, and that by October the new state—or states—will be in existence. Superficially, the result was achieved by eight weeks of parliamentary maneuver, lobbying, debate, and back-stairs trading; more profoundly, it was produced, as the oranges and phosphates of Palestine have been produced, by a mighty faith and iron endurance maintained through twenty-five years of Jewish struggle.

THE battle in the Assembly was the pay-off. In time, it will be reviewed and analyzed in these pages. Here, only a few major points can be made:

If Britain, which gave the Palestine problem to the United Nations, had cooperated in finding a solution, the matter could have been easily settled. The United Nations Special Committee had submitted majority and minority reports and a wealth of supporting material. The views of the opposing parties had been well aired last spring. But because of Britain's negative attitude, the whole procedure faced a series of roadblocks. The British delegates—first the Colonial Secretary, Arthur Creech-Jones, and then Sir Alexander Cadogan—kept repeating the formula on which the session began: the mandate would be laid down on a date to be determined in London; British troops would be withdrawn when the government saw fit (in his last speech, Cadogan set August 1 as the date of final withdrawal); Britain would not, at any stage, be responsible for helping establish or enforce a solution not accepted by both Arabs and Jews—that is, any solution conceivable. The subcommittee was left with the unhappy task of planning partition without knowing when, where, how, or under what authority the job could be accomplished.

Even this difficulty might have been overcome fairly easily if the United States had taken a clear, strong position at the outset. Unfortunately, until the last days, the United States followed a policy of deliberate ambiguity. No one knew just where our delegation stood at any given moment—including the delegates themselves. As always, the State Department wanted to string along with Britain, if possible. Influential men in the department, with the Defense Department and the combined Chiefs of Staff in the background, favored a solution as close to the status quo as changed events allowed. Oil and defense and old-fashioned imperialist interests were balanced against long-standing promises to the Jews, and President Truman's inclination—personal as well as political—toward a Zionist solution. The result was a formal indorsement of the majority plan offset by a long series of delays and reservations. For days on end, the United States members of the subcommittee sat silent while the other members fumed and privately expressed their annoyance at American passivity. It was only when the press criticized the shilly-shallying of our delegates that they were jolted briefly into activity. But the deliberations were so endlessly protracted that the energetic Dr. Evatt finally invaded the subcommittee, demanded a report, and got one.

How much of the trouble can be laid to the American members themselves, and how much to Washington, it would be hard to say. Certainly, General Hilldring, our delegation's excellent adviser, did his utmost to force the issue. The best guess is that most of obstructions originated in the higher reaches of the State Department.

That action was at last taken must be put down to the account of a handful of men. Apart from Dr. Evatt, whose tenacity and parliamentary skill were a major asset

THE NATION wishes to acknowledge the many letters it has received discussing the three articles by Paul Blanshard on the Roman Catholic Church in Medicine, Sex and Education. As soon as space permits, an extensive representative selection of these letters will be printed.

in the fight, great praise should go to three of the Latin American delegates—Jorge Granados, of Guatemala, E. Rodriguez Fabregat, of Uruguay, and Pedro Zuloaga, of Venezuela. Fabregat and Granados, having served as members of UNSCOP, contributed immensely to the success of the working committee which was set up to resolve differences and prepare the detailed plan of implementation; and all three showed skill in preventing serious divisions in the subcommittee. Equally effective was Canada's able Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester Pearson. Very hard-headed and direct, quick on the trigger, Pearson kept finding ways around the succession of barriers raised by the British and the Americans. Another man who deserves more credit than he got was Ksowery Pruszyński, the subcommittee's Polish chairman. Laboring under the handicap of a slow and reluctant English, Pruszyński nevertheless held the group to their appointed job—to prepare a report based on the majority recommendations. He was himself unwavering in support of partition, and his tenacious good faith kept others in line.

Finally, credit must go to Russia's Tsrupakin who, from the moment Gromyko announced his support of partition, did everything possible to hasten agreement. No one could accuse the Soviet delegates of obstruction or any attempt to play politics with the issue. They were conciliatory and reasonable all through, and at several critical points accepted compromise solutions, as in the matter of Security-Council authority over the Palestine commission, in order to speed action.

Throughout, the representatives of the Jewish Agency showed statesmanship and a restraint which was the more impressive because they had waited so long for the day of decision. Dr. Abba Hillel Silver and Dr. Chaim Weizmann ably presented the Zionist case in the general debate while Moshe Shertok carried the whole weight of day-by-day negotiation with a skill and patience that every member recognized.

THE commission was hand-picked by the United States. Four out of five of the countries named are generally counted in the British-American "bloc"—Bolivia, Panama, Denmark, and the Philippines. Czechoslovakia was chosen instead of Poland, which had earned a place on the commission. Bolivia was put on, while Guatemala and Uruguay were omitted—on United States insistence, after both had been recommended by the working committee.

But the value of the commission will be demonstrated in action; and its ability to accomplish the difficult task assigned to it will depend, in the end, not so much on its composition, though that is important enough, as on the attitude of the great powers toward its mission. How far will Britain go in maintaining order while its troops remain in Palestine? Will it organize the process of withdrawal so as to facilitate the work of the commission, or pull out in the manner best suited to its own convenience? The answers to those questions will determine order or chaos in Palestine. Continued cooperation between Russia and the United States will play an immense role in insuring a successful transfer of power. Another factor will be American willingness to send arms to the Jewish militia. Since no United Nations force has been provided to keep the peace while the commission governs Palestine, it is essential that the Haganah be quickly supplied with equipment and prepared to defend partition as it is carried into effect.

The decision in the Assembly was won through the belated help of the United States, without whose help it could not have been won at all. Those Americans who watched the struggle at close range or, like the representatives of The Nation Associates, took an active hand in it, were not happy at the reluctant role their government played—particularly in view of past pledges and the evident necessities of the case. Now that partition has been adopted, the United States has an opportunity to see to it that the plan succeeds.

If raids and terror rule in Palestine, the Security Council will be called upon to take action—and this is the contingency the State Department has been most anxious to avoid. The best hope of order, and effective implementation of the plan offered by the Assembly, lies in putting arms into the hands of the Jewish forces—before the British troops withdraw.

POLITICS and PEOPLE

BY ROBERT BENDINER

Stassen, the What-Is-It?

HAROLD E. STASSEN, it appears, is unimpressed by the fate of the politician celebrated in the jingle of the late Keith Preston, to wit:

There lies beneath this mossy stone

A politician who Touched a live issue without gloves

And never did come to.

Indeed, the device whereby Stassen keeps his name before the country without benefit of public office is to pick up live issues and publicly fondle them, much as a Kentucky snake cultist handles a mess of rattlers. Not content with stumping the country for the Presidency while rival candidates are still coyly hiding behind their fans, he has now written a book called "Where I Stand" (Doubleday, $2) in which his principles are set forth for all to read. And in Milwaukee last week he paid his respects to certain unidentified Presidential candidates who "hold that a position of photogenic availability should be maintained" until such time as delegates have been rounded up by skilful henchmen.

One would think that out of all this self-conscious, grimly determined frankness there would emerge a clear image of Harold Stassen and his creed, a picture easily recognized anywhere in the country. But this is far from being the case. In the course of a recent short stay in Wisconsin, where Stassen is staging a major drive for delegates, I found that he is as diversely viewed by the citizenry as the elephant by the blind men.

To the devotees of the Chicago Tribune Stassen is of course the heir of Wendell Willkie, which is to say, an enemy spy in the Republican camp, a New Dealer, and probably a "foreigner," a term not easy to define since Colonel McCormick has extended it to include Vandenberg and even Dewey. But it turns out that those who led the Willkie campaign in Wisconsin four years ago are as cool toward Stassen as the Colonel is. Their choice is Eisenhower. And the remnants of the old Progressive machine—not that I consider it a criterion—snort at the very notion that Stassen is a liberal. One of Phil La Follette's lieutenants assumed an air of perplexity as we talked of the former Minnesota governor. "I can't see anything liberal about the guy," he said. But he could still see something liberal in Phil, who in turn sees General MacArthur as "the greatest living American."

OFFHAND it might seem unreasonable to attribute the confusion about Stassen to that gentleman himself. Certainly he has been free with his opinions, and has displayed a tactical boldness that is refreshing beside the ragged conventions of the Deweys, the Warrens, and the rest. But in a large measure he is responsible for the ambiguity that characterizes his political reputation. He has managed to combine in a remarkable degree a liberalism in the abstract with a conservatism in the concrete. By lashing out at the "riders of regal reaction" and setting forth such objectives as "the better life," he deliberately makes his appeal as the daring and idealistic young hope of the party, determined to sweep out the mossbacks and bring the G. O. P. back to the glories of the first Roosevelt. Yet if Harold Stassen has ever harbored an idea that could not be swallowed by Robert A. Taft, the country has yet to hear of it.

Consider both his book and the Milwaukee speech in which he opened his formal appeal for Wisconsin's twenty-seven delegates. He is for a "free economy" in which there are "no booms, no busts," but he is so bearish on government controls that he "would much rather have large capital accumulations managed by individual citizens than . . . by government officials." He concedes that "there is some danger of going too far" in the direction of curbing labor, but the Taft-Hartley law doesn't do it. Though a few minor amendments are in order, that statute is "the foundation for a fair, just, and well-balanced labor policy in America." And, like Knutson, he favors tax reductions in the higher brackets.

As a veteran and champion of veterans Stassen lays proper emphasis on the desperate need for housing, and he even concedes that the federal government "must break through to pry loose the log jam." But he is "unalterably opposed" to the government's becoming the "No. 1 landlord," and he puts the blame for the whole housing fiasco on government, the building industry, and the unions—on everyone, in short, except the Republicans who killed all the government's efforts to provide housing, and the real-estate lobby that called the tune.

It is particularly hard for Wisconsinites to take Stassen's concern with housing seriously—or his liberalism altogether, for that matter—because of the political company he keeps. His campaign for delegates in the state is led by Senator Joseph R. McCarthy, an eager champion of the real-estate bloc. Miles McMillin of the Madison Capital Times recently described McCarthy as a man who, as judge, obliged his political supporters with "quickie" divorces, "who destroyed records of his court, and who failed to report some $40,000 in income made from stock speculation." This last failing, incidentally, appears to be common among Congressmen from Wisconsin, several of whom have explained that they were simply "too busy" to make out returns.

If Stassen is even to cut much of a figure at the Republican convention, he will have to win the Wisconsin primary, which will be accepted by party leaders as an indication not only of his strength but of Dewey's and Eisenhower's as well. To this end McCarthy's men are already at work on district leaders and wardheelers, and from what I am told they are discounting their candidate's high-sounding pronouncements as "campaign oratory." Democratic leaders in the state, presumably neutral, expect Stassen to win the primary with the support of the Republican organization, with Dewey definitely weaker than in 1944 and MacArthur showing considerable strength. Stassen's recent and gratuitous attack on New York as a hotbed of communism was probably aimed primarily at Dewey, but it should also appeal to the anti-Eastern sentiments of Tribune readers who might be drifting toward the MacArthur camp. I would think that his lumping of socialism with communism—"two peas from the same confining pod"—and his remarkable proposal to refuse Marshall Plan aid to countries with nationalization programs were addressed to the same potential supporters. But there is more here than demagoguery. The plain truth is that Harold Stassen is first and foremost a champion of private capital in its purest form. Any resemblance to radicalism in his speeches or writings is purely coincidental, and any liberalism wholly secondary.

Scarcity Preferred

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 25

THE House committee on foreign aid headed by Representative Herter concludes smugly that "the greatest service the United States can render to the world at this time lies in maintaining a strong and powerful system of free enterprise in the United States." This happens to be true. An economic collapse in this country, by depressing prices and restricting markets the world over, will place a terrific burden on reconstruction efforts everywhere, irrespective of social systems. Unfortunately the Republicans, who dominate both houses of Congress, show no disposition whatever to make those minor sacrifices of private interest which are necessary if the American economy is to be stabilized.

This applies even to those in the Republican ranks who have been represented as in revolt against the Taft leadership. In last week's letter, The G. O. P. Discovers Poverty, I showed that two wandering Republican investigating committees were appalled at the poverty which inflation was creating at home and disturbed by the exorbitant profits resulting from the inflated prices. Yet neither committee had the courage to propose that anything much be done about it. The Flanders report went so far as to suggest an increase in the minimum wage and consumer rationing for meat, butter, and poultry, but without price control. The Bender report was against a return either to rationing or to price and wage control. All it proposed was that we "pare to the bone all government-financed export and military programs." The rebels—if they deserve so portentous a name—seem only to feel that Taft should not have slammed the door so resoundingly on the anti-inflationary controls asked by the President. Perhaps they fear echoes next November.

Reluctance to face up to the necessities imposed by any adequate program of European reconstruction is all the more evident in the Herter reports, which deal with the supply side of the picture. If all the current cant about "free enterprise" and "totalitarian controls" did not merely mask an unwillingness to forgo further inflationary profit, it would be obvious to the most conservative observer that the supply-and-demand mechanism of the market had temporarily broken down. Any program of foreign aid is rigorously limited on one side by the supply of food, which has about reached the maximum possible, and on another side by the supply of steel, where government intervention is necessary (1) to plan full utilization of existing facilities, and (2) to expand basic capacity. A combination of selective price controls, rationing, allocations, and planning is required to meet this situation; all are anathema to the Republicans as they are to industry generally.

THIS is most striking in the case of Europe's greatest need, which is grain. The Herter report on France points out that the French bread ration is less than it was during the German occupation, and that there as elsewhere "official rations . . . can hardly go lower without serious effects on health and dangerous political repercussions." The Herter report on grain recognizes that the winter-wheat crop may fall to half last year's, not only jeopardizing the foreign-aid program but producing "critical domestic consequences and inflationary effects of a magnitude difficult to describe." Yet the committee cannot bring itself to draw what would seem to be the inescapable conclusion—the necessity of granting at once to the President emergency powers to control the price, use, allocation, and marketing of wheat and corn. It does advance, as questions for "preliminary consideration," some tentative ideas for planned expansion of food crops, fish, and nitrogen, for possible restrictions on the industrial use of grain, and for government procurement of all grains; but price controls—horrid phrase—are nowhere mentioned. Neither is rationing.

The only rationing the G. O. P. envisages is the rationing of misery and of abnormal demand abroad to fit the patterns of business as usual in the United States. The Republican majority, far from considering the questions timidly advanced in the Herter report on grain, is already taking to heart its warning that "the present danger is we may over-export." The Herter committee itself, when it gets down to cases, shows no disposition for any uncomfortable measures to expand available supplies. Thus it is content to dismiss as "unlikely" Secretary Marshall's hope that this winter we may ship enough wheat to France to restore its bread ration from the present 200 grams a day to the 250 grams which was—the Herter report tells us—"the lowest official ration under the German occupation." The Republicans are well aware of the need for maintaining wheat exports and some others if the bottom is not to fall out of the current boom. To this degree they favor "fighting communism" in Western Europe, but not to the degree that it would interfere with profits.

WITH regard to steel, the other basic item in the foreign-aid program, the facts are equally obvious. The supply of steel is the factor limiting the production and movement of fertilizer, coal, machinery, and transport equipment. In the Administration reports—the Nourse, Krug and Harriman documents—one can see, by reading them carefully, that the steel supply is not just an emergency foreign-aid problem, that it must be expanded if a full-employment economy is to be maintained at home. One can also learn, most clearly from the Krug report, that steel output, instead of expanding, has been declining from the war-time peak; 4,000,000 tons of capacity have been shut down, and current production is 6,000,000 tons below that reduced capacity. There are problems in restoring the war-time peak, but the Herter committee is unwilling to recognize the part the government could play in easing if not solving them. The committee is unfriendly to steel expansion not only at home but abroad, though Western Europe must fabricate and sell more steel than it did before the war if it is to make up for its lost investments and lost empires.

Except in the case of Germany, which seems to be the favored nation of both the Herter and Harriman reports, there is suspicion of plans for steel expansion in Western Europe. The Herter committee wants to review and revise downward the steel plans of the United Kingdom, France, and the Benelux combination. "Is there not a real need," it asks, "to look at the prospects for marketing the capacity that will result and its probable contribution to a lack of world balance harmful to all concerned?" The Herter report reflects similar thinking in the case of petroleum. It fears that the refining equipment asked by the Paris proposals might be "supplied to foreign-owned but not to American-owned companies"; can't you see the poor little refugees of Standard Oil shivering outside the door? The Herter committee suggests either "curbs on Europe to prevent unreasonable increases in the consumption of petroleum" or "alternatively more production of petroleum equipment from Europe, particularly from Germany." The G. O. P. prefers a comfortable scarcity to adequate reconstruction in Europe, but if expansion there must be, it would rather see it in the Reich, where United States branch plants and cartel partners can share the profits.

Fiasco in Greece

I. Fruits of the Truman Doctrine

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

A FEW weeks ago Howard K. Smith, CBS's European news chief, reported from London that the execution of leftists in Greece had surpassed the rate at which opposition leaders were being liquidated in the Russian-dominated Balkans.

Strangely enough, President Truman's report to Congress on the progress of the Truman Doctrine, issued on November 10, didn't record this milestone. Nowhere in the report—or in the attached State Department document—was there mention of the increased violence in Greece since the Truman Doctrine was announced. That violence continues today, with wholesale executions, heads of partisans set up in public squares, and political prisoners used as "mine detectors."

The British, for all their blunders in Greece, had sufficient humanity to prevent political executions on trumped-up charges. Recently eighty-six Labor members of the House of Commons sent an appeal to King Paul to stay the wave of murders. In the United States, however, not a single official protest has been raised, and the Greek government openly suggests that its brutal tactics have the covert approval of the American embassy.

CONSTANTINE POULOS, former Balkan correspondent of The Nation and the Overseas News Agency, is now in this country preparing a book on Greece.

Mr. Truman neglected to mention a good many recent developments in Greece—the illegal arrest, imprisonment, and exile to barren islands of thousands of liberals, Socialists, progressives, and Communists, the complete suppression of the left-wing press, the slow but sure movement toward the suppression of the Greek trade-union movement. Thousands of labor leaders have been arbitrarily deported. A decree of the Ministry of Public Order on November 7 forbade a called strike and threatened to proclaim martial law if the strike were held and to draft its leaders into the army. At the same time the president of the teamsters' union, which had issued the strike call, was arrested because, in the words of the Minister of Public Order, he had recently returned from exile and "should be more careful." No other charge was made against him.

BUT what one finds most surprising in Mr. Truman's report is its failure to record the American mission's greatest accomplishment in Greece—the "broadening" of the Greek government. This event is worth examination if only as an illustration of the new "non-interventionist" attitude of our State Department.

Two significant hints of the "broadening" preceded it. Dana Adams Schmidt, the capable correspondent of the New York Times in Athens, wrote on July 23, "A leavening of the predominant right-wing Cabinet with Liberals, it is thought, might diminish the skepticism of public opinion in the United States and Great Britain regarding the regime." Again on August 26 Schmidt wrote, "When Foreign Minister Tsaldaris returns from the United States, probably within a few days, the mission is expected to use its influence to 'broaden' the government." One of the purposes of such a move, Schmidt said, would be "to make a better impression on United States public opinion, which will in the end determine the continuance of United States aid." "Some observers think," he added, "that Mr. Dwight Griswold [chief of the mission] will be lucky if he liberalizes the government to the extent of getting rid of Napoleon Zervas, Minister of Public Order."

Seven days later the three mildest right-wing ministers—George Papandreou, Panayotis Kanellopoulos, and Sophocles Venizelos—prompted by the Americans, demanded the removal of Zervas. Tsaldaris refused, the three resigned, the government fell, and King Paul asked Tsaldaris to form a new government.

At this point the Americans in Athens got busy, but they also got their signals crossed. Griswold wanted to liberalize the Greek government, while the American ambassador, Lincoln MacVeagh, only wanted to "broaden" it. MacVeagh didn't believe any serious changes were necessary; he only wanted to make the government look better to the American people. He thought this might be done if the Liberal Party were to enter a royalist government controlled by Tsaldaris's Populists.

Themistocles Sophoulis, the old Liberal leader whom MacVeagh has disliked for many years, rejected this proposal. When Sophoulis demanded complete control of the government by his party, the embassy announced that such a government would not receive American support. To back a purely Liberal government headed by Sophoulis, a spokesman said, would be equivalent to supporting the "Communist minority."

Thereupon Tsaldaris determined to form a strictly Populist government. He was temporarily checked, however, by the increasingly nervous Americans, who asked other parliamentary leaders not to join or support such a ministry. Griswold bluntly told one ex-minister that a narrow right-wing government would be "inadmissible." Then Tsaldaris sprang his trap. He went to MacVeagh and insisted that the Americans declare in writing whether or not they objected to his projected government and, if they did, whether its formation would cause any change in their country's policy toward Greece. MacVeagh, of course, was forced to retreat. "My government," he said, "has no intention of intervening in the internal affairs of Greece." He assured Tsaldaris that Griswold ought to have said "inadvisable," not "inadmissible." Tsaldaris announced that "the Americans are not interfering" and proceeded to form a government made up entirely of Populist Party members.

At this critical moment Loy Henderson, chief of the State Department's division of Near Eastern and African Affairs, was hurried to Athens as a trouble-shooter. He clarified Griswold's status and talked old Sophoulis into an agreement. Reversing his previous decision, Sophoulis consented to serve in the Cabinet with Tsaldaris and withdrew his former insistence on a completely free hand in the selection of ministers. Tsaldaris was handled differently by Henderson; he was simply bludgeoned by the threat that American aid would be cut off. Henderson also said that unless Tsaldaris agreed to give Sophoulis the premiership, Griswold would push for the appointment of that ancient bête noire of the royalists, General Plastiras. So Tsaldaris gave in. And that is the way we broadened the government in Greece.

Two of the men Tsaldaris brought into the Cabinet with him are more extreme right-wingers than Zervas ever was. Petros Mavromichalis, the new Minister of the Interior, is not only a direct representative of the vested interests but also the man who organized the first terrorist bands in the Peloponnese last year, after the elections. Admiral Alexander E. Sakellariou, the new Minister of the Navy, was removed from the first Greek government in exile by the then Prime Minister, Tsouderos, for declaring in London in 1942 that post-war Greece would have a regime similar to that of John Metaxas, the head of the pre-war fascist dictatorship. Tsaldaris men also hold the Ministries of War, Finance, Coordination, Welfare, and Reconstruction. No wonder Tsaldaris acceded to Henderson's pressure.

NOW the State Department has issued an announcement to the effect that the "differences" between Griswold and MacVeagh have been "worked out." The statement obviously is intended for Greek consumption. Griswold hasn't changed his approach to the Greek problem. Nor has there been at any time a question of his recall, as some reports have suggested. He wants to quit. After Henderson's September mission to Athens Griswold gave notice that he would serve as our Truman Doctrine administrator there for only six more months—long enough for the State Department to find someone more amenable to its views.

The State Department announcement reveals that MacVeagh will retain his strong hold over Greek affairs. He will censor Griswold's dispatches to Washington as he did Paul Porter's. He will support the camouflaged-as-liberal "super-dynamic" policy of the royalists. More important, he will shrewdly favor the military section of the American mission, and together they will press for a stronger United States military policy in Greece.

In March, 1948, it will be one year since the Truman Doctrine was proclaimed. Setting aside its international implications, what has it meant for the Greek people? The only answer is increased bloodshed. The Truman Doctrine was naive in its conception and has been naively executed. As long as Greece's big-money boys—who have a billion dollars cached outside the country, ac-according to a report from Athens by Marquis Childs—control the Greek government, there cannot be sufficient economic reorganization to meet the basic needs of the people, and as long as those needs are not met, there will be guerrillas in the Greek mountains exploited by the Communists. The logic of the situation is clear, and Griswold seems to appreciate it.

II. Griswold's One Chance

BY A. W. SHEPPARD

THE Griswold mission in Greece did not start on virgin ground; the soil had already been worked by the British Economic Mission. As I read some of its reports in the American press, I think I am reading again old reports by the British mission. "The mission is trying to bring more land under cultivation through irrigation"; "steps are being taken to put seed-growing farmers back into business"; "spare parts are being brought in for tractors"; orders have been placed for nine plants to process foods"; "reconstruction of damaged roads, railways, seaports, and airfields is a slow and difficult job . . . progress is being made." All these hopes and plans, described in almost identical terms, other members of the British Economic Mission and I were recording from June, 1946, until April, 1947. None of them have yet been fulfilled. Only a few weeks ago President Truman said that so far the economic reconstruction of Greece had not started but that the groundwork was ready. We reported the groundwork ready month after month in 1946. (As a matter of fact, UNRRA had prepared the groundwork, under Buell F. Mabey, and prepared it well.)

"Mission investigators have discovered that equipment and supplies furnished by UNRRA have not always been used," says an American press dispatch. This is an old tale dating back to 1945. While spinning mills in Greece were closing down for lack of good wool and cotton, particularly during 1946 and the early part of 1947, more than 3,000 tons of wool and cotton brought in by UNRRA was lying in the warehouses. At the same time the Pega warehouse in Salonika was crammed with food, clothing, fertilizer, and spare parts for tractors and motor cars. The British Economic Mission tried in vain to get this out; now the United States mission is trying.

Mr. Griswold has announced that the Greek budget, soon to be presented to Parliament, will include tax schedules which will at last tax those best able to pay. But when Varvaressos prepared such schedules early in 1946, he was forced to resign from the Finance Ministry.

COLONEL SHEPPARD was head of the British Economic Mission in northern Greece in 1946-47. Before that he was on the staff of UNRRA in Greece.

Nor was anything done about the budget prepared under the guidance of Sir John Nixon, which provided for similar levies, to yield a revenue amounting to about $700,000,000—the figure mentioned recently by Griswold. Instead, in the budget for 1946-47 provision was made to collect approximately $10 per head of population—$8 from indirect taxation and $2 from direct taxation. Thus there is practically no income tax in Greece, and people with money, especially gold, live almost tax free. The British Economic Mission failed utterly in its attempts to tax wealth in Greece.

There is no organized "austerity" in Greece today except in the areas under control of the rebels. In Athens there are as fine cars as in New York, mainly driven by black-marketeers and former collaborators with the Germans. Confectionery shops and high-class restaurants sell better cakes and sweetmeats than I have been able to find in New York, Paris, Brussels, or London. But if there is no organized austerity, there is enforced austerity—enforced by wages that cannot keep pace with prices, by poor crops, by unemployment, and by the loss of income that is suffered when a majority of bread-winners are in the armed forces, the gendarmerie, or the security police, or have joined armed bands of "nationally minded citizens" or the rebel forces.

"Arrangements have been made by the mission for the establishment of a Foreign Trade Administration," said the State Department's report of November 7. This is the body which the British Economic Mission tried for eight months to set up as the "Greek-English Export-Import Corporation," but for which it could not get a ratifying bill through the Greek Parliament. Imports and exports have been controlled by a licensing system in Greece for some time; despite this, from June, 1946, to April, 1947, you could have searched the import list in vain for the lathes and machinery necessary to get Greece on its feet. But you would have found at the top of the list cosmetics, perfumes, colored scarves, artificial jewelry, motor cars, watches, and fountain pens.

For many years before the war Yugoslavia was Greece's sixth best customer. Although, to my certain knowledge, the Yugoslav authorities have suggested trade agreements on more than one occasion, no trade is carried on between the two countries except in the rebel-controlled areas. There is no trade with Bulgaria or Albania. How can one get peace in the Balkans without trade? Here is a real chance for the Griswold mission. First priority should be given to reconstruction of the railway into Yugoslavia from Salonika.

THE Griswold mission is following the same pattern as the British mission and will be equally ineffective unless a liberal democratic government is installed. Loans, grants and expert advice cannot solve the problems of Greece as long as there is internal disunity. And you cannot bring about unity merely by destroying your political and economic opponents—each rebel executed in Greece, each liberal exiled, breeds ten more opponents of the government. Yet this is the only policy that has been pursued since Bevin forced the elections on Sophoulis and the unfortunate Greek people in April, 1946, completing the evil work begun by Churchill in 1942, when he decided to back the Greek king, come what might. Holding an election is not proof of democracy. As Bevin himself said in the House of Commons last May (not referring to Greece), "It does not matter how many elections you have; if you have a powerful secret police, responsible to one minister, you have no democracy, and you are not within miles of it."

After more than two years in Greece, in administrative positions which took me all over the country and gave me a knowledge of all political camps and friends in each, I am firmly convinced that at least 70 per cent of the people want neither communism nor the present government. But they have no means of bringing about any change, and the activities of the government are daily driving liberals into the arms of the Communists. The presence of British troops and American missions is a clear sign that Britain and the United States support the present government, and no amount of dialectical discussion at the U. N. or elsewhere will persuade the Greek man in the street otherwise. Since the two powers can no longer safely withdraw, they should now intervene in a constructive way by announcing to the Greek people that they will give support only to a government prepared to sacrifice all personal aims to that of unity, and to make reconciliation its primary objective.

I have no mandate to say so, but I believe that a government headed by General Plastiras and John Sofianopoulos could be formed and could unite 90 per cent of the Greek people in two months at the outside. If these two men formed a service government, I am convinced that the rebels would lay down their arms. General Markos has said time and time again that he is not fighting to set up a Communist regime in Greece, that if a liberal democratic government is formed he will hand over his authority and end the rebellion. Now is the time for statesmanship. As soon as a democratic government has shown its ability to achieve reconciliation, all foreign troops should be withdrawn, control of the army should be restored to the Greek government, a proper election should be held under U. N. supervision, after a reasonable time has elapsed to bring about normal conditions; and then, perhaps, a non-political relief program could be carried through under U. N. direction.

If this is not done, Greece will remain another Spain. Its democratic forces will not be defeated easily, even if the United States and Britain play the role in Greece that Germany and Italy played in Spain.

London Newsreel

BY AYLMEER VALLANCE

London, November 20

THESE days, the operator of the political film turns his projector fast. In the past four weeks the British public has been treated, on the parliamentary screen, to an eventful newsreel. First came a King's Speech in which a somewhat humdrum program of legislation was enlivened by the challenge to the House of Lords' veto. Then came the somber "shots" of the Cripps plan and announcements of further food cuts, including the highly unpopular restriction of potato consumption to three pounds a week per person. There followed a sensational but questionably effective order by the Minister of Labor which was designed to conscript every "spiv" and "drone" for service in the national effort. Finally came the autumn budget, the Lucifer-like fall of Hugh Dalton, and the ascent of Sir Stafford Cripps to command on the ship's economic bridge.

AYLMEER VALLANCE is The Nation's London correspondent.

The audience in the reserved seats, by which I mean the Parliamentary Labor Party, has not applauded the performance. It has been uncomfortably aware that the results of the municipal elections—fought on national, not local, issues—showed that the Tories were successfully exploiting every popular discontent over shortages and enforced austerity, and that it was apparently easier for the opposition to mobilize the anti-Socialist vote than for the Labor Party to get its own supporters to the polls. Too little socialism, or too much? Debate on that issue between the left and right wings of the party continues. Both wings agree that the government's great record of social reform—national security, the health service, and so forth—is in danger of being obscured in electors' eyes by the unsolved economic crisis.

Whatever may be the merits of reducing the Peers' right of veto to one year, the fact remains that the bill was introduced largely to console Aneurin Bevan and the "Keep Left" group for their disappointment at the reprieve given to capitalists in the steel industry. Similarly, the loudly trumpeted assault on wealthy idlers —an assault which they can readily circumvent by becoming nominally "occupied" in any of a hundred minor employments not included in Mr. Isaacs's short list of "unessential" trades—was undoubtedly prompted by the desire to compensate the trade unions for the fact that the only serious direction of labor so far enacted applies only to the unemployed. These measures gave little impression of coherent policy, and within a few days of the re-assembly of Parliament it was plain that there was no great enthusiasm among Labor back benchers for Mr. Attlee's reshuffled Cabinet. Add the fact that, before the budget affaire, there was considerable doubt whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Minister for Economic Affairs saw eye to eye on crisis policy, and it is not perhaps surprising that there was renewed talk of a move by the right to make Mr. Bevin Premier in Mr. Attlee's place, so as to have a strong hand at the helm. This gossip has been made irrelevant by the elevation of Sir Stafford Cripps to the position of dictator of Britain's economy. The whole future of the Labor movement depends on what Cripps will do and whether, in relation to the economic crisis, he can "bring it off"—with or without Mr. Marshall's aid.

AT THIS point I beg leave to reverse the film sequence. Mr. Dalton's resignation may have been inevitable from the standpoint of strict parliamentary punctilio. Whether, relying on the tradition that trusted parliamentary correspondents are safe recipients of confidences, he gave undue latitude to a journalist's normal urge to secure a "beat," or whether you make the editor of the Star the villain in a piece from which nobody drew profit, no government can easily afford to retain a Chancellor who has been involved in what was a highly unusual indiscretion. Perhaps the Cabinet would have rallied to Mr. Dalton's defense if it had not been wondering uneasily whether there was room for both a Dalton and a Cripps policy in the same administration. Certainly the autumn budget which the Chancellor had just introduced was illogical if it was intended to carry out the full implications of Sir Stafford's "all-for-export" plan.

The budget, it is true, represented a partial surrender to the anti-inflationists. It imposed fresh indirect taxation to the tune of about £130,000,000, much of which would fall on working and lower-middle-class incomes, hit additionally by the decision to terminate subsidies on wool, cotton, and leather and thus let the prices of clothing and footwear rise. But in the matter of the food subsidies Mr. Dalton stoutly refused to follow the advice of his Tory and big-business critics, who would have had him curb inflation and release more goods for the export drive by letting the price of essential foodstuffs soar, thus curtailing the purchasing power of the working class. Instead, he decided to "mop up" £47,000,000 from the more speculative class of rentiers by doubling the industrial-profits tax, and to tap, in the betting industry, a novel and potentially fruitful source of revenue.

For his refusal to be panicked into adopting the fatal policy of "cuts" foisted on the MacDonald government by the May committee in 1931, the Labor movement owes Mr. Dalton thanks. After the increases of the past six months in the cost of unrationed food, transport, and many other essential services, it is extremely doubtful whether the mass of consumers in Britain have in fact any "excess" purchasing power: the inflationary pressure arises from accumulations of corporate and personal capital which can be, and are, drawn upon for current expenditure on unessentials. For this the only remedy, in the view of an increasing section of the Labor Party, is a capital levy. Whether Mr. Dalton, had he remained Chancellor, would have included such a levy in his budget next spring is now an idle speculation. All that he said in his budget speech last week was that he hoped to make in April "readjustments" in the burden of taxation which would combine needed relief with added incentives, having regard to the fact that our society was still marred by "gross inequalities of wealth."

As it is, the autumn budget may be said to have dodged the big issues—the ultimate contributions which the rich or the poor are to make toward solving the crisis—by postponing decisions. The new Chancellor will have to make them; and Sir Stafford, it may be presumed, is as aware as the disappointed and infuriated Tory deflationists that increased taxes on consumers' goods which while stiff are not prohibitive will not do much to channel British production into his export markets.

MUST we then expect, next April, a budget of much more stringent austerity? The answer largely depends on what happens, not in Britain's Parliament, but in Congressional treatment of Mr. Marshall's aid program for Europe. As it stands, the Cripps plan, taken in conjunction with the autumn budget, does not add up to figures which make sense. At present the sterling balance of payments is still running a dollar deficit at the terrific rate of £900,000,000 a year. Even if his somewhat sanguine export targets for next year are reached, the import cuts which Sir Stafford has so far announced, combined with the £200,000,000 curtailment in capital developments, involve drawing at least £300,000,000 from gold and dollar reserves in the next twelve months; and though it is hoped optimistically that Britain's global balance of payments may be in equilibrium at the end of that period, the dollar deficit in 1949 will still be equivalent to £250,000,000 a year, with only £270,000,000 of reserves left to support the currency of the whole sterling area. These figures mean one of two things: there will have to be a considerable further descent into the spiral of restrictions of imports and cuts in raw materials for British factories and in rations for their work people, or the American Congress will have to provide aid, either in the form of direct relief shipments to Britain or in the form of convertible dollars supplied to Europe which can be spent in payment for Britain's otherwise "unrequited" exports to the non-dollar area.

Can Sir Stafford count on finding himself in a position by next April to rely on such aid, direct or indirect? The omens seem against such an assumption, and as Cripps is a realist first and a Socialist second, we may look for further cold douches of austerity, both in the husbanding of Britain's resources and in the taxing away of purchasing power. Politically, the dictatorship of Cripps is a big risk for the Labor movement. If he follows a distinctively Socialist policy, imposes a capital levy, presses on with nationalization of steel, sets up a state monopoly to acquire and make bulk sales of export goods, and thus succeeds in developing trade with the U. S. S. R. and other potential suppliers of food and raw materials outside the Western Hemisphere, he may be able to get the British working class to accept temporarily lower rations and decreased real wages. Otherwise, there are heavy storms ahead: the relations between the Cabinet and the Trades Union Congress and between Sir Stafford and the left within the party will be strained to the breaking-point.

It is up to Mr. Marshall and Congress to determine the course of British policy in the next year; and it is difficult from here to discern what place they consign to Britain in their schemes. The impression created in the Parliamentary Labor Party by many of the features which have emerged in the aid-to-Europe program is unfavorable. If adopted, the proposal to put all relief on a bilateral basis as between the United States and the recipient countries would go far to destroy the constructive conception of Western European collaboration which was a valuable part of the Paris conference report; and it is beginning to be asked with anxiety whether this or any other European country can really afford to accept from the United States assistance which may temporarily maintain higher standards of living than would otherwise be possible but will do little to promote radical economic reconstruction.

News of the "unavailability" of much American steel and machinery, coupled with the Harriman committee's suggestion that Europe's projected capital developments are excessive and that shipbuilding, for instance, should be restricted, have made people here wonder whether the United States wants to finance any recovery in Europe which would be competitive with American business. If it does not, would it not be more sensible to get down, here and now, to a real siege economy, tighten our belts, get what we can from the Empire and the rest of Europe—East as well as West—and follow the advice Professor Viner of Princeton has given us in the current number of Lloyd's Bank Review, that we should spend more, not less, in improving our capital equipment? These look like the great issues of debate here in the coming months.

Wind-up at Flushing

BY J. KING GORDON

Flushing, November 29

WE are still too close to the tense closing hours of the General Assembly to be able to form a fair judgment of its work. This last week has been the most dramatic, the most nerve-racking in United Nations history. In taking on Palestine the U. N. had tackled a task almost too much for its strength, and although the logic of its final decision was apparent weeks ago, when the hour of decision arrived it hesitated, sought an excuse for delay, looked for a way out.

It was Mr. Ilsley, the Canadian delegate, who on Wednesday formulated what must have been in the minds of many delegates. "Canada," he said, "was voting for partition as the best of our unattractive alternatives. These alternatives were: do nothing, set up a unitary Arab state, set up a federated state in accordance with the minority UNSCOP report, or create a Jewish and an Arab state. We dismissed the first alternative," said Mr. Ilsley, "as not worthy of the U. N., highly dangerous in its probable consequences, indeed, as virtually unthinkable." The second alternative would ignore factors that could not be ignored—the Balfour Declaration, the League of Nations mandate, the encouragement given to the immigration of Jews into Palestine, and their establishment of a well-rooted community of 700,000 into which they had put money, labor, and lives. The federated solution had originally appealed to Canada, which had itself succeeded in adjusting the differences between the two racial elements in its population under a federated system, but it had found no support in the Assembly. That left partition. Every responsible delegate was disturbed by the threats of reprisals and the talk of fire and sword. But the likelihood of disorder would be even greater under any of the other solutions proposed.

Many factors accounted for the wavering and vacillating votes during the last few days. There was a solidarity among the nations of Asia against the Western powers which were imposing a settlement on an Asiatic people. In this Assembly they had been given good grounds for believing that the sense of superiority of the white race was far from obsolete. There was a cognate fear among colonial powers of the effect of partition on Moslems everywhere: the Netherlands and France with large Moslem colonial populations moved reluctantly from the abstention into the "yes" column. For many it was conscience that made them cowards, compelling them to accept France's last-minute proposal of postponement just in case reconciliation was still open. But in the end, even if, as the Arabs resentfully charged, United States pressure swung over a few votes, the great majority realized that months of study, heart-searching, and labor had carried them to one conclusion: partition was the most just and workable solution for Palestine.

SENATOR AUSTIN in his fervent and evangelical closing speech said that a useful contribution of this Assembly had been to clarify the world situation, to reveal its true character. Certainly it was no Assembly for gauze-curtain idealists.

Under the fierce Klieg lights of the Assembly debate, conflict rather than real accord was revealed in stark outline. Perhaps we should be grateful to Mr. Vishinsky for putting the Russian case with such colorful frankness. Unfortunately, the fire and brimstone of his language frequently scorched his listeners more than it illuminated his subject. We can understand his case against American policy in Greece because American liberals have made a similar case. His attacks on the Little Assembly, originally well founded, were in the end much too severe for the harmless little debating society that eventually emerged. His blasts against war-mongering peppered too broad a target and hit some quite innocent bystanders. And his assault on the Marshall Plan had the unfortunate result of convincing many formerly unconvinced Americans that Russia had designs of its own on Western Europe. For there are few Americans, as there are few non-Communist Europeans, who regard the Marshall Plan as a grandiose attempt to enslave Europe to American imperialism.

The conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union has been fully exposed at this Assembly. The roots of that conflict, the true aims of foreign policy behind the distrust and suspicion, have not been made clear. Some persons still think that these two giants can find ways of living peacefully in the same world, that they need not start preparing for a new war. In fact, a neglected angle of the U. N. debate was that many of the smaller nations—and, indeed, some of the larger ones—kept saying as much.

One tragically plaintive note which kept running through this Assembly was that international economic cooperation, which loomed so large in the Charter, seemed to be getting nowhere. To blame the United States for proceeding with the Marshall Plan outside of the United Nations is of course to mistake symptom for cause. Until political fears and suspicions are banished, economic cooperation, whether through the Marshall Plan or through specialized agencies, must be of a partial character. Russia's boycott of the special agencies must unfortunately be viewed in connection with its attacks on the Marshall Plan.

An unpleasant reality brought out during the Assembly was the continuing solidarity of the colonial powers and the consequent neglect of the rights of colonial and non-self-governing peoples. South Africa's response to the earlier U. N. request to bring Southwest Africa under the trusteeship council was understandable for domestic political reasons. So, too, was its elegantly frank defense of race discrimination in the case of its treatment of Indians. What was shocking was to see that India's defense of human rights received no support, but rather opposition, from the very powers which in other contexts were so valiantly defending the rights of man. This record may explain to some extent the colored and the Asiatic peoples' skepticism of the humanitarian motive of the Western nations in the case of Palestine.

NO ESTIMATE of the Assembly's work can be complete without some reference to personalities. We have mentioned Mr. Vishinsky, easily the most vivid and forceful if not the most helpful delegate. In debate his only near match was Paul-Henri Spaak of Belgium, brilliant in rebuttal and adept in producing that compromise proposal which is the objective of the parliamentary process. Gromyko, incidentally less spectacular than Vishinsky, is a much more useful Soviet delegate.

For sheer brilliance in presenting a case Zafraullah Khan of Pakistan was outstanding. He argued the unpopular side of the Palestine issue persuasively and with a moderation not characteristic of his Arab colleagues. On the partition side, and playing quite a different rôle, Lester Pearson of Canada must be singled out. His amazing ability in committee work—plus an unflagging sense of humor—was largely responsible for bringing about agreement between Russians and Americans on the implementation plan. Mme Pandit and Mrs. Roosevelt stood out as able exponents of the one-world idea. Of the other Americans, General Hildring and Herschel B. Johnson deserve mention; of the British, Hector McNeil, Cadogan, and Shawcross, whose parliamentary and Foreign Office training showed up to advantage in debate.

But on the whole the caliber of the delegates was not high, not high enough for the responsibility they carried. With the exception of Aranha, there was no outstanding chairman; hours were wasted in futile talk and procedural snarls which a good chairman could have avoided. The member nations must be prepared to send better representatives. From the standpoint of world peace the U. N. must be considered a top-policy matter.

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Those British "Loafers"

LECTURING the British is a popular pastime these days. American politicians, publicists, and business men are telling John Bull that he should get back to work instead of leaning so heavily on Uncle Sam. Assiduously the impression is being spread that Britain's industry is wound up in red tape; that its chief activity is the production of forms; that British workers are sitting on their hands; that nationalization of industry has failed hopelessly and is leading to chaos.

It is about time, I think, that we took a look at the record to see what actually has been happening to Britain's economy since V-J Day. A useful summary is to be found in the September-October number of Labor and Industry in Britain.* The whole of this special issue is devoted to a sober factual "Report on Britain" which provides a needed corrective for some of the inaccurate stories published in this country.

In regard to developments in British industry since the end of the war, the report concludes: "The over-all picture . . . is of steadily expanding production in most fields of industrial activity. The shortages at home are due not to inability to produce but to the unfortunate need to export a major part of output to pay for essential imports." I shall devote this article to quoting some of the evidence supporting this statement.

The actual working population of Britain at the end of June was only 2.45 per cent higher than in June, 1938, after deducting from the gross figures at both dates the men in the armed forces and the unemployed. Yet in its issue of August 2 the Economist, a magazine not given to over-optimism, estimated that total national output was 10 to 20 per cent higher than in the pre-war year. This clearly means that productivity per man in industry as a whole is improving, not deteriorating. Figures of output per man-hour for separate industries are not readily available in Britain, but the following table taken from the October Bulletin of the Oxford Institute of Statistics shows that in a number of trades some very striking advances have been made since the war.

OUTPUT PER MAN-HOUR

	1938	July, 1945	Oct., 1946
Iron ore.....	100	125	129
Pig iron	100	95	105
Tinplate	100	153	197
Bricks	100	47	110
Tile	100	53	81
Cotton spinning.....	100	95	99
Cotton weaving.....	100	81	97
Rayon yarn.....	100	145	156

The marked improvement, even in those cases where productivity lagged below pre-war standards, between July, 1945, when reconversion had barely begun, and October, 1946, will be noted. The industries with the poorest records are those in which production was deliberately reduced during the war. Their low productivity was partly a reflection of the high average age of the workers that had been left to them. In the case of cotton textiles war-time depletion of the labor force is still the chief factor holding down both total output and output per man-hour. Before the war wages in this industry were low, underemployment was chronic, plants were antiquated, and conditions unpleasant. Consequently, many textile operatives who shifted to war plants have been reluctant to return to their old factories.

For this reason cotton and to a lesser extent wool still remain dark spots in Britain's industrial picture. But in nearly every other industry total production is well above pre-war and in a number of cases the advance has been very striking indeed. Thus the tonnage of merchant shipping under construction in September was nearly two and a half times the 1938 monthly average. In the latest periods for which figures are available output of trucks was 192 per cent of the 1938 average, of freight cars 140 per cent, of farm tractors 525 per cent, of superphosphate 180 per cent. Most important of all, perhaps, is the mounting output of steel, which in the week ending October 25 exceeded the previous all-time record of "Dunkerque week."

Such figures suggest that British industry is not quite as decadent as some Americans assert. Even in coal-mining, the chief butt of the critics, the corner seems to have been turned. Since the National Coal Board took over the mines on January 1, 1947, total output has been some five million tons greater than in the comparable period of 1946. In the week ending November 8 production was 97 per cent of the 1938 average, though the available working force was considerably lower. Since the five-day week was introduced last May, absenteeism has declined and over-all output per man-shift risen. Now the miners have voluntarily agreed to extend their working hours and have also withdrawn their opposition to the use of foreign labor. During the coming year some 30,000 European immigrants are expected to enter the pits, and this additional man-power, coupled with the new machinery which is being installed as part of the Coal Board's modernization program, should mean a steady improvement in production.

Government plans called for a coal stockpile at the beginning of the winter season of 15,000,000 tons—50 per cent above 1946. Actually on October 31 more than 16,250,000 tons were on hand; so that there is good reason to hope that Britain will avoid another "winter crisis" and next year will again be contributing to Europe's fuel needs. Plans call for the export of six million tons, which will be an important aid to recovery on the Continent as well as a valuable item in Britain's export trade.

The British, then, if by no means out of the woods, are not lying down and waiting to be rescued. They are working, and working hard, on a lower average diet than they experienced in the worst days of the war. They deserve, it seems to me, a little less nagging and a little more appreciation of their accomplishments and understanding of their problems.

Boston as Symbol

THE PROPER BOSTONIANS. By Cleveland Amory. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.50.

IN 1828 Bronson Alcott, who had peddled Yankee notions in Virginia and New York, approached at last, in breathless awe, the city of Boston. It surpassed his dearest hopes. "There is a city in our world," he was soon to write, "upon which the light of the sun of righteousness has risen. . . . It is the same from which every pure stream of thought and purpose and performance emanates. It is the city that is set on high. It cannot be hid. It is Boston!" This was indeed Athens, with culture, Mr. Emerson, and the Athenaeum.

In 1855 a more realistic student of "Anglo-Saxon" Boston, himself one of its intellectual glories, declared it the central battleground of all America, "for here the two extremes meet in closest contact, in sternest strife." To Theodore Parker Boston was Athens not so much because it produced culture as because it generated passion and conflict. Respectable Bostonians could then drag Garrison through the streets with a rope around his neck, burn a convent, finance half the railroads in America, outsmart bankers everywhere, and formulate the manifestos of liberal Protestantism. Parker, the far from temperate leader of one extreme, had a name for the other: "Call that opposition Hunkerism; call the opponents Hunkers." Hunkers obliged their foes to show a vigor equal to their own: "Talk about the Catholics voting as the bishop tells! . . . There are a great many bishops who never had a cross on their bosom, nor a mitre on their head, who appeal not to the authority of the Pope at Rome but to the Almighty Dollar, a pope much nearer home." Nineteenth-century Boston, in short, was a boom town, plenty tough, and thus it made both history and money.

By now all this seems far away and long ago. What could have made Alcott lyrical or Parker furious? Old-family Boston, State Street Boston, proper Boston, is no longer culture or Hunker-ism; it is comedy. It is the last Puritan, George Apley, and the old lady who goes to California by way of Dedham. It is peopled with amusing eccentrics, who above all have no relation to present social problems. It is an island of complacency, almost as ideal a refuge for nostalgia as Father Day's parlor. It has achieved the apotheosis of a literary stereotype, a theme for witty books that undoubtedly circulate more copies in Omaha than in South Boston.

It ought to be a commonplace of scholarship—too often it is forgotten—that a literary convention on this level of popularity is primarily a creation of the public that embraces it. The lay figure may bear no close or even any resemblance to the subject he is supposed to represent; he is a symbol of what the audience wants, not of the fact. Buffalo Bill was an invention of American mythology, only incidentally Colonel Cody. Sometimes the Colonel Cody strives to merge himself with the legend until he ceases to have any self, but often the original, if he can keep his mouth shut, finds a certain protection, not to say profit, in the existence of his alter ego.

For reasons that it would take a sociological treatise to expound, the banker and the merchant no longer become heroes very easily. This may be disconcerting; Hunkers prospered enormously while being denounced as Hunkers, but can they operate with confidence when they are supposed to be on the way out? Then it begins to appear that the new figure of comedy will do as well as, maybe even better than, the image of the Hunker. Any group will try to survive, by one means if not by another. Against a declining economy or against new competitors, if it can be established as quaint and queer, it may remain as a fixture. So Boston society, to judge by the documentation, appears to be offering itself up as a willing sacrifice. Again it is pioneering a stage in the history of the middle class by arraying itself before the delighted public as a curiosity, an almost extinct but still amusing species in the American zoo.

Actually, of course, it is doing nothing of the sort. But the legend serves, and perhaps internal tension in Boston can be handled behind this façade more neatly than in Detroit. There is indeed a local idiom, but the realities of Boston, as experience teaches and Mr. Gunther confirms, are astonishingly like those of Chicago. Ultimately one most regrets the vogue of this convention because among readers in other parts of the nation it encourages the superstition that regional differences are fundamental. It obscures the fact that they all grew up in the age of Hunkerism.

The latest addition to this literature of Boston is Mr. Amory's "The Proper Bostonians." It is weak on history but rich in anecdote, and written con amore. It is great fun to read for about half of it—any half. Thereafter this convention, like any other convention of local-color fiction, like Bret Harte's miners or Colonel Carter of Cartersville, when kept going too long, becomes repetitious and tedious.

PERRY MILLER

Making the Record Clear

THIS IS PEARL! THE UNITED STATES AND JAPAN—1941. By Walter Millis. William Morrow and Company. $4.

AN EARLIER book by Mr. Millis, "The Martial Spirit," was an ironic and admirable study of the way we got into the war with Spain and destroyed Cervera's fleet, stormed San Juan Hill, and in general carried out the instructions of Manifest Destiny. Mr. Millis was very severe in his criticism both of the Hearst press, which he thought was mainly responsible for the war, and of the bungling but finally successful efforts of our admirals and generals to assert our superiority over the ill-equipped forces of the Queen Regent.

"This Is Pearl!" is a ripper and wiser book. It tells two stories—one of the diplomatic negotiations which led up to the Japanese attack on our Pacific fleet, the other of the incredible lack of preparation at Pearl Harbor, which alone made the attack a success. The two stories are interwoven with the skill of a Dumas; by frequent references to the Japanese preparations—their task force was assembling in the Kuriles, it was steaming toward Oahu, its planes were warming up on the flight decks—he gives heightened significance to the account of the negotiations in Washington.

It is typical of the disillusionment which has already seized America that some people now contend that President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull deliberately "forced" the Japanese to attack us and with Machiavellian cunning left the commanders on Oahu uninformed so that the Japanese attack would succeed. The object, we are told, was to get us into the war with Germany, and the Roosevelt-haters have not dropped the story, even though Hitler and Mussolini followed up Pearl Harbor by declaring war on us.

Any decent American feels unclean from merely setting down such calumnies, and we are all in debt to Mr. Millis for making the record clear. There are, as he admits, gaps in his narrative, and the publication of all the documents in the archives of the State Department and the Combined Chiefs of Staff will no doubt alter some details. But the many volumes of the Pearl Harbor investigation, together with the memoirs of Grew, General Brereton, and others, were available to Mr. Millis, and this would appear to be the definitive account, for our time at least.

Mr. Millis is convinced that the July 25 order freezing all Japanese assets in the United States rather than Secretary Hull's note of September 26 was the turning-point of the negotiations, and that from then on the Japanese militarists, who had been torn between the northward program against Russia and the southern program against the Dutch, the British, and ourselves, knew what they had to do. He emphasizes his belief that economic sanctions, instead of slowing up the militarists, only made them hasten their preparations, and he thus seems to uphold the State Department's policy of not cutting off scrap iron or oil until the eleventh hour.

All in all, Mr. Millis's account must inevitably increase the world's respect for the President and his Secretary of State. He concedes that they followed "policies which, under all the circumstances, made the Japanese attack virtually inevitable," but adds that, to his mind, "the Roosevelt Administration had no other choices than those which it successively took." In view of the sentiments expressed at the time by Herbert Hoover, Charles A. Lindbergh, et al., which Mr. Millis rescues from oblivion to explain the difficulties of standing up to aggression, Americans can congratulate themselves that they had such leaders—and that the folly of the Japanese attack vindicated their leadership.

Not all was perfect, of course, in Washington. It was a loosely knit government, and Mr. Stimson did not know until the next day whether Mr. Hull had actually delivered the first United States note. Since we were intercepting and decoding all the Japanese instructions to their Washington envoys, the failure of the War and Navy departments to require real preparedness at Pearl Harbor was a blunder. General Marshall and Admiral Stark were busy building up an army and navy to fight a year later, and their war plans and intelligence officers were not equal to their heavy responsibilities.

Still, as Mr. Millis points out, Short and Kimmel—together with Rear Admiral Block, commander of the Pearl Harbor base—had only to read the newspapers to know that war was approaching. As he says, they "somehow managed to violate nearly every precept of history and of military security, and thus to lay the great base as open as possible to the precise form of attack which all of them had recognized, theoretically, as the most to be feared." It is a shocking story. Americans have a right to be proud, however, of the G. I. on Oahu who spotted the attack by radar, of the navy lieutenant in Washington who tried to make the top brass understand the significance of the hour when the Japanese would give Mr. Hull their final answer—which was dawn at Pearl Harbor. Mr. Millis, incidentally, holds General MacArthur responsible for the still more inexplicable lack of preparedness in the Philippines, when the Japanese, hours later, followed up their attack on Pearl Harbor by destroying the precious B-17's on Clark Field.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON

and women of good-will and intelligence differ profoundly on the question. But none among them merits a more attentive hearing than Louis Fischer, who for twenty-five years has traveled up and down the planet, going wherever he might deepen and broaden his understanding. Many of those years were spent in the Soviet Union, and few other Americans, if any, are as well qualified as he is to sense the tendencies and assess the meanings of the Russian Revolution. The book under review deals largely with the Soviet challenge to democracy.

Mr. Fischer sees the crisis of our time as essentially moral. The choice, he thinks, is not between socialism and capitalism but rather between freedom and dictatorship. While recognizing the clear necessity of achieving radical institutional changes, he insists that we must at the same time hold fast to those things which are good—particularly individual integrity and respect for human beings. Like Victor Gollancz in "Our Threatened Values," Mr. Fischer is profoundly disturbed by the Western world's apparently growing callousness to brutality, cruelty, terror, and deceit. "Nothing in the nature of government or economics," he says, "can quickly inculcate a love of mankind." For him the old antithesis between good and evil, between dictatorship and democracy, is exemplified in the persons of Stalin and Gandhi.

The Bolsheviks seized power in 1917 under the banners of international socialism—a movement which in the course of several generations had endeavored to bring into a synthesis the essential values, insights, and energies of the Hebraic-Christian ethic, the humanistic tradition, scientific method, technology, and democracy. Although the dictatorship from the beginning cast a dark shadow over the prospect, the declaration of the revolutionary leaders that they were intent on abolishing forever the exploitation of man by man stirred the minds of idealists and raised the hopes of the oppressed everywhere. The passing of the years, however, was marked, not by a "withering away of the state" as the supreme coercive force in society, but rather by a steady growth of both the reach and the ruthlessness of the dictatorship. In Mr. Fischer's view, as long as the dictatorship was

Choices and Chances

GANDHI AND STALIN, by Louis
Fischer. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS book is concerned with the supreme issue of our time—the survival of the liberal, humanist, democratic tradition. That this tradition stands in great and growing peril in the contemporary world requires no labored documentation. Every issue of the daily paper bring fresh evidence of impending disaster.

The course to be followed to avert this disaster is by no means clear. Men recognized in Russia as a temporary and regrettable necessity, as it was in the early years, hope remained. But with the adoption of the new constitution in 1936, which actually changed nothing, despotism came to be called liberty and a monstrous fraud was perpetrated on mankind. At the same time nationalism was made the central value in Soviet theory and practice. As a result of these and other developments, according to Mr. Fischer, the line distinguishing communism from fascism was largely erased. "State control over all capital, plus secret-police dictatorship, plus nationalism," he writes, "are national socialism, even though its leaders speak in the name of the proletariat."

Mr. Fischer consequently regards as a perversion of truth the often-repeated pronouncement that the peoples of the world must choose between communism and fascism or between communism and reaction. This, he says, is no choice at all. The real choice is between dictatorship and democracy, and Soviet communism can be identified in no sense with the latter. In similar fashion he disposes of the well-worn suggestion that "we must meet the Russians halfway." He contends that we have already gone 90 per cent of the way—during the war, through lend-lease, at Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam, in Germany, Austria, Italy, and Korea. They have swallowed an empire in Eastern Europe. Apparently they are moving to swallow the rest of the Continent.

The fact is, according to the author, that the political struggle between dictatorship and democracy is well advanced. This struggle cannot stop before one or the other wins. To assume that they can cooperate in rebuilding the world is to engage in wishful thinking.

In order to win, democracy must be "true to itself" in all its operations. It must strive honestly and effectively to achieve "decent relations between countries and between persons." In the words of Gandhi, it must "turn the searchlight inward." At home it must enrich itself and apply its basic principles of individual worth and freedom to the entire range of institutions and human associations. In the economy this means a combination, experimentally determined, of public, private, and cooperative enterprise designed to bring security and opportunity to all while

FAMILY AND CIVILIZATION

By Carle C. Zimmerman, Associate Professor of Sociology, Harvard University.

A landmark in the literature of the human family, this scholarly, detailed study is the first book to develop a complete theory of the family. Following the development of the Western family from its beginning in history up to its present status and its possible future course, the author gives an explanation of family decay in such times as the present as revolutionary as it is logical. Here is a book of outstanding importance, not only for every sociologist, but for everyone who is interested in the problems of marriage and the family. $6.00 keeping a wide distribution of power.

Abroad democracy must repudiate even the appearance of imperialism and move as rapidly as possible toward some form of limited world government founded on international law, supported by an adequate police force, and devoted to the "advance of prosperity, personal freedom, and peace" everywhere. If possible, this should be done through the reform of the United Nations; if not, through some new international organization. Mr. Fischer is of the opinion that such a world government is "practically impossible" with Russia. He is prepared therefore to proceed without Russia. Only "international democracy," he says, "can win over national communism."

"Gandhi and Stalin" is a sober and honest, an informed and courageous book. The present reviewer continues to hope that the Politburo will change its course, but the current policies and practices of the Soviet dictatorship are not calculated to encourage this hope. On the contrary they serve only to strengthen Mr. Fischer's arguments and to reinforce the validity of his analysis and program.

GEORGE S. COUNTS

Drama

JOSEPH
KRUTCH

IN "Eastward in Eden" (Royale Theater) the author faces more than the normal hazards of the biographical play. In the first place, her subject is a poet, and poets are notoriously difficult to make convincing. In the second place, Emily Dickinson was a woman whom everyone is tempted to "explain" despite the unfortunate fact that explanation tends only to explain her away. Perhaps it is merely that her mystery is more interesting than any rational accounting for it can be. Or perhaps she lived in a self-imposed solitude because she was by congenital temperament a solitary, not because, to adopt the usual explanation, she was disappointed in a love which went out toward some shadowy but not impossible he. Perhaps, in a word, she knew in advance that she would inevitably be disappointed in any love she might be tempted to risk and so, poet like, reaped the fruits of an experience she never needed to have.

On some such assumption as this a play might possibly be written. The present author, Dorothy Gardener, has chosen instead to accept one of the current theories which puts Emily somewhat conventionally in love with a married minister who fails her to the extent that he follows his "duty" instead of following her. Miss Gardener brings him back, once in a dream and once, at the very end, in the flesh, when he comes, a dying man, to confess that he has never been able to forget her.

All this provides an obvious action and, on the whole, a not uninteresting one. It brings Emily down to earth. To some extent she is humanized and made less disturbing to contemplate. But it leaves at the very least a question still open. Ought the author of those poems to be humanized? Do we want the phenomenon robbed of its terror? Is it not equally probable as well as rather more impressive when we assume that Solitude Becomes Emily in just that same sense that Mourning Becomes Electra?

With these exceptions duly noted—and I think that they are very important ones—"Eastward in Eden" does nevertheless manage to sustain an interest and produce an effect. It certainly escapes, as few such plays do, an air of mere absurdity when the poet speaks some of the lines she was later to write; and if it does not actually create a heroine one feels to be great, it does create one who is not, like most poet or musician heroes, manifestly incapable of great works. Miss Gardener's Emily has eagerness and wit and charm even though one must take her genius on faith, and she engages our sympathy as a woman even though one must call upon what one knows to believe her a great poet as well. Nor can there be any doubt that Beatrice Straight, an actress but little known in New York, carries the very difficult burden of her role with extraordinary competence. It is, indeed, difficult to imagine just what the play would be without her. Thanks to her presence the central character is vivid enough and sympathetic enough to sustain the interest of an audience to the end.

To the inevitable practical question, Is that enough for Broadway? the answer, I fear, is no. Considered merely as a play, quite aside from its subject, "Eastward in Eden" is interesting but not quite interesting enough. To seem important, it needs the knowledge that its central character wrote certain memorable works, and I am not sure that the average spectator is wrong when he refuses to assume the responsibility of bringing with him into the theater any knowledge upon which the playwright can safely draw. A biographical play does not really justify itself except when it carries its own adequate proof that the subject really has heroic stature. Few biographical plays actually do that, and "Eastward in Eden," though it comes nearer than some, does not quite do it either.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE rising general level of advanced or "radical" art in this country is on the point of becoming a substantial fact. The even more rapidly declining general level of the standard expressionist-impressionist sort of painting that is shown so plentifully at the Whitney, Carnegie, and Pepsi-Cola annuals should not conceal this fact from us, should indeed make it even more visible, since the growing inferiority of the one serves to clear the air for the other. The issues become plainer, and the areas in which serious and ambitious modern art can still be produced, easier to define. Except in the hands of a few gifted individuals, survivors who gather up the threads of a previous generation, descriptive art is pretty well finished. Art, which succeeds in being good only when it incorporates the truth about feeling, can now tell the truth about feeling only by turning to the abstract. I do not say this out of dogmatism—art cannot be prescribed to—but only because the incidence of good art has become so much greater in the area of the abstract than elsewhere.

The most recent evidence to support the supremacy of the abstract was provided by Adolph Gottlieb's latest one-man show at the Kootz Gallery and Hedda Sterne's latest show at Betty Parsons's. The second show is even more striking testimony than the first, for whereas Gottlieb proved himself as a painter on a high level several years ago, Miss Sterne is now taking her first steps in abstract painting and would seem to have as yet little more to bring to bear than a delicate sensibility and a careful taste. Nevertheless, this show of hers contained at least five pictures whose sureness and originality lift them far above the general run of stuff on Fifty-seventh Street. Admittedly, this art lacks force—but force is not everything; there is also room for delicacy.

Miss Sterne's success is due principally to the instinct with which she fits her open and economical draftsmanship to the off-shades she favors in color: tans, ochers, gray-whites, off-blues. Everything is handled with a nice flatness, an insistence on keeping the picture very close to its surface that insures decorative unity before anything else. Miss Sterne's art is not quite enough as yet; there is a danger that it will content itself with decorative successes: the effect is of panels rather than of easel-pictures. More emphasis is required, and more "ideas." None the less the chief issue at the present moment lies in the high level her painting reaches. And her level is her triumph.

Adolph Gottlieb, though still confining himself to his formula—a set of juxtaposed rectangles on which hieroglyphic forms are inscribed—increases in strength as well as felicity with every new show. That he can get the variety he does within the narrow and too decorative design to which he limits himself becomes more and more surprising. Two of his new canvases—the large "Water, Air, Fire," with its novel color, and "The Oracle"—achieve a power that belies the timidity we otherwise feel too frequently in his work. And "Vigil of Cyclops" and "Pursuer and Pursued"—the latter a departure in the direction of deep, translucent color—also succeed, with less force.

Gottlieb is perhaps the leading exponent of a new indigenous school of symbolism which includes among others Mark Rothko, Clifford Still, and Barnett Benedict Newman. The "symbols" Gottlieb puts into his canvases have no explicit meaning but derive, supposedly, from the artist's unconscious and speak to the same faculty in the spectator, calling up, presumably, racial memories, archetypes, archaic but constant responses. Hence the archaeological flavor, which in Gottlieb's painting seems to come from North American Indian art and affects design and color as much as content. I myself would question the importance this school attributes to the symbolical or "metaphysical" content of its art; there is something half-baked and revivalist, in a familiar American way, about it. But as long as this symbolism serves to stimulate ambitious and serious painting, differences of "ideology" may be left aside for the time being. The test is in the art, not in the program.

Gottlieb has produced enough successful pictures by now to demonstrate that he has an original and valid gift. These pictures of his aspire, however, to be more than minor successes; in some of them at least one senses the possibilities of a large art. It is just here that dissatisfaction intervenes—dissatisfaction with a policy of limited objectives. It is as if Gottlieb might go on forever refining, dividing, and elaborating a sensation that remains identical throughout. Each painting is different, it is true, but the difference becomes the less essential part. The design, which is always the same in principle and which—notwithstanding the subtlety and surprising range of Gottlieb's mat, Indian-like color—always delivers the main blow, assures the artist a certain safety that he should neither desire nor need. However numerous the sub-sensations he can discover within this safety, they count only as the phrases of a single statement. We have the right to ask of Gottlieb that he tax himself to say more.

a help in achieving it: the timing and force of one sound in such a coherent progression strongly implies, for the players, the timing and force of the next, so that sounds fall into place in the succession with inevitability and ease. But each new performance is a newly created series of sounds which do not come out exactly the same as the last time; hence the need of not only marshaling the flow along but watching over it and controlling it. For this he uses gesture—principally the plastic, sensitive movements of his right arm (with its extension to the point of the baton), which delineate the flow in much of its subtly inflected detail, and literally conduct the orchestra through it—their effectiveness in this being due not only to their explicitness in conveying his desire at every moment, but to the compelling personal force which they also convey. While the right arm makes these marshaling movements the left is in constant activity of a different kind as the instrument of the watchfulness and control—exhorting, quieting, warning, suppressing. All this is fascinating to watch as the unself-conscious operation of complete competence; it is also moving as the manifestation of powers like none we have encountered or are likely to encounter again; and it is moving for an additional reason: not only is every movement completely equal to the situation, but it never is more than equal to it; those extraordinary powers operate, then with an economy that is an honesty in relation to the situation and material; and in this way the performance is, in addition to everything else, a moral experience which is intensely moving.

What I thought Bernstein might learn from watching Toscanini is to do no more than he needs for what he wants. And what led me to this thought was Bernstein's conducting of the New York City Symphony in a performance of Beethoven's Second, which struck me at times as being far in excess of what was needed. The orchestra might be moving along with a clear tendency that required only a confirming indication—instead of which he suddenly wound himself into a Koussevitzkyan paroxysm—and this to achieve a crescendo from p to mf. What happened in such a case was that the orchestra disregarded the paroxysm and produced the

IT IS evident from Leonard Bernstein's conducting movements that he has watched and learned from Koussevitzky; and it seems to me that he would do well now to watch and learn from Toscanini.

From my observation of Toscanini I would describe his objective in performance as the realization of the composer's intention, as he understands it from the printed score, in a plastically coherent flow of sound in time. Once having set such a flow in motion he marshals it along, watches over it, controls it to make it come out as he planned. The strong plastic coherence of the flow is mf it was supposed to produce—which is to say that at that moment Bernstein was not really conducting the orchestra but carrying on a performance of his own.

At the same concert Bernstein gave the first New York performance of Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto, much of which is like a caricature of Prokofiev's piano concerto style in the way it flings itself about on the piano. The soloist was a new French pianist, Samson Francoix, who increased the effect of caricature with his spectacular flinging of his hands about.

In striking contrast to this outpouring of facile brilliance was the playing of Greta Sultan in a Haydn sonata, in which a powerful musical intelligence created a musical continuity from one sound to the next that held one's attention from the first sound to the last. The first movement of Beethoven's Opus 111 did not come out well: as I recall it the approach was too analytical and there were technical insufficiencies. But in the second movement there was again a sustained continuity that was wonderfully effective.

The Griller Quartet, when I heard it last year in a broadcast from the Frick Collection, impressed me as first-rate. And so I was entirely unprepared for performances of Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 3 at the opening New Friends of Music concert and Mozart's K. 421 at the Y. M. H. A. in which the first violin played with disturbing affectation in phrasing and with faulty pitch. The Hindemith String Trio No. 2 played at the New Friends concert by Alexander Schneider, Milton Katims, and Benar Heifetz was characteristically ugly and arid; with the exhaustive survey of Hindemith's chamber music the New Friends audience is in for an unpleasant year.

Thomas Scherman, in the one concert of his series with his Little Orchestra that I have heard, revealed genuine powers as a musician with his conceptions of the works he played, his shaping of them, his tempos and phrasing, and as a conductor, with the way he got the orchestra to execute his conceptions, and in particular the way he carried it though so unfamiliar and difficult a work as Schönberg's Kammer-symphonie. What he seems to lack is any capacity to estimate value or interest in music for the purpose of making programs; and I will rest my case on the program I heard: a Bruckner string quintet—boring to the point of being lethal; a Leclair concerto for flute and strings—with no more than a mild charm that was extinguished by the flute-playing of René Le Roy, whose technical difficulties with his instrument made it impossible for him even to play in correct time and in step with the orchestra; a new harp concerto by Norman Dello Joio—completely without musical interest; Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp—one of the most undistinguished of his jobs of commissioned hackwork; and the Schönberg Kammer-symphonie. This was the one work of real consequence of the entire program—but largely by virtue of the impressive powers that were involved in it, rather than by the artistic communication these powers produced. And this, for me, is not good program-making.

The Shape of Things

IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, THE BRITISH made certain things clear: They would lay down the Palestine mandate when they pleased; until they did, they would govern and maintain order exclusively through their own agencies; they would withdraw their forces at whatever times and places they found it convenient to do so. This attitude obviously precluded any U. N. intervention until the mandate was ended, and imposed upon the government of Palestine an inescapable responsibility to keep order with all the forces at its disposal. Events of the first week following the adoption of partition indicate that Britain either will not or cannot do so. Arab attacks on Jews and Jewish property, mounting as the days pass, have been carried out with little interference from British troops or police. Haganah, the Jewish defense force, with occasional support from hastily formed Arab civil guards, has tried to suppress riots and prevent clashes. But the British have gone so far as to interfere with Haganah's efforts, and to arrest and even fire on its members, on the ground that it has no authority to exercise police functions. Meanwhile, Syria threatens full-fledged war, as the Arab states meet in Cairo to determine their policy toward partition. What the situation needs is firmness and clear evidence that the British intend to cooperate in the implementation of the United Nations plan. The Arabs will accept partition only if they know the decision of the Assembly has the unqualified backing of the other nations; they will keep order only if they know order will be enforced. If the British fail to act, they will share responsibility with the Arabs for sabotaging the Palestine solution.

OUR ADMIRATION AND RESPECT FOR THE National Association of Manufacturers is not exactly overwhelming, but we must admit that for bounce and brass it has no living rival, except possibly the Politburo. After its performance in 1946, when it loudly assured the public that the OPA was the only obstacle to higher production and lower prices, we had expected the N. A. M. to be a little diffident about making new pronouncements on inflation. Not at all! It is right back on its old stand in New York's Waldorf Astoria, ready to sell the only genuine and infallible cure for inflation. We have, unfortunately, insufficient space to analyze in detail the twelve-point program submitted by President Earl Bunting to the Fifty-second Congress of American Industry sponsored by the organization. It advocates moderate foreign relief but urges that foreign-reconstruction loans be financed through the World Bank or by private sources rather than by means of taxes. How increased competition in capital markets will discourage inflation, the program does not explain. It suggests, however, that interest rates should "seek their own levels free of government domination"—a step which might serve to damp down credit expansion but only by adding to the cost of the national-debt service and so offsetting much of the government economy demanded by the association. While all the experts agree that reduced taxes at this time would add to inflationary pressures, the N. A. M. demands a substantial cut in individual income taxes. Turning to its own special field, the association proposes that unions forgo further wage demands unrelated to increased productivity and that management strive for lower unit costs and pass on the benefits to the customers. An admirable idea, this last suggestion; but although we know of many manufacturers who have reduced costs, we have heard of very few who have cut prices unless forced to do so by consumer resistance.

AS LONG AS BIG BUSINESS RETAINS ITS RIGID orthodoxy, it is almost inevitable that labor should display similar inflexibility. The net result is a cause-and-effect cycle of inflation that is bringing us closer by the week to disaster. The latest step in the process is Philip Murray's announcement that the C. I. O. is about to launch a drive for the third round of wage increases since the war. There is no doubt that the unions make an excellent case. As Murray points out, industrial wage-earners may find more dollars in their pay envelope than they did two years ago, but in terms of purchasing power they are poorer by some 18 per cent; Secretary of Labor Schwollenbach testifies, on the other hand, that profits, already swollen to record volume, continue to outstrip real wages, which "have not regained what they lost in the decontrol period." Regardless of the precise degree to which either high prices or increased wages are the responsible factor in the spiral, it is a simple fact that labor is willing to see controls applied to both. Business, for the most part, is not. Schwollenbach implies that labor will probably call off its demands for new wage increases if it is given "some real assurance that price rises will be checked." economic consultant to the C. I. O., is even more pointed. Given a 15 per cent cut in the cost of living, he told the Senate Banking Committee, there would be only the most "dubious" case for further pay rises. And Murray himself is known to favor the President's anti-inflation program, which includes wage controls in "special cases." The C. I. O. chief may be sending up a trial balloon, as his opponents suggest, but if it serves to frighten industrialists into accepting a program of controls, it will prove a highly patriotic maneuver.

LABOR'S NEW MAGNA CHARTA, AS THE TAFT-Hartley act is known in good Republican circles, has just produced a few major freedoms. Invoking the Communist-oath provision, the National Labor Relations Board has freed the Remington-Rand corporation from any further obligation to deal with the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, a C. I. O. union that includes the great majority of the company's employees in its membership. It has freed a small independent machinists' union, claiming only an insignificant fraction of the company's employees, to contend for the right to represent all of them in collective bargaining, unhampered by having its rivals on the ballot. And it has freed the members of the U. E. itself to revert to the pre-Wagner-act law of the jungle, namely, recourse to strikes without benefit of collective bargaining. There is little doubt that this particular union is vulnerable under the anti-Communist provision, and the unwillingness of its high officers to sign the required affidavit is easily understood. But the issue far transcends the political views of a handful of men at the top of a union. What is decided today with respect to the U. E. can be applied tomorrow to the United Mine Workers under Lewis and the Steelworkers under Murray, neither more of a Communist than J. Parnell Thomas. Acting under the law, the board is inviting the kind of industrial chaos that ripped the country in the early thirties. The irony of the situation is that the provision which opens up this dismal vista is one that even Senator Taft tried to eliminate, its legality being extremely dubious. The hope is that the Supreme Court, when it inevitably reviews the law, will decide, first, that members of a legal party, however obnoxious, cannot be denied equal protection under the law; and, second, that the rank and file of a union must not be penalized for the attitudes and decisions of a union hierarchy.

DURING THE PAST TWO WEEKS, THE PUBLIC has been given an instructive lesson in the logic of anti-communism. At the time of the Washington hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the New York Herald Tribune's Heptisax expressed the opinion that the committee was violating rights secured by the Constitution. Shortly after his article appeared, however, the motion-picture industry, under the goading of Eric Johnston, decided to discharge or "suspend" the writers, directors, and producers who had been marked by the committee. After pondering this decision for a while, Heptisax realized that he could hardly justify the action of the industry in terms of what he had previously said about the committee. Driven into a corner, he proceeded to qualify his earlier conclusions. "For the sake of our own intellectual integrity," he writes, "I think we'll have to 'finger' the reds and call them 'the enemy' by legislative action"; that is, outlaw the Communist Party. Others who have criticized the committee but upheld the action of the industry will be driven by the logic of their position to similar or even more drastic proposals. And why not? For such conclusions, applied to Communists or to other groups holding unpopular views, follow quite logically once it is conceded that a Congressional committee of inquiry has the right to inquire into an individual's political beliefs and affiliations. In short, anti-communism is a one-way through street. Once you enter it you either proceed to the end or you back out—quickly.

YOU CAN FOOL SOME OF THE PEOPLE SOME of the time, but you can't fool the good people of Massachusetts forever, as a recent event there shows. Five years ago, stunned by what Paul Blanshard in these pages has called "one of the most fantastic campaigns of misrepresentation in the history of American politics," Massachusetts voters rejected, by a seven-to-five margin, a revision of the law which would permit doctors to give birth-control information to married women for the protection of life or health. Now, in response to a new drive conducted by the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts, more than 80,000 citizens of the state have filed petitions with the Secretary of State asking that the question of amending the law go on the agenda of the Legislature which convenes in January. The number of signatures required for such an action is only 20,000. But all over the state, the League reports, "hundreds of volunteers sprang into action to obtain signatures. . . . [It is a] truly democratic expression of public opinion. . . . Tribute should be paid to the hundreds of town and city clerks and registrars of voters who co-operated so splendidly in certifying so promptly the thousands of signatures." The Roman Catholic church in Massachusetts, as Mr. Blanshard also reported, has started its usual counter-offensive against this move. But leaders of the movement have high hopes that it will become law, at long last, by referendum in November of 1948, if the Massachusetts Legislature surrenders to the threat of clerical political power before then.

Displaced Americans

WHEN we think of Navajos, we think of blankets with beautiful figures executed in strong bright colors, the product, it would seem, of a vigorous and contented people. Set beside that picture, please, you Americans who think you have "taken care" of the Indians, another picture containing a quite different set of figures. To wit:

There are 60,000 Navajo Indians, though there were only 9,000 or 10,000 when they were settled on their reservation after the treaty of 1868. They are a vigorous people. The present reservation comprises 24,000 square miles of land. Even allowing for great stretches of desert, that would seem to be enough for 60,000 people. It was, for a time, when the Navajos were free to build up their flocks of sheep. But in 1933 it was found that the range on which their prosperity was based was rapidly being destroyed by over-grazing. There followed a reduction and conservation program. It saved, or will save, the land, but it reduced the Navajos to a poverty so abject that it is not even picturesque. This poverty was disguised in the thirties by allotments of money from WPA, PWA, and CCC; in the war years, by the availability of jobs off the reservation even for untrained Indians with scarcely any English, by the allotments of men in the services—3,600 Navajos served in the war and 300 died—by the high prices for what wool and lambs there were.

Now the false prosperity has faded like a mirage and poverty has taken over. Today, thousands of Navajos are literally facing starvation. The diet of the tribe as a whole averages 1,200 calories, against 3,450 for Americans generally, against 1,500 for Germans in the American zone. Today, the resources of the reservation, vast though it is, can support only 25,000 of the 60,000. Only 161 out of 11,000 Navajo families own herds large enough to maintain life even at the subsistence level.

By the treaty of 1868, the government is obligated to provide medical care and to furnish adequate school facilities and a teacher for every thirty Navajo children. Yet on the whole reservation there are only six hospitals with 316 beds for general patients and 135 for tuberculosis patients—the tuberculosis death rate in the sunny land of the Navajos is fourteen times the rate for the whole United States. There are no field doctors. The experts disagree on the number of field nurses on the reservation. Some say one, some say two!

Of about 25,000 children of school age, fewer than 6,000 can be accommodated, and these go to overcrowded schools manned by overworked teachers.

Most of these facts are taken from an article by Oliver La Farge in Harper's for November. "The only solution to the Indian problem," says Mr. La Farge, "is to build up their health, their economic condition, and their competence until we can honestly say that they no longer need special care and federal protection." He proposes a long-range program which would make the Navajos self-supporting on or off the reservation. The development of all the irrigable land on the reservation would provide permanent, stable livelihoods for about 5,000 of the 11,000 families. Education and training would make it possible for those who cannot subsist or do not wish to stay on the reservation to make their living elsewhere.

The House Public Lands Committee has now drafted a bill to provide $2,000,000 for immediate relief, and there is at least a chance that it will be passed during the present session. Write your Congressman. Meanwhile, President Truman has said that he will ask Congress to enact in the January session a ten-year program designed to lift the standard of the Indians to the level of other Americans. It is high time.

Behind the French "Insurrection"

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE waves of strikes in France, accumulating last week-end to a threatening crest, seem to be subsiding. As we go to press, representatives of the General Confederation of Workers and the Minister of Labor are discussing terms of settlement. But if Americans greet the end of the so-called "insurrection" with an accurate idea of what it was all about, it will not be the fault of their press and radio. With a few creditable exceptions, American newspapers and broadcasts have played down all the issues except the one that suits the dominant pattern of anti-Russian fanaticism.

I have read five editorials in the New York Times published between December 1 and December 7—the days of greatest tension in France. Not one of them discusses the level of wages or the effects of inflation. Not one mentions hunger. Not one even deals with the general economic plight of the country. What the Times has concentrated on, as have most of its contemporaries, is the Communist threat implicit in the whole strike movement. Since the Communists themselves openly acknowledge their political objectives and since their demonstration of power is undoubtedly a threat to orderly government, one cannot quarrel with the press for driving these points home and emphasizing their significance. What one can quarrel with is its failure to explain why two million French workers flocked into the streets, tying up services and production, on the decision of a group of leaders whose revolutionary purposes they share only to a limited extent. Or its failure to point out that even the leader of the non-Communist wing of the C. G. T., the redoubtable Léon Jouhaux, who is heading up the "workers' force" revolt against Communist control of the federation, has steadfastly defended the right of organized labor to strike against starvation wages and insufficient rations. Communist tactics are by-products—not causes—of an economic situation and economic policies which have pressed so heavily on the city workers of France that they are ready to risk everything rather than continue to endure without protest their growing misery and sense of frustration.

A FEW correspondents have, it is true, brought out a few of the underlying facts in occasional news stories from France; one of the most conscientious, incidentally, has been Charles R. Hargrove of the Wall Street Journal. But the best analysis of the economic background of the strikes was given by I. F. Stone, writing from Washington, in PM. Stone quoted the Herter report to Congress to the effect that the present French bread ration of 200 grams (about 8 ounces), is "lower than the lowest official ration under the German occupation," while the average city worker must spend from 70 to 80 per cent of his income on food. An unskilled laborer receives only 295 francs a day, and the daily diet is estimated to cost 290 francs.

The situation was bad enough when the Herter committee presented its figures. It is much worse now. The attempt of the French government to balance the budget has sent living costs shooting up. To quote from Mr. Stone's story:

Cost-of-living subsidies were abandoned. Two days later, price controls were removed from 473 items. Five days later, gas and electricity rates were raised 45 per cent, railroad and subway fares 25 per cent, and freight charges 28.5 per cent. The price of coal went up from 1,160 francs a ton to 2,160 francs a ton. The price of bread went up from about 15.5 francs a kilogram (2.2 pounds) to 24 to 28 francs.

All this since November 7.

Undoubtedly, those papers which have insisted on the "purely political purposes" of the strike movement will attribute its collapse "purely" to the French government's strong measures. Again they will be wrong. The emergency powers granted by the Assembly, the heavy penalties imposed on sabotage and violence may contribute to the subsidence of violence. But only because other tactics—tactics of conciliation and restraint on the part of responsible officials on both sides—are beginning to reduce tension and isolate the extremists. Hunger, too, which drove the workers into the streets, will help drive them back to the plants when they see that the government is making a genuine effort to meet their legitimate demands.

Whether the strikes will end in a troubled truce or in a real armistice depends on many things outside the control of the workers or their leaders. Internally, it depends on the capacity of the government to halt inflation without lowering still farther the standard of living of the urban workers. That it can accomplish this before American relief arrives in quantity is most unlikely. What is needed in France is more food and more production generally. Only then will prices drop and wages seem worth working for. Meanwhile, Daniel Mayer, the Socialist Minister of Labor, has promised to establish a wage-price relationship to cover the first six months of 1948; he sticks to the former, so-far-unacceptable offer of a 1,500 franc monthly inflation bonus. The C. G. T. is asking for a review of cost-of-living and wage rates every three months and a bonus of 2,500 francs. The differential is not too wide to be bridged by a reasonable compromise, and one may be reached within a few days.

But the long-range hope of political and industrial peace depends upon Washington. The adoption by Congress of the emergency-aid measure must be followed by quick action. And it must be the sort of action that will rebut the Communist argument that American capital is plotting to dominate the Continent. The visit to Paris of John Foster Dulles and his meeting with De Gaulle, however innocent its purpose may have been, was certainly ill-timed if the United States wants to convince the French people that it intends to keep its fingers out of their political affairs. During these weeks of bitter struggle, the Communists have undoubtedly weakened themselves by allowing Moscow's international objectives to overshadow so obviously the immediate and desperate needs of the French workers. But if they can now proclaim that the United States is dallying with De Gaulle and using relief as a carrot on a visible political stick, their own mistakes will begin to fade.

In London, too, the Russians have damaged their prestige and popularity with the French by openly bidding for German favor. But, again, if the American delegates try to harness France to their announced plan to step up production in western Germany, while ruling out the socialization of German industry, French Communists will be able to concentrate fire on this highly unpopular aspect of the Marshall Plan and distract attention, in part at least, from Russia's demand for a centralized German government.

The trouble in France is probably simmering down, but Americans must realize that it will not be ended by any show of force or ruthless policy of deflation. Political peace will come only if the great powers, but America above all, pursue a policy that offers a chance for economic recovery on terms the ordinary French worker can understand and trust.

THE OPTIMISTS

Mr. Denham Plays God

BY PAUL KLEIN

Washington, December 4

THE first emasculation of a labor union under the Taft-Hartley act took place here two weeks ago. It is unlikely that the National Labor Relations Board's general counsel will do much about it, for the union is that of his own employees and it was the counsel himself, Robert Denham, who performed the operation.

Since 1938 the board has had a working agreement with the independent NLRB Employees' Union. Although prohibited by law from the right to strike, the union has had a say in the posting of vacancies and in seniority and grievance regulations. The Civil Service Commission has taken the position that "a simple, orderly procedure should be provided within the department whereby it will be possible for the employee to present his grievances either individually or through representatives of his own choosing."

The old board operated under these general principles. But after the passage of the Taft-Hartley act, and the appointment of Denham, a change in policy developed. The new law does not clearly say the general counsel shall hire, fire, or promote personnel. The board, however, delegated those powers to him. Denham then hired several employees without regard to existing seniority practices, and without previously posting the vacancies for the information of lower-level employees.

The union protested, and Denham granted its representatives a brief conference on November 17. According to the union's transcript of the proceedings, Denham began negotiations by saying, "Let's get this straight; I'll agree to nothing; there is no place for agreements in the federal service. . . . Promotion and appointments are management prerogatives, and I don't propose, nor will I permit any of my subordinates, to agree to anything."

When the union asked if Denham intended to determine unilaterally in what instances vacancies would be posted, he replied, "Yes, unilaterally, if you want to put it that way." He added that he always seeks the most qualified person to fill a job. The union's reply was: "We want the best men in the jobs, too. . . . That is why we propose the continuation of the posting system. We hope to convince you that posting is an orderly way to achieve that end, and that selection could be based on certain predetermined standards of service and efficiency." Denham answered, "We don't have time for that." Nor for establishment of a grievance procedure, he added.

"Show me where I've made a mistake," he continually said. "I haven't made any mistakes yet." He closed the meeting with the words: "I will not justify my selections to anyone, and I will not permit anyone on my staff to justify or explain their selections to anyone."

Since that conference Denham has posted some vacancies and indicated that he will listen to grievances. But he emphasizes that this does not mean an agreement to do so; he will do it only when, as, and if he feels like it. The union has now asked the NLRB either to rescind the authority it gave to the general counsel or to condition it upon Denham's consent to bargain collectively. The request will probably not be granted; even if it should be, Denham may fight the matter through to a court decision, which some legal experts here think would go in his favor. It looks as if the man selected to handle the nation's labor affairs had succeeded in busting his own organization's union.

NONE of this should come as a surprise, in view of Denham's record and the new climate in the NLRB resulting from the Taft-Hartley legislation. Denham, of course, warmly advocated passage of the act. As a trial examiner in the old days, he dismissed a higher proportion of complaints than any of his colleagues. A former supervisor in the trials section of the NLRB estimated that 80 per cent of the complaints brought before an examiner resulted in a finding of unfair practice, since the charges were subjected to a thorough screening before they reached him. Denham's record was just about 80 per cent dismissals.

In 1943 a judge of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals described an action before Denham in these words: "We cannot agree that respondents have had a fair trial by a disinterested, impartial trier of facts. His general attitude was not impartial but partisan . . . [He] had a wholly improper attitude for a judge or examiner. . . . [His] remarks evidence bias and prejudice."

Since his appointment he has invoked injunctions in a relatively high number of cases, while giving lip-service to the doctrine that injunctions are dangerous. In one of these instances Denham's legal staff argued, in a District Court in Kentucky, that an injunction must be issued, without a hearing on the facts. The court replied that under this reasoning the next step would be to order injunctions over the telephone, and subsequently to omit the court altogether and issue injunctions at the whim of the labor board.

Complementing Denham's general attitude is his fondness for a highly technical administration of the labor act. He has kept his promise to Congress to fill every vacant regional director's post with an attorney. I heard here that he requested the resignation of one experienced West Coast director on the grounds that he didn't "want a layman at a post so far from Washington."

PAUL KLEIN is a law student at Columbia who writes occasionally for The Nation.

Orders issued from the general counsel's office have emphasized this trend, particularly the notorious G. C. Field Order 15, which provided that all unfair-labor-practice charges would be dropped unless a prima facie case were brought in and witnesses produced within seventy-two hours. Perhaps the best comment on the new legalistic regime was made recently by Dr. William Leiserson, a former member of both the NLRB and the National Mediation Board, who said the only helpful labor law is one which operates "in such a way that employers and workers or their ordinary bargaining representatives can present their cases in laymen's language, tell their stories, and question each other without legal technicalities. . . . The injection of lawyers . . . promises to retard . . . amicable settlements by collective bargaining, cooperative compromises, and mutual give and take." Yet the NLRB's current budget request calls for fifty new positions for lawyers.

Although as a trial examiner Denham often refused to apply the board's previously expressed rulings, and although as an employee of the NLRB under the Wagner act he felt justified in offering Congress suggestions for the new legislation, he testified before a Congressional committee that he would discharge anyone who opposed his administration: "If there is anyone on that staff who is unwilling to subscribe to the principles and policies and theory of the act as I conceive it to be, I don't want him around."

Many of Denham's decisions, in cases where racial questions have been raised, have been subjected to criticism. This feeling is based on such judgements as the one in which, as a trial examiner, he ignored the testimony of several Negroes and accepted that of a white witness. In his written draft report, in words later deleted, he explained this by saying, "Close and intimate contact with the Negro has taught the white [man] to recognize when a Negro is lying!"

The hostility he has aroused among associates was revealed when one said as he passed, "You've heard this before, but there, but for the grace of God, goes God."

America—1947

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, November 30

AMERICA bestrides the world like a colossus; neither Rome at the height of its power nor Great Britain in the period of its economic supremacy enjoyed an influence so direct, so profound, or so pervasive. It has half the wealth of the world today in its hands, it has rather more than half the world's productive capacity, and it exports more than twice as much as it imports. Today literally hundreds of millions of Europeans and Asiatics know that both the quality and the rhythm of their lives depend upon decisions made in Washington. On the wisdom of those decisions hangs the fate of the next generation.

Yet, seen from this tragic continent of Europe, powerful America does not appear to be a happy America. The main decision-making seems to be in the hands of those whose purpose is to return to the principles of that "golden age" when Coolidge was President and Herbert Hoover was preparing to tell the American people that the problem of poverty had been solved. The Republican Party is still fighting the shadow cast by Franklin Roosevelt's Presidency over the divine right of the business man to do what he will with his own. Business not only rejoices in incredible profits; it fights angrily for decreases in taxation so that the costs of government need not be borne by those who are in the higher brackets of income. In the Taft-Hartley act the Republican Party has sought to raise a barrier against further progress by the trade unions. It is trying to cripple strikes by the reintroduction of that judicial power of injunction which pre-war America believed the Norris-LaGuardia act had laid finally to rest. It is eager to break the hold of the TVA on the public mind; and those who have dreamed of a Missouri Valley Authority to match the remarkable achievements in the valley of the Tennessee will have no consolation except their right to dream for some time to come. There is to be no federal aid for education, urgently though it is needed. Not even the recrudescence of lynching will persuade this Congress to grapple with the corrupt electoral machines of the Southern states and their gangster tactics. If to these be added the hostility of the Republicans to the control of prices and their grave failure to tackle the problem of housing for tenants of small income, it becomes difficult to realize that we are approaching the nineteen-fifties, and that the nineteen-twenties are almost a generation away.

For the international policy of the American government both parties share responsibility, though the administrative responsibility belongs chiefly to Mr. Truman and his party. Here, obviously, there are credits to be entered, as well as debts. The American share in UNRRA was typical of that capacity to be magnanimous in a crisis which is a striking feature in the history of the United States. The Lilienthal plan for the control of atomic energy will be recognized, perhaps in the relatively near future, not only as an outstanding contribution to peace-making but as a supreme example of wisdom in international planning. I know of no effective case that has been made against it by Russia or by any other power. And I am convinced that the persistence of the American demand for justice for the pitiful remnant of European Jewry—in the face of Mr. Bevin's invective and despite some obvious faltering in the State Department—is the reason why the British government never dared to break the Zionist experiment into pieces and offer its ruins as a claim to the good-will of Arab feudal lords who are not only the sworn enemies of Great Britain but even more the sworn enemies of the purpose embodied in its government. That Mr. Bevin's record in Palestine is not worse than it is—and I say this while accepting to the full the condemnation of the unpardonable terrorism there—is due not to the courage of his colleagues but to the pertinacity of President Truman, which has kept him awake to the significance of American public opinion on this unhappy theme.

BUT the debits are heavy debits. From the conclusion of hostilities the American government has shown hardly a sign of grasping the big issue which confronts it—the need to achieve a modus vivendi with Russia. Russia has been suspicious, difficult, arrogant, secretive; yet its rulers have obviously recognized that the cost of victory has imposed a strain upon its internal economy which will not only take long years to overcome but leave it helpless, if alone, in another major war. That was why Russia sought to ring itself round with satellites; that was why its leaders resented the virtual monopoly of authority exercised by General MacArthur in Japan; that was why they observed with alarm the rearming of reaction in China; that was why, perhaps most vitally of all, the Russians watched so suspiciously the growth in the United States government of a determination both to rebuild Germany's industrial potential and to prevent its being socialized, when the alternative was inevitably its joint direction by big business in the United States and Germany.

No doubt all this has made Russian policy a matter which needed to be handled with imagination and courage. I do not see that the American government has so handled it. It has helped to create an anti-Russian feeling among its own people which has reached fantastic proportions, preventing them from realizing that to seek terms of friendship with Moscow is not the same thing as the appeasement of Hitler. It has encouraged most of the reactionary forces in Europe. It has punished Poland and Hungary and Czechoslovakia for not cutting themselves adrift from an alliance which is their main safeguard against counter-revolution. While it has denounced every Russian move as imperialist expansion, it has justified its own strategic imperialism as the defense of democracy and freedom; though it is difficult for a foreign observer to regard military subsidies to Greece and Turkey in this light. The full meaning of the Marshall Plan no one yet knows, but it is perfectly easy to see, even by the tenor of the debate in Congress, that help in the form of American credits may easily entail political subordination to the United States incompatible with the independence of the nations selected to be its beneficiaries. If the governments of countries where there are Socialist majorities, like Great Britain, should become so bound by the power of the dollar that they were compelled to act not under the conditions their peoples had chosen but under those American finance-capital was prepared to indorse, civil war could easily result all over Europe.

This is a long-term problem which Washington has not yet begun to face. America's productive capacity is so immense that the unbalance of world economy as between the Western and the Eastern Hemisphere means crisis after crisis, until there has been a large-scale integration of the present inequality. Europeans and Asiatics cannot sell to America unless they can buy from America; that means both an America which abandons its protective tariffs and a Europe and an Asia which gain rapidly in productive power. The first is obviously complicated enough; in spite of agreements at Geneva, it will require something like a surgical operation on the American business mind. The second, in my view, is only possible if the government of the United States is magnanimous and imaginative enough to devise a peace-time scheme of lend-lease which includes Soviet Russia. Without participating in such a scheme, neither Europe nor Asia will be able to continue buying goods from America; and that will mean, among other things, an American crash, even bigger than in 1929, or else an American New Deal which will make the effort of Franklin Roosevelt seem petty by comparison. As there is no serious evidence that either political party in the United States believes American business would support a great program of social experiment, the question—assuming peace is maintained—is not whether there will be depression in the United States, but when.

IT IS all this that makes so tragic the atomization of American liberalism. At the very moment when the world needs so urgently the corrective it could apply to the relentless and impersonal drive of the American economy, there is no organized movement of the left in America to supply it. I know that there are innumerable men and women of liberal faith in the United States—in Congress, like Senator Morse of Oregon, and out of it, like Leon Henderson and Mrs. Roosevelt. I know, too, that there are many inside the labor unions, both C. I. O. and A. F. of L. My point is that they all lack coherency of an organic kind. Anyone who examines the working of the P. A. C. during the Congressional elections of 1946 is bound to agree that it was just one more pressure group, trying, like the N. A. M. or the Roman Catholic church, to win pledges from the Republicans and Democrats, both nationally and locally. Not only are the liberal groups without any effective unity, but this lack minimizes their influence on the party machines.

It is perhaps an audacious thing to say, but I cannot avoid the suspicion that the present condition of American politics is above all a proof of the political immaturity of the American working class. I infer that not merely from the feebleness of the Socialist and Communist parties. I infer it even more from the fact that there is no effective intellectual differential between the two major political parties. Each of them is essentially a machine to capture power and, with power, jobs for its followers; and each offers to the electorate the candidates and the program which it thinks most likely to attain this end. To a foreign observer, for example, it is fantastic to watch Governor Dewey, whose passion to be in the White House is universally known, not only refusing to admit that he is a candidate for the nomination at the same time that he labors with all his might to organize his pre-convention support, but taking the greatest care to prevent the American people from knowing his views on any controversial subject lest this prejudice his chances of being chosen. Similarly remarkable is the spectacle of Governor Warren of California, breathing general goodwill but remaining obstinately silent on all the issues upon which he would have to give a lead if, as he hopes, a deadlocked convention should make him the Republican candidate next year. I do not think it can seriously be argued that omne ignotum pro magnifico is a valid principle of political action. An Englishman at least would be surprised if Mr. Eden kept silent upon a major political issue before the House of Commons on the ground that to speak might jeopardize his chance of succeeding Mr. Churchill as the leader of the Tory party.

No foreigner can look at the American political scene without realizing that a large-scale reorientation of political parties is overdue there. What is needed is either a genuine conservative party or a genuine liberal party; it is now an anachronism to rely upon the chance emphasis a new President will bring to his task as the one person who can be the effective leader of the nation. I would, indeed, go farther and say that the American Constitution is in need of wholesale revision, that both the institutions it has created and the operative formulas by which they live, not least the present division of power between Washington and the states, are historical anomalies which gravely hinder American development. Institutions, as they work, ought to be a source of popular political education; in their present condition those of the United States often have the effect of miseducation.

While I agree with Justice Frankfurter that the investigating power of Congress is an invaluable instrument, the range and strength of which it is desirable to maintain, one can hardly deny that this power is being recklessly abused. It was abused in the inquiry into the disaster at Pearl Harbor; it has been gravely abused by the Dies committee and its successor, the Rankin-Thomas committee. The hysteria of 1919 is not one of the most creditable episodes in American history, but the way in which anyone from a subscriber to Spanish Republican relief in 1938 to a member of the American Veterans' Committee in 1947 may find himself today regarded as dangerous and probably under the orders of Moscow would be pitiful if it were not so alarming. There are foolish people in the House of Commons and the French Chamber of Deputies; there are unworthy people, too. But neither body is so organized procedurally as to provide the foolish and unworthy with the instrumentalities necessary to make the greatest possible use of their bad qualities, giving them the power to spread poison out of all proportion to their strength. Nor must one forget the additional evil this involves in a time when the media of mass communication are so vital to the community.

TO THIS I add, with both hesitation and regret, my feeling that a good deal of what is most reactionary in the political and social life of America today is directly traceable to the influence of a militant Roman Catholic church, which is as much the expression of the purposes of a foreign power as any influence exerted by the Communist Party. No other body has the same grim responsibility for the tragic fate of the Spanish people. No other body has devoted itself so consistently to poisoning the relations between Russia and the United States. It protects child labor; it is building, from infant school to university, its own educational imperium in imperio. It has immense influence over the movie industry, not least where films of a political complexion are concerned. It plays a major part in the repression of freedom of speech. That it has done so little to make impossible the anti-Semitism of Father Coughlin or the adolescent gangsterism in Massachusetts and New York is a painful thing to anyone who remembers the large-mindedness of Archbishop Ireland and Monsignor Ryan. It is attempting with subtlety and skill to establish a concealed control of trade unions in cities where there is a large Roman Catholic population. I doubt whether there are three Americans today whose authority, direct and indirect, counts for more than that of the Cardinal-Archbishop of New York. And to this must be added the curious and significant fact that the members of the Roman Catholic church seem able, like their coreligionists in Great Britain, to obtain pivotal posts in the Foreign Service, exercising a power of infiltration which must make members of the Communist Party feel that they are infants at the game. Anyone who measures Roman Catholic strength in the United States today with what it was a generation ago cannot fail to be impressed by its growth, as well as perturbed by its direction. Spain apart, I doubt whether there is any country in the world today in which its authority is greater than in America.

I AM too much in earnest for either humility or vanity," wrote Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes at a vital moment in medical history, "but I do entreat those who hold the keys of life and death to listen." It is in that spirit that all of us ought to approach the grave problems of this hour. It is one of the supreme turning-points of history, not less than when Luther appeared before the Diet of Worms, or when the States-General met at Versailles in 1789—an hour as decisive as when Lenin descended from the "sealed train" at the Finland Station in Petrograd. No power is likely to exercise a more critical influence upon the destiny of this civilization than is the United States. Its position involves special responsibilities. It has not been battered and torn by the tempest of war; its economy is alike unimpaired and unsurpassed. Its people have a long experience of democratic practices, and yet not so long a one as to permit them to forget that they had to fight a revolutionary war to give them the right to that experience. They have been a singularly fortunate people. Nature provided them with an empty continent and boundless resources; history gave them in the first forty years of their republic a group of leaders unsurpassed in sagacity and courage. Their national independence has twice been threatened; and, in both 1861 and 1941, fate gave them a leader who commanded the veneration of the whole world. They are a people full of vitality, quick to experiment, eager in their enthusiasm, and swift to be generous when they hear the call of pain. Wise Americans ought to hear the call now, for it sounds unmistakably over the five continents of the world. Americans must recognize without delay that they hold the keys of life and death in their hands. Never has it been so urgent for them to listen; never has their power to understand what they hear been fraught with consequences so momentous.

Negroes at U.N.'s Door

BY A. G. MEZERIK

ON December 3, in Geneva, a subcommittee of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights rejected, by a vote of eleven to one, a Russian proposal to investigate the Negro problem in the United States. So ended the first act of a drama which must some day be played through to the end. The action began in October in New York, when certain Negro citizens of the United States wrote a letter to the world telling the bloody story of race relations in this country and asked the United Nations for action. Entitled "A Statement on the Denial of Human Rights to Minorities in the Case of Citizens of Negro Descent in the United States of America and an Appeal to the United Nations for Redress," the mimeographed volume of 150 pages was prepared by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and presented to the Social and Economic Council. Each of the fifty-seven delegations to the U. N. was given a copy and requested to consider the plight of Negroes in the United States.

What a case is presented! The document is partly an indictment of the government of the United States by a large section of its citizens. Government has failed the Negro at every level, from the local sheriff to the Supreme Court. Most especially the Supreme Court, though on its dignified home is boldly emblazoned "Equal Justice Under the Law," is found in this record to have been the great diluter of Negro rights, the great negator of constitutional guaranties. From Revolutionary days the Supreme Court has taken the attitude that the "Negro has no rights which the white man is bound to respect," a dictum incorporated in Roger Taney's justly infamous Dred Scott decision.

The constitutional amendments which followed the Civil War were designed to abolish slavery and make the Negro a citizen and a voter, but they were soon interpreted in such a way that, instead of serving to protect the newly emancipated slave in the exercise of his citizenship, they helped the states to constrict, limit, and even prohibit the rights he had been granted. By its biased interpretations of these amendments the Supreme Court has permitted Negroes to be deprived of the right to vote: from its decisions stem the poll taxes, separate primaries, "rotten boroughs," and other voting restrictions which are still in wide use throughout the South. The right of Negroes to sit on juries when Negroes are being tried has been nullified on the simple theory that the proof of discrimination presented to the august court was not satisfactory. Separation of races in intra-state travel has been encouraged by the court's verdict that this was but a "valid exercise of the police power of the state."

A. G. MEZERIK, author of "The Revolt of the South and West," wrote a series of articles for The Nation last summer called Dixie in Black and White.

The Supreme Court has denied the Negro his civil rights on the ground that Congress was given no power under the Fourteenth Amendment to regulate the acts of private individuals in the states—this from the same institution which held that the language of the Fourteenth Amendment, "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," protected corporations. The corporations have been under the benevolent wing of the court ever since, coddled into monstrous growth by decisions which have made the famous Fourteenth Amendment their most valuable legal aid. Monopoly has won—and the Negro has lost—as a result of the interpretation of a constitutional amendment intended to emancipate the slaves.

Piling indignity on injury, it was the Supreme Court which invented the theory of "separate but equal" facilities. Acceptance of this vicious theory was of course the certain guaranty, not of equality, but of its opposite, segregation, and out of it have come the separate school systems, separate toilet facilities, separate quarters in hospitals, trains, and practically everywhere else, including graveyards. On every hand the South offers proof that these separate facilities are unequal and are the cause of much of the disease, ignorance, and poverty of the Negro. And this proof of the responsibility of our highest court provides final refutation of the often repeated allegation that the basic reason for the discrimination suffered by the Negro is the prejudice and ignorance of our lowest government officials—the county sheriff, the justice of the peace, the company-town mayor. These share the guilt—incident after incident cited in the N. A. A. C. P. volume demonstrates their complicity—but the shocking truth is that their basest acts have been sparked and encouraged by the Supreme Court.

After recounting the evils for which the government must be blamed, the statement describes the intimidation practiced by ordinary non-office-holding white men who in defiance of the law have beaten and shot and lynched Negroes without interference. The records, accurate only since 1882, show that thousands of Negro men, women, and children have been burned, hung, or flogged to death by mobs. And not one white person has ever been convicted for participating in this mass murder. In fact, until last year not one was ever arrested for the crime. The U. N. delegate who read this document must have found a clear parallel with Nazi S. S. methods, particularly as the story goes on to reveal how Negroes are beaten up every day in Northern as well as Southern cities; often by the police, and how such occurrences are so taken for granted that the press rarely bothers to report them. Every sector of white America is implicated. Labor's record is cited: twenty-one Negroes wounded or killed because they refused to give up to whites their jobs as firemen on railroads.

The N. A. A. C. P. has already been criticized by Southern newspapers for "washing all this dirty linen in public." And there will be cries that this is ammunition for Russian propaganda against American democracy. But the United States has evaded the problem for so long that Negroes here are looking beyond it to the world. The statement presented to the United Nations was the effort of a people to document the indignities to which they have been subjected. Its legal phrases conceal a smoldering anger which, fanned by another "Uncle Tom's Cabin," might sweep the world. The framers of the appeal have not shrunk from its implications. They speak of themselves as forming a nation within a nation. "We number as many as the inhabitants of the Argentine or Czechoslovakia or the whole of Scandinavia, including Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. . . . We are a group which has the right to be heard; and while we rejoice that other smaller nations can stand and make their wants known in the United Nations, we maintain equally that our voice should not be suppressed or ignored."

Golden

WITH this challenge the Negroes of the United States begin their march as a group, demanding their rights in the council of the nations. Their new course is a long step away from the usual N. A. A. C. P. policy, which has believed that enlisting the aid of influential whites was the key to the advancement of the Negro. It is a return to other historical methods, to those of the Reconstruction era, when Negroes acting as solid communal groups resisted the attacks of the Ku Klux Klan. The present challenge is presented by a militant and united people, conscious of their aims and unafraid, for perhaps the first time, of stirring up a red scare. Dr. W. E. Burghardt DuBois, in the statement's opening chapter, disposes of the red bogey: "It is not Russia that threatens the United States so much as Mississippi, not Stalin and Molotov but Bilbo and Rankin; internal injustice done to one's brothers is far more dangerous than the aggression of strangers from abroad." Whatever the Russians make of this, and by espousing the Negro cause at Geneva they indicated it would be a great deal, action will be up to us. We must cure ourselves of our Rankins. The friendship of the dark peoples of the world is at stake. And whoever wins them will win the world. The N. A. A. C. P. plans to publish the statement in five languages, and as its news spreads, our government, unless it moves forward at an unprecedented pace, will find itself convicted of talking democracy to peoples in Asia and Africa while condoning a police state against their brothers within our borders.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, one of our delegates to Geneva, is on the board of directors of the N. A. A. C. P. Since she offered no constructive proposal of her own, she must have had to subordinate her well-known personal feelings to this country's historical anti-Negro policy. Her dilemma is not new. It has frustrated many of our able political leaders. It is perhaps responsible for our American proclivity for delivering moral lectures to other countries. Much of our ranting about the imperialism and callousness of other countries may be the expression of a subconscious sense of guilt growing out of the ever-present disabilities of the Negro. By our words on the international scene we have tried to compensate for our deeds at home.

THE shadow of this indictment hangs over the United Nations as well as the United States. For the yardstick by which the world's oppressed peoples will judge the United Nations is the fervor with which it will defend the dignity of man. If the U. N. does not eventually give this petition a place on its agenda, it will be apparent that there is no organ in the world to which oppressed people can turn for an ultimate redress of their grievances.

The American delegation, for obvious reasons, finds the demand of the Negro people of the United States difficult to deal with. Other delegations may face equal difficulty for other reasons. Interference in the affairs of another country could be charged, and though there are precedents for this in the resolutions against Franco's dictatorship in Spain and the treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa, so far no case has involved one of the major powers.

The difficulties ahead are great, but Negroes are not dismayed. In spite of all the roadblocks to progress so graphically catalogued in this indictment, the Negro people have produced scholars, artists, writers, scientists, and athletes in numbers and of a quality which command the respect and admiration of the white men who hold them down. Their record promises as long and persistent a fight before the U. N. as may be necessary to win the right to be heard when they demand that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in the United States no longer be "for whites only."

Rebirth of General Medicine

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

AS SOON as people find out that I am a physician they ask, "What is your specialty?" The question embarrasses me increasingly as the years go by, because I more and more dislike being a specialist. I fully subscribe to the well-known definition that a specialist is a man who knows more and more about less and less. He is likely in the end to be reduced to a remote and limited corner of life, to lose his social usefulness and his sense of reality.

I have devoted about twenty years, or a substantial part of that time, to the study of skin diseases; I have written about seventy papers on the subject, and a few books; I have investigated hundreds of varieties of skin ailments; and if I thought there were any such thing, I would call myself a legitimate specialist in dermatology. Dermatology is a fairly recent specialty. It started when skin ailments began to be given Latin names and tissue changes were described and classified in all their variety. If a patient loses his hair, one now diagnoses alopecia; if he itches, he suffers from pruritus; if his skin is inflamed, he has a dermatitis. Dermatology separated from internal medicine about sixty years ago, but after many years of practice I am convinced that it is still a part of internal medicine.

During these years I have become actively interested in the relationship between the skin and surgery, allergy, epidemiology, public health, social hygiene, psychiatry, neurology, pediatrics, the history of medicine, radiology, immunology, gerontology. A knowledge of all these specialties is essential for a physician who wants to be a good dermatologist and treat an itch according to the standards of modern medicine: we cannot get around the fact that a human body is a coherent working unit—and we cannot operate an engine if we are nothing but specialists in combustion mechanics.

There is a strange tendency to call anybody an expert who says or prints the same thing twice. To become an expert is a wonderful way for lazy people to make a living. They are recognized and flattered by a small but self-assured group of fellow-experts, and they have a perfect excuse for not worrying about anything outside their expert function. I wrote my doctor's thesis about the historical origin of syphilis, and I could have spent a lovely lifetime being a member of a select group of syphilis historians, brooding over folios in libraries and participating in an erudite controversy that has gone on for several hundred years.

Of course, experts—in medicine as elsewhere—are necessary. Experts are needed for brain surgery, shock treatments, corneal transplantations, fenestration of the inner ear, anaesthesia, and so on. There is nothing more admirable than the skill of a medical expert. However, I would say that it is even more difficult, though more interesting and more rewarding, to be a good general physician than a good specialist.

"It has been shown that 85 per cent of the conditions for which persons seek medical advice can be diagnosed and treated effectively by a good medical practitioner. Yet according to available statistics, only about 60 per cent of physicians are general practitioners" (New York Medicine, October 20, 1947). There are enough specialists for lung extirpation and frontal lobectomy, but there are obviously not enough doctors for less interesting ailments, and the trend toward specialization is rapidly growing; so that there is danger of the whole medical profession's becoming an accumulation of specialists more or less helpless without the coordinating wisdom of the general physician. Many hospitals—haughtily and foolishly—limit their staff appointments to physicians certified by specialty boards. And the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association saw reason to report on May 3, 1947, that "such policies are detrimental to the health of the people and therefore to American medicine."

My own individual preference is encouraged by some recent occurrences. The A. M. A. in 1945 established a Section on General Practice as an official part of its Scientific Assembly. Some 150 general practitioners have organized the American Academy of General Practitioners, which requires from its members evidence of continuous postgraduate work.

I am happy and proud that I know a little bit more about skin diseases than other people, and my eyes will always gleam with satisfaction when I discover something like a case of Epidermodysplasia Verruciformis. But lately I have felt that I might be becoming sufficiently mature and experienced to change from a dermatologist into a general practitioner.

I am quite certain that to be a good medical practitioner is the most difficult achievement for a physician. Perhaps it should be attempted only after a lifelong medical education in research, in technical skill, in special knowledge, in public health. It will be very difficult for our medical generation—which has been brought up so wrongly—to reach the distinction of a truly modern medical practitioner. But we can urge the people responsible for medical curriculums to prepare the way for future generations. It should be a privilege and an honor—after long and recognized activity in special fields—to acquire the title of General Practitioner.

Jinnah's New Republic

BY ANDREW ROTH

Karachi, November 15

ITS creator and governor general, M. A. Jinnah, has described Pakistan as "the biggest Moslem state . . . and the fifth biggest sovereign state in the world." Though the second point might be disputed, Pakistan is unquestionably worthy of attention, for it is situated just where the Anglo-American and Soviet orbits touch in the strategic Central Asian theater.

Seldom has a new state been created under such contradictory pressures or with such a load of full-grown problems. Control of the government is vested in a few top officials, supported by a powerful bureaucracy, but Britain has a say in matters of defense, finance, and foreign policy. Already the government is shot through with corruption and nepotism. Social life is dominated by Mohammedan concepts, including the subjection of women. The structure of the state, however, has not yet had time to harden, and internal strains may reshape it in another image.

Although Mr. Jinnah exaggerates when he describes his dominion as "blessed with enormous resources and potentialities," Pakistan is undoubtedly "workable" economically. With an area of 230,000 square miles, one-fourth larger than 1933 Germany, it has a population of 70,000,000, about the same number as 1933 Germany. It produces an agricultural surplus and can export part of its wheat and rice and a good deal of its valuable jute crop. It also has some oil and chromite and considerable potential water power. Industrially it is the most backward part of the whole under-industrialized subcontinent. There are scattered woolen, cement, sugar, and cotton mills, but cloth and most other manufactured goods must be imported; some 85 per cent of the raw jute of all India is grown in Pakistan, but the jute mills are in Calcutta. Pakistan has no known coal or iron and only one modern port, Karachi. The people are largely illiterate; only 4 per cent can read as against 12 per cent in India. Among the well-educated, here as in India, are too many lawyers and too few engineers.

ANDREW ROTH, roving reporter for The Nation, has spent several months in India. He has lately arrived in Siam after visiting Ceylon and Burma.

Close and friendly relations with the Indian dominion seem essential to the development of Pakistan's potentialities.* The Congress Party, indeed, finally agreed to partition, after years of deadlock, partly in the belief that Pakistan could not exist as a separate state. "Let them have their Pakistan," it was argued, "if they'll take it without the eastern Punjab and without Calcutta and western Bengal. They won't have any coal, capital, or industries, and we can throttle them economically. After a few years they'll come crawling back!" This attitude, although not shared by the entire Congress high command, has certainly pervaded the partition operations. In the division of assets the Moslems have had to make a separate fight for virtually every typewriter and ream of paper. Difficulties have even been raised over the handling of mail.

Pakistan's economic troubles have been immeasurably increased by the bloody communal conflicts and the resulting influx of refugees. Almost every Moslem League leader from Mr. Jinnah down believes that this refugee inundation was part of a plot to swamp the Pakistan government before it could get established. "I'm sure that Nehru isn't a party to this plot," one declared, "but I'm just as sure that it has the backing of Patel [India's Home Minister] and Baldev Singh [the Defense Minister and a Sikh]."

WITH enormous problems, Pakistan has only a very ordinary set of leaders to cope with them. The brilliant Mr. Jinnah, of course, must be excepted, but he is over seventy and has been in poor health since a severe pneumonia attack two years ago. His voice can barely be heard ten feet away, and he chose to become governor general rather than premier partly because it was an easier post. He has repeatedly told subordinates, "I have done my part of the job; I've given you Pakistan. It is up to you to build it."

Premier Liaquat Ali Khan is a competent administrator with the conservative social views of a typical feudal landlord and a strong belief in a political and economic alliance with Great Britain. He had to choose a man of technical ability for his Finance Minister, but the other members of his Cabinet are all mediocrities. So far-fetched was the appointment of the Calcutta hide merchant, Fazlur Rahman, as Minister of the Interior and Education that an old friend, seeing him in a front seat at the Independence Day celebrations, cried out, "You're in the wrong row; that's for the Cabinet!" Top officials are in the main from the landlord class, with a sprinkling of lawyers and merchants. The sole modern-minded industrialist in the dominion, Hassan Ispahani, is being sent out of the way as ambassador to the United States. Provincial officials are of the same kind: the Punjab Premier is the Khan of Mamdot, the province's largest landholder.

* As this issue goes to press, reports from New Delhi and Karachi bring word that the two Indian dominions are about to sign a pact covering economic and other basic relationships.

Considerable opposition to this leadership is manifesting itself, although it is still unorganized. After 1944, when the Moslem League became a mass movement, clerks, small shopkeepers, mechanics, and poor peasants thronged to its meetings, and it was they who finally obtained partition. Many of them were recruited through religious appeals; others through the promise of better living conditions. The economic discontent formerly directed against the commercially dominant Hindus and Sikhs—it still provides much of the fuel for the Moslem arson gangs—is gradually being turned against the wealthy Moslem League leaders. The story is told that when Mumtaz Daultana, the brains of the West Punjab ministry, went to his huge Multan estate in August, his Moslem tenants, all staunch League members, congratulated him on the achievement of Pakistan, and landlord and tenants feasted together. But a pall was thrown over the festivities when a peasant asked, "When will the land be given to us?" This question is being asked repeatedly, for agrarian reforms have been promised by the League.

Similar resentment against the rich is voiced in the towns. A Moslem clerk who is the local secretary of the League in his ward is made conscious of social differences when he goes from his filthy, overcrowded tenement home to the palatial residence of the provincial leader. At a recent meeting in Lahore a fervent young Leaguer exclaimed, "The rich are finished! Let us shoot them!"

Some of this radicalism is spontaneous; some of it is the work of the progressives in the League, who are influential throughout Pakistan but especially in the Punjab. These agitators are usually well-educated, modern-minded young people with a war-gained knowledge of foreign countries, a strongly nationalistic point of view, and a liberal approach to social problems, including the position of women. One of the most prominent is Mian Iftikharud-Din, known as "Ifti," a wealthy, radical Moslem who was formerly president of the Congress Party in the Punjab and twice jailed by the British. Now publisher of the Pakistan Times and a member of the Constituent Assembly, he is looked up to by young, progressive Moslems but kept at a distance by League leaders. The tactics of the young progressives have reached a stratum of Moslems never before interested, and at Lahore and Peshawar there have been mass demonstrations of Moslem women clad in the ghostly looking white burqas, a cover-all garment with a net eye-slit which enables orthodox Moslem women to appear in public without being seen. The League leaders welcomed such mass support in fighting for Pakistan—although many had prejudices against women in politics—but now they are embarrassed by the claims of the awakened and demanding millions.

During the Lahore riots some of the inflamed young Moslems asked the League progressives for guidance. "We tried to slow them down," a leftist Moslem leader said, "but we couldn't oppose them openly. The Communists attacked us for this, saying we could not be considered progressive if we did not openly fight Moslem communalism, but we know that would have meant isolating ourselves from our people."

A MAJOR conflict is now looming over the question of how closely Pakistan should be tied to Britain. Nationalist-minded Pakistanis, among whom are most of the young people and the new League rank and file, are dismayed by the number of Britons in the administration. Three of the five provincial governors, five of the nine departmental secretaries, and all the high officers of the armed forces are British. Informed nationalists think it necessary to keep certain Britons for their technical skills but do not want this to be carried too far. Army officers do not object to serving under British generals temporarily, but are concerned that the army should continue to be equipped solely with British matériel and indignant that promotions have been left in British hands. Some nationalists charge that when Premier Liaquat Ali Khan was in London a year ago he committed Pakistan to remaining within the British economic sphere.

In the Punjab even the League right-wingers are anti-British, because the British governor there kept the League out of office for over a year and because the boundary award is considered unfair. In consequence a substantial number of Britons have been dismissed, but many of these have turned up with the central government at Karachi. The railway specialist, A. G. Hall, for example, was put out by the Punjab government but is now director general of railways for all Pakistan. To protests about the great number of Britons in the Pakistan service, the Premier is reported to have replied: "Before the transfer of power Lord Mountbatten had both the League and the Congress members of the interim government promise to keep on all British officials who wanted to stay and against whom we could not make a specific case." It is interesting to note that of those who have stayed, the great majority have chosen to serve in Pakistan. While this may be due in part to the fact that opportunities are greater in the less-advanced state, there is certainly a feeling among the British that although India will probably declare its independence, Pakistan may be kept within the empire. The likelihood is enhanced by the character of the League leaders, almost none of whom are known for militant nationalism.

Since Pakistan's establishment, League officers have been cautious about declaring where they stand with respect to the conflict between Russia and the West. Pakistan is nearer to the Soviet border than to either Britain or the United States, and substantial segments of public opinion show an interest in the U. S. S. R. Even orthodox Moslems are watching developments in the Soviet Moslem areas, such as Bokhara, which are close to Pakistan culturally as well as geographically. Not all the League progressives are pro-Communist, but many seem to feel that some sort of socialism, usually referred to as "Islamic socialism," is necessary to make Pakistan a strong modern state. There would certainly be overwhelming opposition to allowing Britain and the United States to use Pakistan's military strength or strategic position to further their own designs.

The future of the Moslem League is already a subject of dispute. Old League officers, fearing that the impoverished Moslems will follow the progressives if the government does not soon grant their demands, are tending to abandon the organization which brought them to power and to rely increasingly on the bureaucracy which they inherited from the British and on their new powers of bribery through job distribution. Moslem religious leaders are attacking young, modern-minded progressives as "anti-Islamic," and telling the women to forget about politics and go back into purdah. But it is not easy to turn back the clock. "We have learned that even women have power, and they can't make us forget it," said a Lahore housewife to me.

Del Vayo—The Antwerp Conference

Antwerp, December 4

IF THE International Socialist Conference at Antwerp had been a public meeting, it would have been hardly worth flying from New York to attend—at least from a journalistic point of view. (Politically and personally it was valuable for its discussion of Spanish Socialist unity and the possibility of moving the Socialist parties represented in governments, particularly the British, to take a stronger position on Spain than that adopted by the United Nations Assembly.) But the conference met behind closed doors, and your correspondent had a chance to hear a most fascinating and outspoken debate between the two tendencies which today divide Socialist thought throughout the world.

The moment could not have been more dramatically chosen; while the discussion was going on one could see French delegates hurriedly leaving the room to take telephone calls from Paris. Before my eyes was still the scene of the early hours of the day before in Paris: workers grimly entering the back door of the Galeries Lafayette, where in darkness and cold the Spanish delegates awaited transportation by car to the Belgian frontier (the railroad strike was already in full swing) and the bitter words of one worker to another, "Remember the other day what that salaud of a Paul Reynaud said to a reporter—after he'd lost out on the Premiership—'When the Socialists have silenced the Communists, my time will come'?" Grumbach, chairman of the foreign-affairs committee of the French Assembly, came back from one of his telephone talks with Paris, and I asked him how things were looking. He replied, "France still exists." It was in this atmosphere that Harold Laski, determined from the start to prevent a break in the conference, opened the debate on socialism and democracy.

He began by trying to make the representatives of the Western parties appreciate the special situation of the Socialists of Eastern Europe, who in his opinion are rendering an important service by remaining in their governments even though they must swallow many things that are hateful to them. Laski was not merely playing the diplomat; his words came out of deep conviction. I met him last year returning from Warsaw greatly impressed by the Polish Socialists and by Poland's Socialist Premier. He knows that murder and abuse of democracy are not all that is going on in Eastern Europe, that there are areas of constructive revolutionary accomplishment in which good Socialists can share. But for Laski the condition is that they do not cease to be Socialists and become a mere tool in the hands of the ruling party. In this connection Laski launched a direct attack against the behavior of the Communists toward the Socialists and against the language used by the journal of the newly instituted Cominform about Attlee and Blum.

Laski took the middle road between the right-wing Socialists, represented by the Dutch and Belgians, and the left, represented by the Poles and Italians. The former have a pleasant idea of socialism: they would bring their countries back to normality, accept without reserve the blessings of the Marshall Plan, and limit international Socialist solidarity to money contributions without getting too much entangled in major foreign issues. Their attitude was well expressed by Belgium's leading Socialist, Premier Spaak, who told his comrades at the latest Belgian Socialist Congress: "For heaven's sake, don't make out of Greece another 'Spanish issue' in the party." As Foreign Minister during the Spanish war, I had to deal with my Belgian colleague; so I could appreciate better than anybody else the real significance of that remark.

The left position was ably presented by Pietro Nenni. Nenni has two oratorical personalities: the stirring speaker who at mass-meetings in Italy on the same platform with Togliatti makes the Communist appear a sober lecturer, and the quiet, subtle advocate, whose head seems a monk's head, whose hands move in arabesques as if to caress his opponents. He adopted the second manner at Antwerp. Quoting Laski's statement that "the present moment is characterized by the advance of counter-revolution," he argued that a Socialist has no higher duty today than to secure the unity of the workers; in Italy a break between Socialists and Communists could only lead to extremist action either from right or left. "This being my deepest conviction, what kind of policy would you advocate?"—Nenni was looking directly at the Belgian and Dutch delegates—"a break with the Communists, handing them the entire leadership of Italian labor, or a policy of collaboration that preserves socialism in Italy as a positive element in national politics?" An interjection by Max Buset of Belgium about Russian policy in Eastern Europe gave Nenni a chance to turn the discussion to the thorny subject of big-power policy in Europe. "I am against any kind of intervention, but the historical fact remains that where the Russians advanced they armed the people, while in Italy the Americans and British disarmed the people. They prevented us from liquidating fascism; the result is the advance of counter-revolution everywhere to which Laski referred."

Nenni's argumentation apparently had some effect, to judge by an article in the Brussels party paper, Le Peuple, on December 2, written by Louis de Brouckere, chairman of the conference and former head of the Second International. Said Brouckere: "What today threatens France and Italy, what tomorrow will perhaps menace all of Western Europe, is not Communist dictatorship, which is an impossibility, but a dictatorship of the right under the pretext of anti-communism."

The conference did not produce, and nobody expected, the rebirth of the Socialist International, but it went beyond the Dutch proposal to limit future action to maintaining contact through an exchange of information among the various parties, West and East. After passing a resolution condemning the division of Europe and the policy of blocs, the delegates instituted a permanent committee which will call a new conference sometime in the spring in Vienna or in Rome and meanwhile will keep the parties together.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Golden Tide

THE Canadian Parliament, which reassembled on December 5, has before it a measure for subsidizing gold production. The proposal calls for payment of a premium of $7 an ounce for all gold mined in the dominion in excess of the output for the year ending June 30. This is one item in the Canadian government's program for rectifying the nation's adverse trade balance with its southern neighbor, and its sole purpose is to stimulate production of the one commodity which can always be exchanged for United States dollars.

It is an expedient which can hardly be defended in terms of rational economics. There are other Canadian commodities—metals, newsprint, food—of which the world is in dire need, and it would seem far more sensible to stimulate their production rather than that of gold. Nevertheless, the Canadian government can put up a good pragmatic argument for its plan. It can point out that while undoubtedly the present demand for newsprint is tremendous, it takes a long time to build new plants, and there is no guaranty they won't be redundant when recession hits the American newspaper business. On the other hand, barring a revolutionary change in the financial system of the United States, there will always be an assured market for gold. Moreover, Canada needs all the United States dollars it can scrape together in the next year, and the authors of the subsidy plan evidently consider that gold-mining can be more rapidly expanded than any other dollar-earning industry. In 1946 production of the precious metal was little more than half the 1941 record of $187,081,000; so that there is scope for a large increase, though some Canadian mining engineers think that the subsidy is not big enough to do the trick.

Whatever the outcome may be, I have reason to believe that Washington Treasury and banking officials are definitely disturbed by the Canadian government's move. For one thing, they can already hear the envious mutterings of our own mine owners, and they can expect that before long Western delegations will be descending on Washington to demand that Congress "do something for gold." There is, of course, nothing that we need less than more gold, and a subsidy here would be pure boondoggling; indeed, it would be more sensible to pay the companies for not digging the stuff. However, we cannot be sure that Congress will see it that way: after all, it set a precedent by insisting on an equally uneconomic subsidy for silver.

Another Treasury worry is that the Canadian action will be imitated by other gold-producing countries, with the result that it will be called upon to buy even greater quantities of the metal than at present. Certainly this is a possibility, but a more probable eventuality is the devaluation of sterling to bring it down from the present official exchange rate of $4.02 to the "free-market" rate of a little over $3. The result would be an increase of 20 to 25 per cent in the sterling price of gold, which should prove a powerful stimulus to production in South Africa, Rhodesia, West Africa, and Australia, which together account for well over two-thirds of the world's output. It is true that the British government has recently denied that it is planning to devalue sterling; on the other hand, some influential Republican leaders are anxious to make "realistic" valuation of currencies a condition of aid under the European Recovery Plan.

In any case, whether gold production is boosted or not, a large part of the existing gold stocks of foreign countries seems destined to move into our vaults during the next few years. The golden tide, which flowed steadily and strongly toward our shores in the inter-war period, ebbed a little from 1941 to 1945. During the era of lend-lease our cash imports fell below cash exports, and we settled the balance by delivering gold. But since V-J Day the $2,700,000,000 "lost" in the war years has practically all returned. On December 3 the Treasury gold stock stood at $22,680,000,000, very close to the pre-Pearl Harbor peak.

Still bigger accretions to our hoard are in store, since nations hungry for American food and other goods are likely to ship gold to this country as long as any remains in their coffers. Britain has just announced the sale of another $192,000,000 worth, making a total decline of $412,000,000 in the sterling area's gold reserve during the past three months. As a result of drastic cuts in imports it hopes to get along with sales of not more than $100,000,000 a month from now on. And Britain is only one among many nations compelled to change gold for dollars. From all sources, Chairman Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board told a Congressional committee recently, we are likely to receive between $2,000,000,000 and $3,000,000,000 in the course of the next twelve months.

Some people may ask: Is this anything to worry about? If gold is "a good thing," can we have too much of it?

The answer is that an excess of gold, like an excess of any other form of money, is inflationary. The Treasury is obliged to buy all gold offered to it at $35 an ounce. That leads to an increase in bank deposits, and since banks need to hold only 14 to 20 per cent of their demand deposits in reserve, each $100 of deposits provides the basis for five or six times that amount of credit. In the past twelve months the Treasury has been combating credit inflation by using its cash surplus to retire government securities, but the effect of this move has been almost wholly offset by the credit-expanding influence of gold imports. Now Secretary Snyder is talking about "sterilizing" gold by paying for it with surplus cash instead of with new gold certificates. But it is difficult to see how this will improve the position, since Treasury balances employed in this way obviously will not be available for reducing the debt. A more effective method of neutralizing additions to the gold reserve would be the sale by the Reserve banks of equivalent amounts of government securities. But such action would disturb the market and conflict with the Treasury's policy of holding down interest rates. So Mr. Snyder stands between the incoming gold tide and the frowning cliffs of the national debt. Is there a way of escape? That is a question I shall discuss next week.

Mountaineer or Bohemian?

THOMAS WOLFE. By Herbert J. Muller. New Directions. $2.

THERE are few literary exercises more thankless than a critical work on Thomas Wolfe, a fact Mr. Muller forlornly admits at the beginning of his study. For all its passion and abundance Wolfe's work lacks the dark, tantalizing complexity that inspires creative criticism. As Mr. Muller says, "His elemental powers are remarkable but they are also obvious; so are his elementary faults." Furthermore, Wolfe's novels require very little exegesis, and his ideas—"I believe that we are lost here in America, but I believe we shall be found"—are so grandly abstract one can do little more than paraphrase them.

Mr. Muller seems to have been inspired to write his good-natured appraisal by the fact that Wolfe has been excessively scorned and excessively flattered. This is to be a more cautious study, and it is indeed that, sometimes painfully so, since Mr. Muller has the dizzy habit of building up a defense of Wolfe and then immediately rushing in to attack him. Also he likes to work out careful comparisons between Wolfe and other writers only to show that little comparison is possible. Typical of this exasperating method is a comment upon Wolfe and Homer which leads up to, "We must then add, of course, that Wolfe was no Homer."

In order to overcome the tedium of his project some fancy diversions on the nature of myth are introduced. Muller apologizes for the looseness of the term and then redefines it quite as vaguely and without making its relevance to Wolfe entirely convincing. However, Muller's dilemmas are perhaps a true reflection not only of Wolfe's unevenness but of the state of criticism at the moment. Muller is a sympathetic reader, and yet he seems afraid that mere admiration of Wolfe will make him appear unsophisticated, and so he drags in all sorts of references to the criticism practiced by Brooks and Blackmur. This desire to be "modern" results in the fantastic notion that perhaps Wolfe too is a metaphysical poet! However, in the final analysis Muller's ideas on Wolfe are a bit more sober. He presents him as our closest approach to an epic talent, a writer at home in the native tradition and yet aware of the complications of modern life, a fairly representative American, above regionalism, and yet not falsely European or completely alienated.

I am not quite sure that Wolfe was the indigenous spirit he wanted to be. He certainly liked to think of himself as a clairvoyant yokel surrounded by effete artists and insincere intellectuals. He talked of his loneliness, his humiliations, his inadequacy, but it is not always easy to take him at his word. In a way this awkwardness seems to be a mask, and a successful one, worn so that he might have the privilege of being always right, always pure, always superior. There was something terrible and fascinating in Wolfe's character, something more to the point than these false, second-hand sorrows, but Wolfe repressed more than he told. Everything interesting in him became the highly idealized suffering of the artist, a perfect displacement, realized on a glossy, almost inhuman level. He could not bear to think of himself as anything except innocent, and for that reason he is the most brilliant and thrilling historian of the sophomore, an age less perverse than childhood and less ironical than adult life.

Muller sees that Wolfe obviously exaggerated his difficulties, but nevertheless he tends to accept him as a sort of primitive, more deeply rooted in his native soil than the other writers of his time, and consequently more "American." Wolfe did leave a great many wonderful portraits of Americans and some marvelous descriptions of the terrors and beauties of the American scene; and yet his analysis of his portraits and his comments upon the scene are rather impure and synthetic. For one thing he wrote so much about writing that he often annihilated America by reducing it to the dimensions of his own career. The best example of this tendency is his treatment of Esther Jack. Wolfe shows her passionate sense of good workmanship and her brilliant energy, and she is probably the best record we have of the artisan-artist type that has had such great influence on American taste and culture. But he allows her only a few breaths before smothering her with his incomparable vanity, as though her only significance lay in her inferiority to him.

And is Wolfe really the blundering, brilliant mountaineer hopelessly confused by the world of fashion? In so many ways he seems to have been just the arty young man he despised, and perhaps there is more Greenwich Village in him and less North Carolina than he realized. He thought everyone was trying to corrupt him, that love would emasculate him, that money and power and middle-class society existed so that he might have the glory of resisting them. These are not the platitudes of a great folk artist, a hill-billy genius, but the clichés of bohemia, that area Wolfe pretended to be too much of a stuttering provincial to comprehend, but many of whose notions he uttered more clearly and uncritically than any other writer. For these reasons it is hard to see Wolfe as the "myth-maker" of America.

On the other hand it would seem easier than Mr. Muller believes to insist—and without the dubious effort to make him a respectable philosopher or a national image—that Wolfe achieved a great deal more than his present declining reputation suggests. The best parts of Muller's book are those that show simply and without apology his enjoyment of Wolfe's art.

ELIZABETH HARDWICK

Mr. Lippmann and Mr. X

THE COLD WAR. A Study in U. S. Foreign Policy. By Walter Lippmann. Harper and Brothers. $1.

IN A tract of sixty-two pages composed of twelve articles from his column in the New York Herald Tribune Mr. Lippmann offers a meticulous examination of an article in the July issue of Foreign Affairs on The Sources of Soviet Conduct, since reprinted in Life and in "The Foreign Affairs Reader." The article is attributed to Mr. X, who is generally believed to be George F. Kennan, director of the Policy Planning Staff of the Department of State. Mr. Lippmann assumes that the article dates back to mid-March.

Mr. Lippmann concentrates on what he considers to be the specific thesis of Mr. X and, by implication, of the State Department—namely, that the task of United States foreign policy is to "contain" the Soviet Union. To Lippmann this implies the use of American military might along the land frontiers of European and Asiatic Russia. It means neglecting the Atlantic community that is part of Mr. Lippmann's Shield of the Republic. It is "unsuited to the American economy, which is unregimented, and uncontrolled, and therefore cannot be administered according to a plan." It implies the destruction of the United Nations.

This critical analysis strikes a popular note. By not denying the authorship of the Foreign Affairs article the State Department has certainly helped Mr. Lippmann, in effect, to solidify a view of United States foreign policy that has been dinned into the ears of the public at home, abroad, and at Lake Success. He has saved himself much time and trouble by seizing on an individual text for exegesis, an opportunity that no working journalist will begrudge him.

Two considerations reduce the value of his effort. A State Department memorandum does not necessarily express State Department policy. And State Department thinking, as expressed in one memorandum, is not necessarily United States policy, even if it seems to find at least partial confirmation in a Presidential statement (the Truman "Doctrine" of March 12). At the time when both documents were being prepared the United States was launching the final preparations for the International Trade Organization, heralded by a broad and critical review of American policy in Mr. Truman's statement on Peace, Freedom, and World Trade, which Mr. Lippmann of the 1918 American Commission to Negotiate Peace should have been peculiarly qualified to appreciate. At Lake Success, on March 28, Ambassador Austin fitted the Greek and Turkish aid program into the broad perspective of United States relief and reconstruction policies and of relations with the U. N. along policy lines that have since been confirmed in the Marshall Plan and the European recovery program. Already it was clear that a narrow policy of containment did not cover the ground.

In the circumstances Mr. Lippmann's constructive suggestions can hardly be expected to offer an alternative to United States foreign policy, only to the policy of containment as he understands Mr. X. His alternative is a settlement in Europe that means the withdrawal of British, Russian, and American occupation forces. He admits that "the Communist parties would remain, to put it bluntly, as a Soviet fifth column. They will be assisted, we may take it, by Soviet agents and by Soviet funds and Soviet contraband weapons and by Soviet propaganda and by Soviet diplomacy." But their pressure would, he says, "no longer be backed up by overwhelming military power throughout Eastern Europe and by the threat of military intervention in Western Europe." Our mission then is "to emancipate the ancient and proud continent of Europe from the military control of non-European powers." How the execution of this mission would avoid the implications of a policy of containment is beyond the understanding of this reviewer.

BJARNE BRAATØY

Fiction in Review

OURS being such a "know-how" culture in all departments, a civilization so brilliantly skilled in turning out anything it sets its hand to and yet so appallingly ignorant of what is worth making or to what uses the things it makes should be put, we cannot be surprised that our literature, too, shows such a marked ascendancy of craft over conscience. Probably there has never been a time when so many people wrote so "well" as now, but to such meager purpose; when, indeed, the emptier a novel's content, the surer its technical proficiency. It has reached the point where, remembering the great novels of the past—how dreary and inept they could be for long passages; how varied and nubby were their textures—I think we can be forgiven the perversity of seeking out the inexpert performance as promise that here, at last, will be a book with something to say.

Certainly in the case of Josephine Herbst's new novel, "Somewhere the Tempest Fell" (Scribner's, $3), there is a significant connection between an author's perception of life and her faults of performance. I do not mean that Miss Herbst's technical mistakes are to be taken as the measure of her good achievement, or—on the other hand—overlooked. There is no question that her novel would have been infinitely better for rigorous rewriting—if the dangling ends of narrative had been caught up, if there had been a sounder proportion between important incidents and trivialities, if the characters had been better projected, if—even its mad punctuation had been corrected. But I do mean that Miss Herbst's gravest faults have their aspect of virtue, because they proceed from a sense of urgency and a zest for experience and an acceptance of life which are all but gone from modern writing.

Partly because its bony structure is never fully articulated, partly because no large and ambitious narrative can ever be properly boiled down, "Somewhere the Tempest Fell" is difficult to synopsise. It is primarily about a mystery writer, Adam Snow, who under the pseudonym of George Wand has become a great popular success but who, in the middle of the war, suddenly wishes to reestablish himself in his own identity. Long resident in Italy, Snow had won the confidence of several members of the anti-fascist underground; he believes that he unwittingly betrayed one of them into Mussolini's hands. Now that he has returned to America, this specific guilt becomes the symbol of his general guiltiness about his life. His impulse to expiation finds its outlet in championing, against his wife's counterclaims, his seventeen-year-old daughter's budding love affair with a jazz musician.

But this is only the central theme of the novel, against which numerous other themes are counterpointed—the story of the Brady household, connected with that of the Snows by Mrs. Snow's wealthy uncle who restores his sense of possibility by playing benefactor to one of the Brady daughters; the stories of various friends of Ada Brady; the stories of the swing musicians who meet for jam sessions in Ada's basement. It may be—it undoubtedly is—that these multiple strands of Miss Herbst's narrative join a bit haphazardly; but this very haphazardness is not the least of the signs of Miss Herbst's creative generosity. The right to be a victim of accident is, after all, one of the great freedoms with which a novelist can endow his creatures and, by extension, his readers.

Unhappily, it is a freedom which is rarely granted in modern fiction. The mood of most contemporary story-telling is suffocatingly static, almost claustrophobic; one has the impression that the current novelist, like a neurotic parent, thinks he will lose prestige if he loses dominance over his fictional family; that once he permits his characters to take their chances in the world he himself will cease to amount to anything. There is no such self-concerned author-figure in "Somewhere the Tempest Fell"; throughout her story Miss Herbst is present only by such light as reflects from the people about whom she is writing—which is very unfashionable. Equally unfashionable is Miss Herbst's prose, which is designed, not to call attention to Miss Herbst, but solely for purposes of communication. And similarly remote from the style of the day is the quality of Miss Herbst's fantasy. Whereas in most current writing the imagination is like nothing so much as a series of dye-pots in which the author successively dips his own image, each time bringing it up with fresh surprise at how pretty it looks in this color, in Miss Herbst's novel imagination is an instrument for coloring the objective universe.

In other words, "Somewhere the Tempest Fell" proceeds from an attitude toward novel-writing which I so much admire that I could only passionately wish it had had the support of more self-criticism, so that it could have fulfilled its own best promise. It is unfortunate for the whole movement of contemporary writing and not only for this single book that it cannot more confidently be pointed to as good example—that in refusing the false and petty restraints of what nowadays passes for artistic taste Miss Herbst also refused the necessary discipline of all good art; that in accepting the happy mess of life she herself produced something of a mess; that in giving her characters the license to be free she did not also give them the gift of being more compelling.

And I especially regret that, in padding the flesh of her book to the weakening of its basic anatomy, Miss Herbst obscured the portions of her story which concern the jazz musicians. Jazz culture enters often into present-day fiction, but its ramifications in present-day life are not usually very well understood. "Somewhere the Tempest Fell" is the first novel I have come across which seems to me really to show a perception of the complicated values that are involved in it—both its decent and its disturbing political overtones, the marijuana route it travels toward criminality, the personal and artistic idealism it both satisfies and frustrates. It would have been a fine accomplishment if Miss Herbst could have communicated this insight fully and boldly.

Drama

JOSEPH
KRUTCH

IN HIS interesting book on "Shakespeare and the Actors" A. C. Sprague remarks that "since the introduction of heavy scenery" the stage history of "Antony and Cleopatra" has been "profoundly discouraging." The particular difficulty there referred to is solved very well in the production now current at the Martin Beck. By judiciously combining two or three massive but uncluttered settings with a free use of mere "acting spaces" for the shorter scenes, Guthrie McClintic has kept the play moving and achieved an impression of splendor without weighing the whole thing down or smothering it in scenery and properties. He has, moreover, thereby achieved two very important results. In the first place, the play's "story line"—so much less inevitable and unbreakable than the line in "Hamlet," "Othello," or the other more often played tragedies—remains one which the mind can follow. In the second place, he manages physically to represent that "spaciousness" which so many critics have singled out as one of the most significant aspects of the special character of this particular play.

What the adjective means can perhaps best be explained by a comparison with Shakespeare's only other love tragedy, "Romeo and Juliet." In the latter also the hero and heroine are, by the convention of the time, necessarily "important people." But they are such only by convention. So far as anything which counts is concerned they are merely private persons involved in a private catastrophe. Their story is, as completely as anything in the Shakespearean manner can be, a merely domestic occurrence. But Antony and Cleopatra are always aware of the fact that their stage is the world. The fate of thousands is dependent upon them. Messengers ply back and forth across the known world; the eyes of nations are upon them. Antony could not feel what he does feel if he did not know that he is throwing an empire away. At the very beginning, "Let . . . the wide arch of the rang'd empire fall!" he exclaims; and at the very end Cleopatra is morbidly—if also exultantly—concerned with the "quick comedians" who "extemporally will stage us." No staging of the play will do if it does not suggest both the grandioseness inherent in the public importance of the two lovers and their own almost indecent awareness of the fact that their amorous dalliances are conducted in a spotlight. Mr. McClintic's production is almost always very fine indeed so far as everything visual is concerned, and within the meaning of the term I mean to include not only what is itself striking to the eye but also whatever can contribute to the illustration and reinforcement of the intention of the play. His massive architectural scenes and his free employment of open sky add to a fine effect of spaciousness.

If all this be true, why, then, does the total effect fall so far short, why is one only occasionally moved, and why does one leave the theater with a sense of disappointment, almost of depression? The answer, I think, lies almost exclusively in the acting—is the result of what one hears as opposed to what one sees. And sadly it must be admitted that it is in the case of Cleopatra herself that the lack is most painfully evident. Miss Cornell will not add to her reputation by the present performance. She was an admirable Candida, and she was excellent in the modernized "Antigone." She was less good as Juliet than in either of the two just-mentioned roles, and she is far less satisfactory in the present play than she was as Juliet. Indeed, it would appear that the closer she approaches the grandest style the more obvious her limitations become.

Several of the other roles are much more satisfactorily performed. Kent Smith's Enobarbus has a vigor and a clarity which deserve high praise even though the part is, of course, relatively an easy one. Ralph Clanton's Octavius is rather pettish, almost effeminate, but it was probably Shakespeare's intention to minimize Octavius as fortune's darling rather than a man of great stature, and I found the interpretation not unsatisfactory. Godfrey Tearle as Antony I found better than that. He is not young, but neither was Cleopatra's lover, and he has great dignity as well as intelligence. His Antony seems to know what he is, what he is doing, and what it is that Shakespeare has given him to say. One understands Mr. Tearle's speeches and one believes them. But, to put it bluntly, one does not by any means always, in Miss Cornell's case, either understand or believe.

All critics have of course recognized that the part presents almost unparalleled difficulties. Cleopatra's "infinite variety" ranges all the way from mere coquettishness to regal splendor. She is sometimes a queen and sometimes merely that special kind of female for which the only modern term seems to be "a cutie." But the trouble here is not that Miss Cornell is not all these things but quite simply that she is not really any of them. As is always the case with her performances, the visual effect is admirable. She knows how to dress, how to pose, how to move. Her pantomime is often excellent. But she simply cannot speak Shakespeare's lines with even moderate effectiveness. Whole sentences are not only ineffective, they are not even intelligible; and even the great set pieces like "Give me my robe, put on my crown" would not, to anyone who knew this production only, be so much as recognized as potentially what they are. Enobarbus makes more of the famous but merely descriptive passage about the barge than Miss Cornell does of great dramatic speeches. The difficulty, what is more, seems to originate in something as elementary as mere elocution, in the failure to put the stress upon the words which should receive it if the sense is to be clear. Miss Cornell's voice does not appear to carry very well. She was laudably determined to fill the rather difficult auditorium of the Martin Beck. But the necessity of shouting did not make it any more easy for her to manage her emphases. Her voice rises and falls. It changes to some extent its tone and color. But all too often there seemed to be no relation between these changes and the meaning of the sentences being spoken. Sometimes it seemed almost like the performance of a singer singing in a language she did not understand. And without a Cleopatra who is a lord of language the play must fail.

LUIGI ZAMPA'S "To Live in Peace" is less thoroughly worked out and less acutely put on film than "Shoeshine" and "Open City," but in some important respects it is even more remarkable. It is the story of what war meant to an infinitesimal Italian hill town and especially to a peasant family which, on pain of death, sheltered two American fugitives. I think that in spirit and basic understanding it is the wisest and most deeply humane movie of its time.

Its central characters are wholly unpolitical men, whose chief concern with history is to try to scrape it off their shoes. It is suggested that this is the ordinary condition of ordinary men, against which political men, good or bad, must take their measure; and that at best this measure is relatively puny. These central characters are what is known as simple men, a dangerous kind for contemporary artists to fool with; I have never before seen simple men presented with so much kindness, immediacy, understanding, and freedom from calculation and self-deceit. They are presented so richly in their weakness as well as their excellence that it is unimaginable that it occurred to anyone who worked on the film that they were doing a "balanced" job. The work is obviously done in that fundamental innocence which comes from a genuine love for and realism about human beings; which is the natural air that any half-sane artist, or man, has to breathe; and which is breathed in most parts of the world, by now, about as freely as in the Black Hole of Calcutta. To choose only one of many examples, a Negro soldier, hidden in a wine-cellar while a German soldier visits the terrified peasants, gets stinking drunk and very noisy. This results in the death of the hero of the picture, and of the German. Archer Winsten of the Post, whose reviews, regardless of certain areas of disagreement, I warmly like and recommend, thought this action psychologically questionable. He wrote that it was impossibly inconsiderate and ungrateful of a soldier in that predicament. No doubt it was. But there is no evidence that the Negro, the peasants, or even the people who made the film ever looked at it in that light. To all of them it was, unfortunately, the most natural thing in the world; and one of the glories of the picture is the complete simplicity with which the whole thing is done and passed over, without any psychological or moral elaboration. As a native of this country, with more than enough experience both of the South and of non-Southerners who think they mean well by Negroes, I am like many other Americans particularly impressed by the whole treatment of the Negro; it is the only pure presentation of a man of his race that I have seen in a movie. As a human being, who would rather be a citizen of the world than of the United States, I am as deeply impressed by the treatment of the German; as for the peasant father, he is beyond "treatment," a great character and symbol.

This same fundamental innocence, coupled with a broad, almost operatic (and sometimes hammy) theatrical vitality, boldly clashes extremely discordant attitudes and styles, anything from desperate seriousness and majestic satire through passionately improvised slapstick. During the long climax these clashings blend in such a way that the picture, faults and all, soars along one of the rarest heights possible to art—the height from which it is seen that the whole race, including the observer, is to be pitied, laughed at, feared for, and revered for its delusions of personal competence for good, evil, or mere survival, as it sleepwalks along ground which continuously opens bottomless chasms beneath the edges of its feet. This seems to me one of the truest conceivable perspectives on the human predicament.

The man in the film who evidently understands it best, and who evidently realizes also the prodigious animal power to endure, and the unlimited fertility of the heart and spirit through which man is indestructible and victorious even in his downfall through this insanity, even in his absurdity, is Aldo Fabrizi, who plays the peasant, and who collaborated on the script. I infer that he understands it neither intellectually nor aesthetically, but so thoroughly that it does not even strike him as particularly interesting. This is the most mature way of understanding it that I can conceive of; and this healthy, casual, and unvalued wisdom so generally illuminates and invigorates the film that many of its inadequacies are transfigured and many others are made to seem negligible. I don't agree with those who talk of Fabrizi as a great actor. As an actor he seems thoroughly experienced, astute, uninhibited, and no more. His grandeur is as a man. His good luck is his solid equipment as an artist and his magnificent equipment, in face, and lowering head, and burly body, to make visible certain kinds of greatness. The performance is merely a very good one. The embodiment is heroic: one of the few towering archetypes I have seen on the screen. I wish that this tremendous character, so close to "type" yet so far beyond it, had been given material through which it could have been much more thoroughly explored and exhausted. But one of the wonderful things about the film is the casualness with which this figure is examined and tossed away, as if the sea were stiff with fish as good and better. It is. But how many fishermen, where else in the world, know it? And of those who know it, how many are competent to haul them in?

MUSICRAFT sent me a copy of its recording of Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony (Set 83; $8.85), but didn't send with it anything to get myself drunk on; and it took several weeks to nerve myself to listen, cold sober, to a little of a few sides—enough to report that Steinberg's performance with the Buffalo Philharmonic is well reproduced by quiet-surfaced records. As for the merits of the performance, I don't think I could tell whether a performance of this work was effective or not, and I can't see that it matters; certainly I can't imagine it making a difference to the person who likes the work.

From RCA Victor there is a new recording of Haydn's Symphony No. 94 ("Surprise") (Set 1155; $4) which demonstrates again Koussevitzky's helplessness with this kind of music—his complete innocence of any subtlety of phraseological inflection or accentuation, resulting in a first movement with unvarying accent on the one and the four of each six-eighth measure. The beautiful sound of the Boston Symphony is well reproduced; the surfaces of my copy are poor.

And from Columbia there is still another recording of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—this one made by Bruno Walter with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 699; $4.60). The performance brings to mind the remark once attributed to Toscanini—and true even if he didn't make it: "When Walter comes to something beautiful he melts. I suffer!" I am aware of the beauties in this work that are responsible for the melting softness of Walter's performance; but I am aware also of what calls for the steadiness, control, and strength that the performance lacks. Its recorded sound on a wide-range machine is spacious and rich, the best Columbia has achieved with this orchestra; on the limited-range Zenith it is muffled. (Concerning the recent Columbia recording of Schubert's Symphony No. 9 the printer had me saying, in the November 22 issue, that the work was "not at all well played" by Walter; but what I wrote was that it was "not all well played"—meaning that part was well done and part not.)

RCA Victor also has issued a set (1143; $5) with some of Ravel's elaborately contrived trivialities: the "Valse Nobles et sentimentales," which anticipate "La Valse," and the rarely heard Suite No. 1 from "Daphnis et Chloé," played by Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony. The performances seem good and are richly reproduced; but the English Decca set of the two "Daphnis" suites offers even finer orchestral playing and recording, such as is offered by the set (ED-33; $5) of Ravel's "Bolero," played much more slowly than we are accustomed to by Muench with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

From English Decca there is also a set (ED-34; $5) of the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," excellently performed by the London Philharmonic under Fitelberg, and richly recorded. And on single discs a little Symphony in E flat by the eighteenth-century composer Anton Filitz—with a charming middle movement and a mildly engaging finale—well played by the Boyd Neel Orchestra (K-1680; $2); and Mendelssohn's fine "Ruy Blas" Overture, excellently played by the National Symphony under Unger, and beautifully recorded (K-1326; $2).

The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe began its season at New York's City Center in September in its usual state of exhaustion—caused this time by rehearsal too intensive for the stamina of the company but insufficient for the new members to learn all their parts, so that the opening performance of "Ballet Impérial" was a chaos in which one could occasionally discern the sharp clarity and brilliance of Moylan's dancing. And as usual the performances improved in the course of the season as the company became more secure and recovered its strength. Danilova too was obviously too tired for the demands of "Le Beau Danube" the opening night, and was still tired in "Swan Lake" two nights later, but was miraculously refreshed for a great performance in "Le Baiser de la fée" the following night (the corps de ballet, however, had not mastered the rhythmic intricacies of the village scene) and in top form thereafter.

The new pieces were not of great consequence: a revised and expanded version of Antonia Cobos's "Madronos," with an extremely funny opening scene, and for the rest a series of enjoyable Spanish-style dances such as Argentinita used to put on; Ruthanna Boris's "Cirque de deux," with a few amusing jokes expanded to excessive length—the sort of kidding of ballet that John Martin can understand and enjoy; and Edward Caton's "Lola Montez," still another piece of mining-town Americana, with two superb dances by Danilova—one essentially her last bravura slow dance in "Raymonda," the other her brilliantly gay Spanish dance in the second act of "Coppelia."

The Monte Carlo might offer some poor works, but it also offered some great ones; its performances of these works might be imperfect, but even with their imperfections they were the real thing, and often were raised to greatness by the work of dancers like Danilova and Franklin who gave everything they had and—in the case of Danilova—even more. After all this it was shocking to attend the Markova-Dolin programs with their new pieces—Hightower's "Henry VIII," Dolin's new "Camille"—devised to exhibit the twitterings to which Markova has reduced her dancing—to say nothing of what they devised for Dolin to do.

Letters on the Catholic Series

[We devote these columns this week to extracts from a few of the letters received in regard to Paul Blanshard's three articles, The Roman Catholic Church in Medicine, The Sexual Code of the Roman Catholic Church, and The Roman Catholic Church and the Schools. The articles appeared in the issues of November 1, 8, and 15.

The selection below attempts to be as representative as possible. Some 300 letters were received, attacking or praising Mr. Blanshard's articles. In addition, several hundred copies of a column entitled Let Him Speak Now, which appeared in a Los Angeles Catholic newspaper, the Tidings, were clipped and mailed in to The Nation. Part of this column appears at the end of the readers' letters. Two national Catholic publications, America and Commonweal, have attacked the series.

Mr. Blanshard has written an answer to America challenging any of its editors to a public debate in New York. This letter, with a comment by The Nation, will appear soon in these pages.

Reprints of the Catholic series will be available in about two weeks (see page 649 of this issue).—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Strong Protests

Dear Sirs: I have no intention of ever reading your magazine again.

THOMAS UNGS

Iowa City, November 18

Dear Sirs: Besides betraying gross ignorance and outright lying, they [Blanshard's articles] denote the fall of your magazine to the gutter level of bigoted trash.

P. M. MILES

Los Angeles, November 15

Dear Sirs: Thank you so much for your series of articles warning us Catholics of the dangers of our scheming hierarchy. But I, for one, have been well aware of the church's policies in medicine, sex, and education for many years—that's why I'm a Catholic.

The next time you attack the church we Catholics would appreciate it if you would do the following: (1) Label the article for what it is. Don't parade a diatribe under the banner of a crusade to enlighten Catholics—most Catholics know more about their faith than Mr. Blanshard or fellow-bigots will probably ever know. (2) Attack the church as a body. Don't separate the hierarchy from the laity, for the clergy without the faithful isn't the church, or even a power.

R. J. HAMPTON

South Pasadena, Cal., November 15

Dear Sirs: As assistant editor of our union's publication, with a mailing list of over 10,000 in the state of California, I shall do all in my power to use its pages to inform our readers of your religious bias and discrimination.

F. J. DONELLY,

Los Angeles, November 18

Objective? Fair?

Dear Sirs: The attitude of the writer is not objective and fair. The entire tone is one of animosity.

BROTHER EDWARD P. SHEEKEY

Philadelphia, November 17

Dear Sirs: In my estimation Paul Blanshard's recent articles on the Roman Catholic church are some of the most objective writing on that topic I have ever seen.

GLENN T. TREWARTHA

Madison, Wis., November 25

Dear Sirs: The articles by Paul Blanshard are the most amazing collection of half-truths and faulty reasoning I have ever seen. No more Nations for me, unless it returns to its old standard.

KATHRYN ELKINS

Hollywood, Cal., November 19

Dear Sirs: Mr. Blanshard writes about an important threat to democracy. He treats the subject with minimum malice and hatred, in a fair and well-documented way.

"A Direct Warning"

Dear Sirs: Mr. Blanshard's articles come as a strong breath of fresh air; but also as a direct warning to every American, Catholic and non-Catholic alike. We are so preoccupied with the "reds" that we have failed to realize the presence of a far more dangerous, subtle, and effective menace right here—the curse which wrecked and enslaved Spain, which helped precipitate World War II, and is doing its utmost to bring war again.

The shouts of "bigot" and "K. K. K." uttered by powerful clerics and their naive non-Roman fellow-travelers have silenced almost all intelligent and candid criticism. But the Catholic church is becoming increasingly aggressive in its attempts to dominate American life. Here in Boston medieval bigotry and superstition have stifled freedom of expression, ruined the school system, and atrophied the public conscience.

CHARLES H. WHITTIER

Somerville, Mass., October 31

What God Wants

Dear Sirs: Mr. Blanshard will probably be surprised to learn that the Catholic church does not promulgate her doctrine with an eye to what an American, German, Russian, Chinese, or Italian jury—even though its members be Catholic—might think. In fact, I suspect that she takes some interest, instead, in what God wants.

FRANK J. RIVERA

Los Angeles, Cal., November 10

Dear Sirs: No one of any faith whatsoever can approve of, or allow the occurrence of, or aid in an action which he actually believes to be wrong, and not be guilty of sin, though the sin be nothing graver than the violation of his own conscience. A belief may be right or wrong, but if it is right, it is right for everyone. If it is wrong, it is wrong for everyone.

ROSE H. PARET

New York, November 3

Dear Sirs: It is folly to write a series of articles on Catholic social practices in regard to medicine, marriage, and science, and yet protest that the articles do not concern themselves with the religion.

KENNETH BUSSY

Washington, November 6

The Articles Are Naive

Dear Sirs: I take issue with the philosophy underlying Mr. Blanshard's reasoning. The general tenor of the articles is similar to all anti-Catholic writing of the day. The feeling that the church is in a servile and dogmatic slumber permeates the essays. But the church, in my opinion, is as aware of current social and scientific developments as any "force" existing today. It is for this reason that I deplore the dismissal of an important papal edict by attributing it to an "unfortunate mistake of an old man who had never been married and had never studied medicine."

By viewing the over-all functioning of the church it becomes evident that its guiding principles are simple. In order to wield sociological control, the church must maintain the integrity of its internal organization and at the same time nourish its arms of mental and physical regulation. Permit me to analyze a few of Mr. Blanshard's theses:

(1) Is a married priesthood conceivable? My answer is that it's utterly ridiculous. (2) Did Pius XI know what he was doing when he outlawed birth control in 1930? Emphatically, yes! The use of contraception would loosen the ossified structure of Catholic society. (3) Why does Fulton Sheen oppose psychoanalysis? Psychoanalysis dethrones sin, and one of the major agencies employed by the church to effect mental control is the notion of "sin."

I enjoyed Mr. Blanshard's articles immensely, but I decry any attempt to pass off Catholic behavior in the name of ignorance.

DAVID E. REID, JR.

White Plains, N. Y., November 10

The Articles Are Sinister

Dear Sirs: The harm is done and the blood pool of falsehood is spreading. Take care lest it engulf us all.

JOHN P. HALE

New York, November 19

Or Ill-Considered

Dear Sirs: What do the articles accomplish? They do not take members away from the church. They do not make Catholics more critical. They create more antagonism. . . . How does the obscurantism of the church on matters of sex and education differ from certain Protestant sects or from orthodox Jewry? Will not the articles cause the ignorant readers to become just plain anti-Catholic, which is as bad as being plain anti-Protestant or anti-Semitic? I believe the articles were ill-considered and their publication a bad case of editorial misjudgment.

MARTIN WOLFSON

Brooklyn, November 14

Dear Sirs: The last issue of The Nation that came to me I had to burn up because of the articles on sex, which I think belong only in a medical magazine.

KATE C. GARTZ

Altadena, Cal., November 14

Dear Sirs: I read Blanshard's articles, and though not opposed to the criticism, per se, couldn't help wondering if it was needed. This is no day to fear asceticism in sex morality. Anybody with an honest heart knows that the gravest danger in the United States is just the opposite, namely, sex license to an appalling and abhorrent degree. The Puritans indeed were wrong about their prurient attitudes, but when I take a look at the kind of sex morals on display today I would say give us back the Puritans, despite their errors.

PAUL BRINKMAN, JR.

Portland, Ore., November 15

Or Terrific

Dear Sirs: At long last I have found a publication which is not afraid of the Roman Catholic church and will give with the facts. They are terrific articles. I served in the Army Air Forces for almost two and a half years, part of the time as a chaplain's assistant. I learned, through experience, what the priesthood is, and what the score is.

LESTER F. GROSS, JR.

Wilkes-Barre, Pa., November 11

Dear Sirs: You have rendered an invaluable service to our country. May God bless and reward you for the good you have performed.

A. DI DOMENICA, D.D.

Philadelphia, November 15

Dear Sirs: You are greatly to be thanked for Paul Blanshard's articles, as he, of course, also is for writing them. . . . It would be lamentable if the Roman church got the upper hand in this country. Witness the conditions in Roman Catholic nations.

SYDNEY T. COOKE

New York, November 14

Dear Sirs: I have been a reader of The Nation for many years. In all that time I have not seen a series of articles more timely and to the point than those of Paul Blanshard. In view of what is going on now in Philadelphia, where an official of the Roman Catholic church "demands" that a certain movie be withdrawn from public showing, the importance of Mr. Blanshard's warnings cannot be overemphasized.

RAYMOND C. GERBER

Williamsville, N. Y., November 13

A Point Overlooked

Dear Sirs: The articles are excellent. But on birth control Mr. Blanshard overlooked one important point which is revealed by a careful reading of the English translation of the Pope's encyclical "Casti conubii," namely, that there is no condemnation here of birth control in the important case where the two parties are not married to each other. If he rereads it, he will see that wherever birth control is condemned, the phrase "in matrimony," or its equivalent, is conjoined. The reason for this limitation of the condemnation is clear, and a credit to pontifical sense: it is that if two people are proceeding anyway to the sin of fornication or adultery, it is better that they add the smaller sin of contraception than the greater sin of risking creation of a bastard child.

S. COLUM GILFILLAN

Chicago, November 14

A Special Problem

Dear Sirs: Blanshard's articles were very enlightening and educational. I think that more information of this type should be made available to both Protestants and Catholics. As one who is married to a very nice, but Catholic, girl, I am unusually aware of the uncompromising—and yet what I feel is the ignorant—attitude of the church.

"Let Him Speak Now"

BY FRANK SULLIVAN

(From the Tidings, Los Angeles, November 14)

AN OLD friend of mine died two weeks ago (speak softly and sad), a friend that I had defended, made excuses for, praised, and took pride in—a friend the memory of whose bygone courage and departed honesty I shall sincerely mourn.

On the first of November The Nation, a magazine that once fought for truth as I understood it, and justice as it was known, a magazine that was once exciting, and decent, and good . . . died. And in its place, using its name, appeared a shifty, loose-lipped journal, pandering to hatred and selling viciousness wrapped in cheap papers to the trembling addicts of ignorance. On the first of November The Nation began a series of three articles on The Roman Catholic Church in Medicine.

These articles are written by Paul Blanshard—a man with no understanding of either medicine or theology, but a man skilful in the manipulation of half-truths, of innuendo, and the monsters of specious reasoning. He is a man of great talent (as were Hitler and Mussolini), and I confidently expect him to take his place beside such experts at his trade as Gerald L. K. Smith, Joseph McWilliams, and the late Theodore Bilbo. The Nation hired him to do a job, and The Nation should be proud of him. The Nation I grew up with would not have been . . . but then, of course, it's dead.

Dead are the principles of tolerance. Some people start to hate enemies, find it healthful (good for the circulation), and so extend it against their friends. I'm sure that The Nation's circulation is good now that it has tied in with the anti-Semites, and the lynch-law bullies. The three of them may point in different directions, but they're all hollering the same thing: "Hate him; he's different. Come all you who are emotionally insecure. Come all you who are intellectually malformed. Here is a lie; suck it till your hate is satisfied. Hate the Jews. Hate the Negroes. Hate the Catholics."

I do not propose to answer Mr. Blanshard in detail. His grasp of theology is comparable to the kind of foundation acquired in science by reading Buck Rogers. I haven't time to argue mathematics with a child who insists that the area of a circle is equal to a square piece of pie just because he has heard the formula expressed as pi-r-square. Nor do I have time to waste in a point-by-point refutation of Mr. Blanshard, who illustrates his learning by saying Catholics consider "the head of the fetus as the probable seat of the soul."

Catholics not only don't say any such thing, but they have condemned those who did—for example, Descartes. . . .

The main point attacked by Mr. Blanshard is the church's insistence that if at birth it is impossible to save the mother without directly killing the child, then the mother must die.

Suppose, Mr. Blanshard, your wife is out in a boat with a despicable character—with me, for example. Suppose the boat will sink and drown us both unless one of us gets out. Suppose you shoot me. What does the law say about that? It says you'll hang if you do. Blanshard, you know that you can't kill a no-good lug like me, but I don't hear a peep out of you. But you're writing articles protesting because you can't kill your own son. What a character!

Actually what are the facts of the case? How often does Mr. Blanshard's terrorizing necessity arise? I have checked three Catholic hospitals and discovered that in the last ten years cases such as The Nation uses to upset its readers have occurred exactly zero point cipher oh times nothing.

And why? One reason is that the church's insistence on the dignity and sacredness of human life has forced advances in obstetrical science that would never have occurred if people like Mr. Blanshard had been able to confuse the delivery-room with the butcher shop. Because the church has defended decency, humanity, and justice, The Nation has attacked it. The attack didn't hurt the church. But it killed The Nation that I once knew . . . speak softly and sad.

PALESTINE AT THE UNITED NATIONS

The Inside Story

Because the Nation Associates was active throughout the fight for a decent solution of the Palestine issue in the United Nations, we were able to watch at close range the complicated maneuvers that went on behind the scenes. The story—as much as can be revealed—will be told in our next issue by Lillie Shultz, who represented The Nation and the Nation Associates throughout the session of the Assembly.

The Shape of Things

A NEWS FLASH FROM LONDON ANNOUNCES, as we go to press, that the Council of Foreign Ministers has adjourned indefinitely. Thus, what may prove to be the last effort of the Big Four to write a joint peace treaty with Germany has ended in abject failure. Total disagreement on the reparations question seems to have been the immediate cause, but there was no meeting of minds on any point of importance. Nor, perhaps, could any have been expected, considering the tense state of mutual suspicion between Russia and the United States. With no armistice in sight to halt the "cold war," the contest will now be transferred from the council chamber to other fields, with capture of the political support and economic potential of Germany the immediate objective of both sides. We shall comment at length next week on the causes and consequences of this sorry ending of a once great alliance.

COMMUNIST ECONOMY IS NO MORE IMMUNE to the ravages of inflation than a capitalist or semi-Socialist one. In Russia, as in other countries, huge unproductive war-time expenditures led to a vast increase in the supply of money in relation to the supply of goods. The result was "an inflationary gap" which the Soviet government now proposes to close by drastic devaluation. Holders of cash will receive only one new ruble for ten old ones. Owners of state bonds are treated better: they will exchange their securities on a one-for-three basis. Bank depositors, who will receive one for one on the first three thousand rubles, do best of all. The chief concern of most Soviet workers will probably be the actual buying power of their incomes. Since wages, pensions, and so forth are to remain unchanged, real incomes will depend on the new unified price schedules. In the absence of more data than are at present available, it is hard to say just how the various classes will fare; those whose incomes have been sufficient to buy only what their ration cards entitled them to may be rather worse off. Bread will cost them a little less; meat, fats, sugar, vegetables, and some other items, no more. And with rationing ended, they will be able to buy as much as they can afford. On the other hand, tea, milk, fruits, textiles, and shoes—previously rationed—are to be priced above the ration level though well under that prevailing in the "commercial stores." Those who hitherto have earned enough to enable them to patronize the commercial stores may find the buying power of their incomes enhanced but that of their savings diminished. On the whole, we doubt whether devaluation will greatly alter the distribution of goods in Russia.

EVERY DELAY AND SIGN OF HESITATION among the major powers or in the United Nations stimulate violence in Palestine and encourage the still vacillating members of the Arab League to accept the dictates of the Mufti and his fellow-firebrands. Yet nothing has happened in these past two weeks to convince the Arabs that the decision of the U. N. Assembly was a serious business, to be carried out firmly and with energy. The five-nation Palestine Commission has not even been appointed. Only one member was named—Lisicky of Czechoslovakia; and he has sailed for home. The somnolent tempo at Lake Success possibly reflects American as well as British reluctance to take the necessary next steps. In any case, that reluctance is not to be questioned; the Bevin attitude has an exact echo in certain corners of the State Department. On page 675, we publish a detailed record of the Palestine fight in the U. N. The story, which even now can be told only in part, reveals plainly the cross-currents of interest in Washington which all but immobilized the American delegation at the Assembly. The same situation, if it continues, will block effective American help in implementing partition and enabling Palestine's Jews to defend the security of their newly promised land.

AS FOR BRITAIN, ITS BEHAVIOR, BOTH IN Palestine and at home, has been such as to guarantee increasing Arab violence. Although troops were finally moved into one or two areas where tension was greatest, the British authorities have largely held aloof. Still worse, the murderous assault on the peaceful Jewish road convoy by troops of the Arab Legion—Transjordan's British-led army—shows that even the forces ostensibly charged with keeping order are not to be relied on. Attacks have multiplied on both sides, with the Irgun staging reprisals that would certainly have been avoided had the British given Haganah authority to maintain order. As it is, extremists are gaining ground, creating a situation that will make the work of the commission, when it ultimately takes over, almost hopelessly difficult. But Britain's folded-arms attitude in Palestine is by no means its only form of obstruction. The government has announced that although it will probably lay down the mandate by May 15, the U. N. Commission will not be received in Palestine until two weeks before that date. Two weeks to reestablish order, set up organs of government, and form and arm militias to maintain order without any further help from the British forces! This explicit formula for failure, following the behavior of Britain in the U. N. and its record since then in Palestine, seems sufficient proof that what the Prime Minister really wants is the breakdown of partition, before it has even a chance to get under way. In spite of the dilatory and divided temper of the State Department, we are sure neither the President nor Secretary Marshall would welcome such an outcome. We call upon them, most urgently, to take the necessary steps to prevent it.

BEYOND THE POINT OF BEING SURPRISED AT anything John L. Lewis might do, we nevertheless read no fanciful significance into his contemptuous two-word message of "disaffiliation" from the American Federation of Labor. Inevitably, rumors are to be had for the picking: Lewis will make his peace with Phil Murray and return to the C. I. O.; Lewis will go raiding and build his District 50 into a third major labor organization; Lewis will revive his Labor's Non-Partisan League and cast in his political lot with Henry Wallace. Any of them could be true, but none need be. The mine leader has always been a labor statesman of the rule-or-ruin persuasion, and after what happened at the A. F. of L.'s last convention it simply wouldn't pay him or his miners to stay in. It would have meant contributing $216,000 a year to the Federation treasury in dues and another $600,000 to Labor's Education and Political League in the form of a voluntary donation—all without a representative on the Executive Council. At sixty-seven, and far from well, it is unlikely that Lewis will make much of a splash either politically or as a contender for labor leadership. Even assuming that he could dispose of the miners' vote—which he failed to do, in the past—where could he throw it? As for the potentialities of District 50, he has lavished time and money on that catch-all for some years without achieving more than a total membership of 75,000. Lewis may have walked out of the spotlight this time.

THE BROOKLYN TABLET AND THE NEW YORK World-Telegram have scored a disturbing victory for bigotry. For many years, New York school teachers have obtained "alertness" credits toward pay increases by taking approved lecture courses in various city educational institutions. Under pressure from the two newspapers, the Board of Superintendents last week dropped from its approved list one lecturer and one course and ordered the suspension of a second course pending its "reorganization." The excommunicated lecturer is Dr. Bernhard J. Stern, Columbia University sociologist, and the course is "The Soviet Union, Its Economic and Cultural Development," given by the American-Russian Institute. The suspended course is "Backgrounds and Techniques in Teaching Intercultural Education," sponsored by a group of teachers' societies, which are subject to the authority of the Board of Superintendents, as the institute is not. The Tablet and the World-Telegram objected to Dr. Stern, an acknowledged authority on race relations, because of his leftist connections and his authorship, seventeen years ago, of a pamphlet attacking the three major American religions. The Tablet also objected to the intercultural education course on the ground that six of its lectures were to deal with racial prejudice—proof positive, naturally, that Communists were at work. As we go to press, the sponsoring teachers' societies have not replied to the Board of Superintendents' order. We hope that, when they do, the board will reverse its decision. An adult's freedom to hear the speakers he chooses, as well as to earn much-needed credits, should not be cut to fit the cloth of the Tablet and the World-Telegram.

THE UNITED NATIONS CERTAINLY GETS around. The Human Rights Commission has now been requested to do something about a king of the Bekom tribes, in the British Cameroons, who collects wives. The St. Joan's Social and Political Alliance of London has put the matter squarely up to the commission in a petition documented with a story which is so vivid that we are surprised to find that it was the work of a Franciscan missionary. It seems that this old gentleman, the king—he is eighty—sends out scouts to the tribal huts to select young and comely candidates. The girls, with "nothing on but a necklace of large seeds," are brought, one by one, before the king, who sits on his throne with a leopard under his feet. The girl's father throws his daughter to the ground, the king steps forward and places his right foot upon her, and another wife is added to his collection of some six hundred. During the ceremony, a hundred of these wives "stand around him in a semi-circle—naked—as is the privilege and custom of the 'king's own'." Needless to say, we expect the Human Rights Commission to do its duty—and we should like to be on hand when its representative, clothed, of course, with full powers, explains to a king who uses a live leopard for a footstool why he shouldn't collect wives.

COMMENTING LAST WEEK ON THE FIRING of ten Hollywood writers for refusing to tell the Un-American Committee whether or not they were Communists, we remarked that "anti-communism is a one-way through street" and that "once you enter it you either proceed to the end or you back out—quickly." Several readers have chosen to interpret this remark as a back-handed indorsement of communism, whereas we were referring, of course, to the red-baiting procedures of the Thomas committee and the Hollywood producers who did the firing. There is also an anti-communism, obviously, that has nothing in common with hysteria or the denial of civil rights, and from this kind of opposition the Communists are entitled to no more exemption than any other political group.

Confusion Confounded

IT IS now a month since the President opened the special session of Congress with a message asking for drastic powers to combat inflation. During these weeks, prices have continued to rise rapidly. Butter is again almost $1 a pound; eggs are hitting $1 a dozen. Quotations for industrial goods have been moving upward even more rapidly than those of farm products. In the past few days, sharp increases have been announced for tinplate, farm machinery, some automobiles, rayon yarn, and petroleum products.

This steady erosion of the purchasing power of the dollar should have served as a goad to government action. Yet, in the past month, no visible progress has been registered on the Washington front. For this, both the Administration and the Congress share the blame. Mr. Truman's ten points provided the working basis for a legislative program, but he has failed to sell his ideas to his own subordinates, not to mention Congress. We have had the unedifying spectacle of Cabinet officers—Anderson and Harriman for example—appearing before Congressional committees to damn the President's proposals with faint praise and to plug their individual policies. On the all-important question of checking credit inflation, discussed by Keith Hutchison in detail on page 681, Secretary of the Treasury Snyder and Chairman Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board, men on whom Mr. Truman must rely for guidance in this field, have been publicly at loggerheads.

If the Republican majority in Congress had even a modicum of courage and wisdom, it would have seized the opportunity afforded by these divisions in the Administration to come forward with a really effective program of its own. But it, too, is split. Some of the younger members of the party realize that the situation is far too dangerous for indulgence in smart tactics. The concern of their leaders, however, has been to reap maximum political benefits with minimum disturbance of the boom that is filling the coffers of their supporters. They have issued a program that pays some homage to the principle of control, but in general approaches the subject in a vague and ultra-cautious manner. A very small part of this program has been embodied in a bill which merely authorizes government encouragement of voluntary agreements for the allocation of transport and of commodities in short supply. To make way for this feeble measure, they have thrust aside an Administration bill providing broad powers to ration food and other scarce goods and to establish priorities for key raw materials.

To encourage business cooperation, the bill proposes, for a limited period, to relieve parties to any agreement approved by the President from the operation of the anti-trust laws. This seems to us a highly dangerous proposal. In the case of industries in which supply is beginning to catch up with demand, protected voluntary agreements may prove popular, but they are more likely to stabilize high prices than help to bring them down. And in those industries whose production will for a long time remain unequal to demand, an agreement to stabilize prices or to equalize distribution can easily be thwarted by a few holdouts, for the bill fails to provide any powers of enforcement.

Let us consider, for instance, the current situation in oil. Some of the larger concerns have been trying to check the steady rise in prices, which they realize can do little to encourage higher production and much to give the industry a black eye with the public. They have been stymied by the competitive scramble for crude oil. Few of the big refiners have sufficient crude supplies of their own to insure capacity operation of their plants, and if one concern raises its buying price, the others must sooner or later follow suit or find themselves unable to fill orders. The latest attempt at stabilization was killed recently when Sun Oil (controlled by Pennsylvania's G. O. P. boss, J. Howard Pew) raised its buying price for crude by 50 cents to $2.57 a barrel, which compares with $1.27 when the OPA ended.

The real trouble in oil is that with a steadily rising demand for fuel oils there is not enough to go round. This has nothing to do with exports, since we are actually importing more oil than we ship. Voluntary allocations will not remedy the situation, for a few chiselers can render any agreement ineffective. If serious shortages in many areas, causing widespread suffering, are to be avoided this winter, enforceable price control and rationing measures are essential. And as even Senator Taft is beginning to discover, rationing of meat will be equally essential next spring when supplies will be far shorter than they are now.

The G. O. P. bill does not begin to grapple with such problems; its only purpose seems to be to mislead and confuse the voters. It is almost certain to be vetoed, if it passes Congress, for Mr. Truman has sharply condemned relaxation of the anti-trust laws. (Unfortunately, his position on this subject has been compromised by Secretary of Commerce Harriman's approval of the principle embodied in the bill.) Possibly, the Republicans not only expect but want a veto, with the idea that they could wash their hands of further responsibility for inflation. If that is their strategy, we hope the President counters it by sticking firmly to his program. But he will have to start by insisting that his department heads support his line instead of adopting conflicting positions of their own. The spectacle of the Cabinet at sixes and sevens is the most confounding of all the present confusions in Washington.

What Are We Afraid Of?

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IS IT and ponder the fever over Communists and civil rights, the polite debate between the New York Herald Tribune and the leader of the E. B. White Party, the list of "subversive" organizations put out by the Justice Department, the Ernst-Hays dispute about "disclosure" as a preventive for subversion. I recall 1919-1920; more, I turn the pages of the Nation volumes for those years and try to fathom the reason for the epidemics of fright that have followed both world wars.

What in the name of Thomas Jefferson are we scared of? The raids under A. Mitchell Palmer, the ousting of duly elected Socialists from the New York Legislature, the unceremonious mass deportations of alien "reds"—what did they signify? Today, it is Communists that are thrown out of government jobs along with any others stamped as dangerous under the convenient and ugly theory of association. Today, there are not many aliens to ship abroad; the supply, owing to our tight immigration laws and fine screening, is short. But we grab those few who escaped the Nazis with left views and questionable papers, or who lied to save their lives, and convert usually quite harmless fugitives into criminal enemies of the state.

Can the fever to hunt heretics be laid to Moscow? Does it come from fear of imminent war? Does it come from a belief that this country—undamaged, overflowing with goods, powerful beyond the dreams of any world conqueror—is in the danger of a Communist-led uprising of the workers? In spite of Russia's bluster and attempts to girdle its borders with safe satellite states, no one really believes the Soviet government could start, or successfully wage, a war. In the whole world, only the United States is capable of doing that. Nor do sane Americans seriously anticipate revolution. Our one visible, quite present danger is a new Harding era, with labor driven into division and bankruptcy and radicals chivvied underground and liberals organized—like E. B.

White—in “parties of one,” ready to be swallowed in comfortable mouthfuls by those gentlemen we have so trustfully encouraged to save us from the reds. If the present hysteria is at all related to such fears, it is more as a general reaction to Russian provocations and refusal to cooperate in the ordinary business of international relations. (Quite naturally, we minimize, or even forget, our own less spectacular exhibitions of non-cooperation, such as Mr. Collins mentions on page 669.) We boil with anger at evidence of red injustice in Bulgaria or Rumania or red domination of French trade unions—and then easily transfer our emotion to the meager if irritating displays made by our few native Communists.

But why is our boiling-point so low, and why have we so little confidence in our own democratic stability? As Harold Laski said in his impressive article last week, “Powerful America does not appear to be a happy America.” Some psychosis of guilt or dread, unrelated to our apparent national health or to the actual threats we face, must account for the terrible urge to mutilate our institutions in order to save them.

THINK back to 1919. Some say that our “danger” is greater today than then because Russia is a mighty military power—even minus the bomb—and the world Communist movement is its instrument of penetration and intimidation. I would dispute this argument. In 1919 and 1920, the Red Army was weak by 1947 standards. But the revolution was young and its ideas were potent and uncompromised. Then, as now, hungry workers without jobs rose against the system they blamed for the war and all that followed. Bavaria had a Soviet government and so did Hungary. (Belfast, too!) The Italian workers seized the factories in the north. The French Socialists split, but the majority section joined the Third International, as did the Spanish and Norwegian Socialists. The flood of revolution moved across Europe and menaced, much more immediately than today, the old states of Central and Western Europe.

It broke then, as it may break tomorrow, against Western capitalist power reinforced by grants-in-aid from America. The old gang got back. American capital bailed out Germany. Russia’s fierce resistance was smashed by Allied intervention and Allied backing for White generals. Poland and the Baltic provinces were financed and armed solely to fight the Soviets. Horthy was tricked into power by Britain; Mussolini, a little later, took over in Italy. The Munich Soviet government collapsed in the blood of its great leader, Kurt Eisner; Luxemburg and Liebknecht were assassinated, and the Socialist Noske shot down Communist workers in Berlin. Whatever democratic vagaries Mr. Wilson exhibited at Paris, he was firmly and successfully dealt with by Clemenceau and Lloyd George.

But though reaction triumphed, the system that bred it never recovered. It was shattered by war, weakened by the fall of empires and territorial changes. The great European middle class lost much of its vitality through physical depletion and inflation. Capitalism pulled itself together again, but it was a shell of its old self—and the end of social revolution only marked the beginning of fascism.

Then, as now, and with as much reason, the United States rushed food to Europe to save lives and regimes. We intervened to crush revolution. And, even more frantically, we kicked democratic safeguards and legal processes out of the window.

WHAT was and is the psychosis that explains our behavior? Perhaps it is a sense, still unformulated and only half conscious, that our strength is less solid than it seems, that it is threatened, not by Russia or Communist drive, but by internal ailments that may be beyond cure—troubles related to gigantism and monopoly, to the steady weakening of really free enterprise, to the failure of capital to use its concentrated, almost unchecked power in ways that will preserve even itself, much less the economic stability of the nation or the world. People sense—dimly remembering the twenties—that our inflated prosperity is a symptom of disease, not a show of health. They know that private enterprise is, by its nature, the enemy of planning, except when it plans for its own larger return, but they suspect that only planning on a world scale can save the human race from catastrophe. If they listen to the primitive economics declaimed by most of the men who make our laws, they may outwardly applaud, but inwardly they ask: What’s going to happen? Things don’t feel steady.

The heresy hunt, I suspect, is a dodge to escape our own buried fears, our sense of restless insecurity. Free enterprise is all right. America is all right. They must be, because we’ve been told so, and the people that question it are working for Moscow. So let’s get those people and we’ll feel okay again. But back there, in the underground of the mind, saboteurs are at work telling us that what went on between 1919 and 1939 is still going on, only at a faster rate, and that even rich, tough America is not proof against it. A once-powerful system has been liquidated over much of the earth. It is prostrate, waiting for our strength to give it back the strength it lost through the crumbling of its foundations in two wars and a disastrous interval of revolution and fascist domination. Can we put the rotten system on its feet? Can we save our own not-so-sound system from similar collapse? The questions hang in the air and in the underlayers of the American consciousness.

Loyalty tests, red hunts, even liberal apologetics for “moderate” forms of repression—these are the compulsive, unreal answers our emotions provide to spare us the need of looking for the real ones.

POLITICS and PEOPLE

BY ROBERT BENDINER

Wallace: the Incomplete Angler

THE time is rapidly approaching when Henry Wallace will have to fish or cut bait. Fifteen months is a long time to stand indecisively on the bank, rod over shoulder, and the fish are understandably beginning to lose interest. As long ago as last spring it became apparent that Phil Murray and the C. I. O. were lost to the Wallace-for-President cause; Senator Pepper discovered that Truman was the "salt of the earth" early in September; and A. F. Whitney inflicted the unkindest cut of all a few days later. Or at least the unkindest cut up to that moment. It seems to me that a more painful if less direct blow has just been dealt by Dr. Frank Kingdon, cochairman of the Progressive Citizens of America.

Wallace is not a member of the Progressive Citizens, but he has been their idol, the fixed star in their political sky, and the prime source of their gate receipts. As a reporter I have been to their rallies and observed how these meetings are built up through successive stages of laudation to a crescendo of enthusiasm for Henry A. Wallace, as man, as statesman, as leader. And none has been more lavish in his praise than Kingdon, none more scornful of the Democratic Party, none more ardent about a People's Party now—and none more successful in raising money for same.

Yet here is Dr. Kingdon writing in his New York Post column that the time has come for Wallace and Truman to smoke the pipe of peace. They must come together, he says, in order to prevent the Republicans from winning by default. This must be avoided, we are told, because the Republicans would "lift remaining controls, reduce business taxes, tighten labor restraints . . . increase inflation, and drive toward depression." And internationally they would make the Marshall Plan "openly and aggressively a program for irrevocably splitting the world in two." Not only does a Truman-Wallace rapprochement suddenly seem urgent, but, it turns out, there is ample basis for it in the present policy of the Administration. "Marshall," after all, "is basing his European policy on economic rather than political considerations," while at home "the President has taken the courageous step of recommending price controls and rationing to check inflation."

In contrast to these remarkable tributes by the co-chairman of the P. C. A., Henry Wallace has been stumping the country with increasing bitterness toward Mr. Truman and mounting affection for a third party. There will be such a party, he says, unless the Democrats change their foreign policy, and unlike Dr. Kingdon he sees no sign whatever of a change in the offing. The prospect that a third party will force a Republican into the White House dismays him not at all. On the contrary, he is now on record as favoring Taft over Truman, because even though the Ohio Senator is "the most reactionary candidate," he is "sufficiently honest so that there would be no danger of fascism." This bitter if unintelligible piece of political analysis, coming as it did the day after a bid for his support by Democratic National Chairman J. Howard McGrath, had about it an air of finality that was hardly dissipated by the subsequent feeble effort to laugh it off as "make-believe." I think Henry Wallace has made his choice.

The same cannot yet be said of Kingdon. Having urged a rapprochement between Truman and Wallace and explained why progressives must rally to the Democratic standard, he has since gone barnstorming with Wallace, and his platform remarks on the Administration have been hardly more complimentary than they were before he wrote the column from which I have quoted. In Syracuse, for example, he called again for a "second party," a favorite formulation of his: "We are pretty tired of having just one party—one group of which marches under the Republican banner and the other under the Democratic one."

This political ambidextrousness has led some of Kingdon's followers to take the view that the column was merely a wishful dream on an off day, but others view it in the light of his own campaign for the Democratic Senatorial nomination in New Jersey. The tributes to Truman and Marshall, the plea for unity, and the renewed fealty to the Democrats are taken as his grand gesture toward the party whose nomination he seeks. On the other hand, his simultaneous agitation for a "second party" and his continued attacks on the Administration, only slightly less violent than Wallace's, appear to be both a measure of his doubt concerning the nomination and an indication of his course should that doubt be confirmed. In short, it looks from here as though Frank Kingdon will be a Democrat if he wins in the New Jersey primary and a Wallace third-party man if he loses.

Crystal-gazing is not the function of this column, but from what I have been able to gather in New Jersey I would say that Dr. Kingdon's doubts are well founded. The Democratic machine in the province of the Honorable Frank Hague has privately indicated that it would as soon plump for the man in the moon as for Frank Kingdon. And as for labor, the C. I. O. State Council is still waiting for the apology it formally requested of Kingdon in 1946, when he insulted its president, Carl Holderman, at a public dinner. The only thing that could bring the Jersey C. I. O. around to Kingdon would be the designation of a thoroughgoing reactionary by the Democratic bosses. Unless Hague has lost his cunning, he is not likely to allow them to make so foolish a blunder.

The Anderson Plan

BY HENRY H. COLLINS, JR.

Washington, December 13

SOONER or later everybody gets into the act; now it's Clinton P. Anderson's turn. The Secretary of Agriculture has come up with a plan to increase world food production. He has proposed that the United States call a conference of the Ministers of Agriculture of food-exporting countries to discuss methods of increasing their output. This sounds good, but there's a catch: the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and its predecessor, the World Food Conference, have worked along the same lines for four years.

We have by-passed the U. N. in Greece and Turkey, under the Truman Doctrine. We are by-passing the U. N.'s Economic Commission for Europe, under the short- and long-range Marshall plans. It would appear that Mr. Anderson wants to replace FAO's cooperative efforts with a plan unilaterally imposed by the United States.

His proposal was made in a speech on November 20 to the Board of Trade in New York. Just ten days earlier the FAO had wound up a meeting in Washington attended by several of the Ministers of Agriculture whom Secretary Anderson proposed to summon to a conference. Representatives of the United States Department of Agriculture were also there. Some of the foreign delegates were still in Washington on the day Mr. Anderson spoke, but he never mentioned the FAO or its work.

The FAO is important for three reasons: first, it is the oldest of the U. N.'s specialized agencies. Conceived at the World Food Conference in Hot Springs in 1943, it came to life in Quebec in 1945. There, incidentally, the American delegation was headed by Anderson himself. Second, it has had from the beginning an active program for studying world food needs and production potentials, and practical means of making the latter match the former. It is interested in the small as well as the large farmer, in the nations of Eastern Europe as well as those of the West. Its majestic aim is to abolish hunger from the earth. Third, it has, with its fifty-four member nations, more participants than any other specialized agency of the U. N. The Soviet Union, which has refused to join, apparently considers information about food a political secret. Anderson's new plan would reinforce this unfortunate attitude by helping to make food a political weapon wielded by the United States.

In addition to its four conferences since 1945 and its extensive survey reports, the FAO has sent missions to Greece and Poland, and is on the point of sending new ones to Venezuela, Siam, Hungary, and the Near East. It is advising Czechoslovakia and Peru on fish storage and all Europe on means to expand timber production. It has made detailed plans to get more rice out of the Far East, more vegetable oil out of Southeastern Asia.

It could have done much more but for its lack of enforcement powers and the world-wide shortage of dollars. The United States could have helped to overcome both these difficulties; it did not do so. The Department of Agriculture could have instructed the American delegation at Geneva last summer to give real backing to the just-established World Food Council. Instead, we meekly trailed the British, who, although FAO was headed by that redoubtable Scotsman, Sir John Boyd Orr, did their best to keep the organization weak.

As for the dollar shortage, Mr. Anderson has rather vaguely suggested that $400,000,000 to $600,000,000 of Commodity Credit Corporation funds could be used—under proper American control and leadership, of course—to finance a food-for-export production program. This might be done. But the World Bank needs no new authorization to lend funds on the recommendation of the FAO, and it would hardly hesitate to make such loans if Anderson indicated his approval of them to Secretary of the Treasury Snyder.

Meanwhile the plan is beginning to take legislative form. On December 10 Representative Jesse P. Wolcott introduced a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to use CCC funds to stimulate agricultural production in non-European countries. The resolution was referred not to the Committee on Agriculture but to the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which Wolcott is chairman. Although observers here say the State Department is disturbed by this move, and by Anderson's whole scheme, no condemnation has as yet rumbled out of its portals. The White House too is silent.

In less than two years our State Department has succeeded in alienating the good-will of the bulk of the people in the major food-receiving countries, many of them our former allies. The Anderson plan, if adopted, will alienate the mass of the people in the food-producing countries. We would work primarily through the largest landowners—the hacienderos of Argentina, the vegetable and nut oil moguls of Malaya, the rice propriétaires of French Indo-China. American loans for machinery, fertilizer, and transport would solidify feudal agricultural regimes all over the world.

A plan authorized by the FAO and financed by the World Bank, on the other hand, would effectively promote a non-discriminatory, non-exploitative program for all farmers, in which, it is to be hoped, the Soviet Union would eventually participate.

HENRY H. COLLINS, Jr., a former member of the State Department, has been attached to several Congressional committees, including the Kilgore committee. He is the author of "America's Own Refugees."

Orpheus Bound

BY MARY SMART AND MURIEL FOX

WHEN Artur Rodzinski, conductor of New York's Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, which has a radio audience of 13,000,000, threw down his baton in February of last year, thousands of concert artists and other musicians chuckled with satisfaction. They appreciated only too well the accuracy of his parting shot at the Philharmonic's Board of Directors: "Columbia Concerts, Inc., a concert management agency of which Arthur Judson is president, is often more important than the New York Philharmonic Symphony, which is treated as a subsidiary on occasion." The implication was, of course, that Arthur Judson, president of Columbia Concerts, the biggest agent for concert artists in this country, was in cahoots with Arthur Judson, manager of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, which engages more than twenty-five soloists a year. Young concert artists, whose careers are launched or broken by Agent Judson or his chief rival, the National Concert Artists Corporation, hoped that Rodzinski's resignation would call attention to Judson's strangle-hold not only on the Philharmonic, touchstone of success for young soloists, but on the concert stage in general.

Arthur Judson, once a violinist, long ago discarded his fiddle for a career of concert management. By effecting a merger of his agency with several of his competitors in 1930 and selling a half-interest to the Columbia Broadcasting System, he formed the largest concert-bookings agency in the country. His CBS tie-up gave him the inside track to radio talent and radio time, enabling him to build-up his stars' reputations and box-office appeal. At about the same time National Concert Artists Corporation, an offshoot of the National Broadcasting Company, was organized to take similar advantage of radio-build-up possibilities. Now Columbia and NCAC control between them about 90 per cent of the long-hair musical talent in the country and are the sole suppliers of concert artists to more than a thousand American towns—most of the towns that ever see a live artist.

Inevitably a young musician can have but meager hope of success unless he is fortunate enough to be managed by one of the big two. That is why the six hundred yearly graduates of the ranking Eastern music schools besiege these agencies for a place on their roster. Not more than six of the six hundred ever get a contract from one or the other of them, and these chosen few are not always the best qualified for a successful career behind the footlights. "Breaks" and an inexhaustible supply of cash are as important as talent.

Imagine the plight of a talented young writer who knows that if his novel is turned down by two publishing houses, he will never see it published. Imagine a doctor who to make a living must be connected with one of two hospitals, a lawyer who must work through one of two firms. Suppose the theater had only two producers. A young actress would not unreasonably feel crushed if one of them turned her down, and she would feel still worse if she knew it was not because she lacked acting ability but because he already had as many young actresses under contract as he cared to manage. That is the situation the young musician faces when he embarks on a concert career.

THE trials of Jeanne Therrien, Juilliard '44, are typical of those of even the most promising young stars. Miss Therrien has studied the piano since she was five. In her twenty-odd years she has devoted about 40,000 hours to practicing and another 15,000 to the study of harmony, theory, counterpoint, score reading, and conducting. Each hour of practice, each lesson, each performance, was a step toward the crucial moment in her career, the New York debut: on this single performance hangs the young musician's chance to pull down glowing notices from New York critics and thus attract the attention of a big manager.

After her graduation from Juilliard, Jeanne won the Walter W. Naumburg Award, which gave her a recital with all expenses paid at New York's Town Hall, and the Leventritt Award, which permitted her to appear at Carnegie Hall as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra. She was the first girl in the history of the contests to capture both in one year. Her talent was recognized; success seemed assured.

Jeanne Therrien gave her two concerts in January and February, 1945. The reviews called her "a brilliant young pianist born to go places." Noel Straus of the New York Times said she was "one of the big talents." Willy Kapell, 1941 Naumburg winner, wrote that when he heard her playing a Rachmaninoff concerto with the Philharmonic over the radio he thought it was Horowitz. The next morning she confidently went to the office of the Columbia Concerts corporation expecting to walk out with a contract. Instead, she was told in effect: "There's no question about it. You're a top pianist. We are most impressed with your talent, with your performances, with your notices. However, it is very difficult to sell a woman pianist. And besides we have too many young pianists on our list already. Sorry. We can't give you a contract." It looked as if her professional career had died at birth.

The managers of the two big agencies admit that not many youngsters get contracts as a result of New York debuts. Yet booking agents on the road insist that they can sell only artists with New York critics' notices. They say that Denver, for example, won't pay to hear a pianist from Kansas City, nor Dallas to hear a singer highly regarded in Pittsburgh. So the most talented musician from Kansas or Pennsylvania must go to New York and give a recital. That means that he must somehow scrape up the money to hire a manager who can arrange his recital, get out publicity, send tickets to newspaper critics, and so on.

This year about 250 musicians will give recitals in New York's concert halls, and each of these concerts will cost the performer up to $1,800. Less than twenty-five of them will make expenses, let alone a profit. Usually the manager papers the house. Yet year after year artists skimp and save to follow the New York recital route. Once in a great while they hit the jackpot, like the remarkable Polish pianist, Maryla Jonas, whose enthusiastic reviews after her Carnegie Hall debut last year won her a Columbia contract, "a solo performance with the Philharmonic, and a tour through the United States and South America during her first concert season. The majority fall by the wayside for lack of funds or lack of courage and perseverance. "You must have iron guts to survive," says one young artist who has been saving for three years to make her Town Hall debut.

IF THE going is so rough, why don't young artists go to smaller managers who have more time for them? An ingenious plan known as the organized audience supplies the reason. This is how the plan works:

Behind the imposing New York firm of Columbia Concerts is Community Concerts, a network of bookings stretching across the United States and Canada. A music salesman, pleasantly known at Columbia as a "missionary of culture," enters East Humbug, Nevada, meets the town's social leaders, and in practiced patter persuades them of the advantages of contracting for a Community Concerts series. He tells them that all they need to do is run a week's subscription drive and then choose a group of artists on the basis of the amount of money collected. Towns that fall in with this plan find they can get the pick of the world's concert artists without financial worry. Thus if a town raises $4,500, it may choose one high-priced artist, a Heifetz for example, at $3,500, and four lesser artists at $250 a piece. It cannot, however, raise $9,000 and get Pons, Rubinstein, and Menuhin. For this is a package business, and the package contains one prize piece, the expensive bonbon which sells it, and several fillers, wanted or not.

The partnership between Columbia and Community went well from the start. Columbia supplied top names, capital, and a large booking staff already in the field; Community supplied eager audiences. Columbia's rival, NBC's management organization, could hardly survive if it offered its artists less satisfactory national outlets; so NCAC also organized a local chain, Civic Concerts. The independent concert managers now found the sledding tougher than ever.

You might think that the package idea for subscription concerts, by requiring a number of lesser lights to be taken along with the tempting big names, would offer a splendid opportunity for young talent. It has given newcomers a chance to be heard, a chance to gain priceless experience. But at the same time by classing some artists as "big" and others as "little" it has forced the development of rigid price levels. And this often proves fatal for young musicians.

One twenty-four-year-old violinist, for example, got a contract with NCAC the day after his Town Hall debut. It was renewed each year until he went into the army in 1941, with his manager's last words ringing in his ears, "Let us know when you come back." But when he did go back after his discharge last summer, the manager told him that his pre-war notices were too dated: "You'll have to give a New York recital before we can put you back on our list," he said. Unfortunately the young violinist hadn't saved the necessary $1,000 from his G. I. pay. He couldn't earn $1,000 except by giving concerts. He couldn't give a concert without $1,000. Oddly enough, he took his predicament philosophically. "It's a matter of business," he said. "They want just so many artists at the various price levels, and there isn't room for another $250 violinist."

THE unknown young artist who gets a contract is still not on the path to glory when he starts off on the Community circuit. The standard routine for a "small" filler name is to play from ten to forty concerts a season in one of the eight "time blocks" into which Columbia has divided the country, and to play a different block each year. This makes it impossible for him to build up any sort of following, since he will not meet an audience a second time until eight years has passed. One of the leading American pianists summed up this complaint: "Repeat engagements are discouraged," she said. "There is no effort to keep your memory warm in the towns you've played, because you serve quite nicely just as you are—as filler to round out the list of big names at small cost to the community and to the management. For this service you take a reduced fee and pay a 15 per cent commission."

Playing the circuit with the anonymity of a circus clown, the filler artist is lucky to keep as much as half of his total fee before taxes. The agent takes 15 or 20 per cent; the rest goes for expenses. An NCAC violinist says, "I'm lucky if I can keep 30 per cent after I've paid railroad and hotel expenses for myself and my accompanist, my management and accompanist charges, and for advertising and publicity." Another NCAC artist wound up a twelve-concert tour with exactly $10 in take-home pay. One Naumburg winner, a sufficiently distinguished musician to be listed in "Who's Who," spent six months touring as an accompanist, for which he was paid $80 a concert. All expenses except railroad tickets came out of his pocket.

In the face of such conditions any young artist would turn to an independent manager if he could. But the independent manager is up against the organized-audience system as against a brick wall. Though Columbia declares it never starts a concert course where a local manager is already operating successfully, last year it organized a Community series in a Middle Western town to discipline an independent there who was not providing Columbia talent with sufficient outlets. To the local manager's complaints a Columbia representative replied, "You don't want this talent. What are we going to do with it? We have to sell it." Another independent manager who had been running a successful concert series in a Western city for twenty-six years met competition from NCAC's Civic chain for the first time last year. Soon after the first Civic concert, subscribers to the independent series telephoned to the manager to ask about a rumor that she was going out of business. After the first independent concert, a rumor circulated that subscriptions to the rest of the concerts were going to be canceled. The independent manager charged the local head of the Civic series with responsibility for the rumors. Finally she was forced to run a large newspaper ad to deny them. Such tactics may easily cause a local manager to fold up.

SHORTLY before World War II the Federal Communications Commission summoned Judson to Washington to explain some of the features of his business that might be construed as restraint of trade. The management companies moved quickly, however, and soon their booking organizations were formally divorced from the parent broadcasting companies. The FCC was apparently satisfied, though many of the independent managers regard the change as an administrative device rather than a genuine reform.

One of Rodzinski's chief grievances was Judson's refusal to give him a free hand in selecting guest conductors. Clearly, the retiring maestro felt that Judson's management of some fifty symphony-orchestra conductors had more influence on the choice of guest conductors for the Philharmonic than did the desires of its permanent leader. Aspiring concert artists who cannot afford Rodzinski's frankness have long believed that they would stand a better chance of obtaining the coveted solo engagements with the country's twenty-four major symphony orchestras if fewer of these orchestras were under Judson-managed batons. In hundreds of letters and telegrams the music world applauded Rodzinski's resignation—much as a Sunday School audience cheers David's fight with Goliath.

Among Rodzinski's well-wishers was Henry H. Reichhold, millionaire backer and president of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. "Congratulations on your forthright and courageous stand for musical freedom and independence," wired Reichhold. Then in a bold opening maneuver he bought all the stock of the Carnegie "Pop" Concerts, Inc., of New York, set up an artists' bureau, and prepared to make standardized "pop" concerts available to a thousand cities and towns at rock-bottom prices by developing orchestras of sixty or seventy musicians assembled under local management in various large cities.

These orchestras will tour the towns and cities in their areas with solo artists provided from New York. Reichhold offers his artists the chance to build up a radio following by appearing with the Detroit Symphony on the Sunday Evening Hour, which he has leased for fifty-two weeks. They can cut records with the Detroit Symphony for Vox Records, a Manhattan classical-record company which Reichhold acquired in January. Since he has already pulled out of the red two failing musical enterprises—the Detroit Symphony and the trade magazine Musical Digest—the musical world can scarcely ignore his entrance into the field of management. Reichhold says: "I think you will see some present concert organizations breaking up. The time is ripe."

To people familiar with the situation this seems more like a threat than a promise. The quality of the music Reichhold plans to circulate and his uncertain reputation as a disinterested musical benefactor do not insure his success as a full-fledged competitor to the big two. It is generally agreed, however, that the chemical manufacturer's—or another's—millions are a prerequisite for breaking into the securely held territory of Columbia Concerts and NCAC.

Save the Public Domain!

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Spokane, December 5

THE natural resources of the United States, Secretary Krug recently reported to the President, can sustain the Marshall Plan. But if a handful of monopolies in the cattle, lumber, fruit, and fishing industries have their way in the Far West, where the country's resources are now largely concentrated, Mr. Krug's report will no longer give a true picture. The present Congress cannot be counted on to restrain these looters of the public domain, but the President, in his speech dedicating the Everglades National Park, implied he might veto any legislation permitting the exploitation of public lands for private gain. "There are always plenty of hogs trying to get our natural resources for their own benefit," he said, to a round of applause.

From the Continental Divide to the Pacific a relentless campaign is under way to breach the ramparts which conservationists from Teddy to Franklin Roosevelt have erected around the timber, grass lands, and rivers belonging to the American people. The campaign takes many forms. In one state it may be an effort to discredit the United States Forest Service, in another an attempt to exalt the Army Engineers at the expense of the Bureau of Reclamation. Five hundred miles away it may appear in a demand that land first claimed for the national government by Lewis and Clark be turned over to the tender mercies of the state of Wyoming or Montana. Its effects extend even to Alaska.

This unholy crusade has lately been accelerated. The ranchers, "gyppo" loggers, and corporation farmers behind it have suddenly realized that next November the voters may replace this Congress with a group of legislators more devoted to the general welfare. Now, they are aware, is the time to put through their schemes. Their chances look particularly good while Representative Frank A. Barrett of Lusk, Wyoming, who is firmly tucked in the stockman's saddlebag, heads the Public Lands subcommittee in charge of the Western pastures.

Barrett has been conducting hearings along the Pacific seaboard on a series of bills to end Forest Service control over the range. The word "hearings" is a euphemism; "inquisition" would be more accurate. Rangers and foresters are bullied by the committee, which through its appropriation power controls their jobs. Ranchers whose herds have grazed the range bare are treated as though they were monarchs of the region, which in fact many of them aspire to be with Barrett's connivance. Last week Barrett ordered the Forest Service to reduce no range allotments for three years. This means that hillsides and valleys now being overgrazed will get no relief. They must feed sheep and cattle until the last anchoring blade of grass is gone and the soil begins to blow. Flash floods and drought will supersede the rhythmic surge of mountain rivers, and the ten million Westerners whose drinking water comes from streams which rise in national forests will face a shortage.

To Barrett and his Congressional associates the equity of a few million city dwellers in a watershed is mere claim-jumping as compared with the squatters' rights exercised by four or five stockmen. Barrett would wreck America's system of national forests by permitting the 80,000,000 acres of grazing land within their borders to be reduced to dust. He has even grimmer designs on the magnificent Jackson Hole National Monument in his own state of Wyoming (as was reported in The Nation of October 25). In 1943 Barrett persuaded Congress to abolish the monument completely, but President Roosevelt wisely and courageously vetoed the bill. Barrett has now reintroduced the measure. It is almost more than he and his confederates can bear to see 222,929 lush acres in the shadow of the Grand Tetons protected from the bicuspid of grazing herds, particularly in this period of epic prices for sirloins. They consider it immaterial that the wide swales of Jackson Hole under the protection of the Forest Service might be a camping place for numberless generations of Americans.

Fortunately people who treasure the outdoors are awake at last to the purposes of the cattle crowd in Congress. The Izaak Walton League of America, the American Forestry Association, and the American Planning and Civic Association are organizing their members against the move to abolish Jackson Hole and strip the national forests. The Ladies' Home Journal has printed a strong editorial condemning the attempt to grab the grazing lands. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has assailed the attack on Jackson Hole, to which he contributed 33,500 acres as an addition to the federal domain. (At any moment now Barrett will probably demand that these subversive forces reveal whether or not they have ever been members of the Communist Party.) "Should the Jackson Hole Monument be abolished," warns Kenneth A. Reid, executive director of the Izaak Walton League, "it would lend aid and encouragement to those groups that seek to appropriate for themselves the federal lands belonging to all the people of the United States."

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is an Oregon journalist who writes about the Northwest for The Nation and other publications.

When the utilities performed their skulduggery in the twenties, they used the claims of widows and orphans to cloak their greed. The looters of the public domain may use war veterans, especially disabled veterans, in the same way. Representative William A. Lemke of North Dakota, Father Coughlin's candidate for the Presidency in 1936, is author of a bill which would divide up the vast Tongass National Forest of Alaska among the men who served in World War II. Each man could settle on 1,920 acres. This means that, immense as the Tongass reserve is, only 2,500 veterans would benefit, less than .02 per cent of the 14,000,000 men who were in uniform.

The Tongass Forest has prodigious stands of hemlock and Sitka spruce. Its pulpwood is the most valuable resource left in Alaska. On the forest's mountain divide rise the streams which supply drinking water to Ketchikan, Juneau, Petersburg, and Skagway. The Lemke bill imposes no conservation rules. The lucky veteran in possession of 1,920 acres of virgin spruce could cut it bare or sell it to a logging company. A densely covered holding might be worth $50,000. A handful of veterans could get rich—and Southeastern Alaska would be a wasteland. Yet this unbelievable measure already has been passed by the House unanimously. Unless it is blocked in the Senate, plans for an orderly pulp and paper industry in Alaska will crumble into an orgy of speculation and bribery.

THE clouds in the Western sky are still small, but if they combine they may bring a disastrous storm. Corporation farmers in the Central Valley of California want to have the Army Engineers replace the Bureau of Reclamation in charge of dam-building because the engineers don't restrict land ownership on projects to 160 acres and don't generate power for sale to troublesome municipalities and publicly owned districts. The National Reclamation Association is lending its influence to an attack on the power-production feature of reclamation projects, although the sale of power reduces the cost of irrigating land by at least 50 per cent. The reasons are not hard to find. Rufus Woods, Republican editor of the Wenatchee, Washington, Daily World, is the man who first proposed the construction of the great dam at Grand Coulee on the Columbia River. Last week Woods wrote in his paper, "The National Reclamation Association has gone into the hands of men who act as though their whole duty is to the private power companies." While professing staunch loyalty to the cause of irrigation, the association is actually overlooking no opportunity to add to the expense of generating power on reclamation projects. The competing utility companies come first, the irrigation farmers second.

This week hearings began in Idaho on the proposal of the federal government to construct a $212,000,000 dam at Hell's Canyon on the Snake River, in the core of the deepest chasm on the continent. The Idaho Power Company is resisting the proposal on the ground that the water impounded by the Hell's Canyon dam would drown out a power-company site sixty-five miles upstream. Idaho Power proposes to develop 135,000 kilowatts. Hell's Canyon would generate 1,330,000 kilowatts and improve navigation into the heart of the Inland Empire. Even more important, Hell's Canyon would make available a huge supply of cheap electricity for mining the five billion tons of phosphate rock in Idaho, the highest-grade vein in the world. This fertilizer is sorely needed in America; in China it might save the country from famine and dictatorship. But Idaho Power may win out over Hell's Canyon. The 1946 election delivered Oregon and Idaho into the gentle hands of the utility companies. The late Governor Earl Snell of Oregon vetoed a bill to permit Idaho Power to build a dam on the Snake River above Hell's Canyon, but the Oregon legislature, with eighty-four Republicans among its ninety members, overwhelmingly canceled the veto.

All along America's western seaboard, from Mexico to the Arctic Circle, men eager to get possession of the country's natural wealth realize that the Eightieth Congress offers them their great opportunity to break down the controls set up to protect the public. Even controls imposed during the halcyon days of Coolidge and Hoover are wicked in the eyes of this Congress. Traveling "gyppo" sawmills are felling the forests as swiftly as saws can rip wood; the big companies like Weyerhaeuser and Crown-Zellerbach know that a sustained-yield program is the only way to stay in business, but the nomadic "gyppos" want to "cut out and get out." A few years ago the state of Washington was the country's main lumber producer. In 1947 it will cut less than half as much as Oregon, now the last stronghold of the big trees. In Oregon, too, the blade moves faster than seedlings can grow. Portland was recently the leading lumber seaport of the nation. Now the forests near Portland are gone, and the title belongs to a tiny salt-water town named Coos Bay in southwestern Oregon.

The Krug report, which took an optimistic view of this country's ability to support the Marshall Plan, will be rendered obsolete if Congress is not restrained by public opinion. Amid all the efforts to open the resources of the nation to unlimited gouging and grabbing, the only encouraging note is that the shelter belt of trees on the Great Plains has succeeded in holding down the topsoil. Thousands of farmers have told the Soil Conservation Service that they are still on their land because the shelter belt has been a success. Perhaps some of these farmers may remember the conservation plans of the President who was ridiculed a decade ago when he suggested that rows of evergreens, lined up like soldiers, might protect the sod from wind and erosion.

The Palestine Fight—an Inside Story

BY LILLIE SHULTZ

WHEN the partition of Palestine was voted by the General Assembly on November 29, two months and four days had elapsed since the opening of the discussions. More than a million dollars had been spent by the U. N. in an operation begun six months before, when, at the request of the British, an extraordinary session was called to advise on the future form of government in Palestine.

On September 1 the Special Committee of Inquiry (UNSCOP), which had spent three solid months investigating the situation in Palestine and in Europe, presented a report, signed by a majority of the eleven members, recommending the establishment of two independent states. On September 25 a committee of fifty-seven, representing all members of the U. N., which came to be known as the Ad Hoc Committee on Palestine, met to receive the report of UNSCOP and to decide on recommendations to be made to the General Assembly. It was expected that the majority report would be adopted with little delay, and that the United States delegates would take the initiative in urging its adoption, since the partition proposal embodied the views expressed on more than one occasion by the President and was in line with this country's traditional position.

The United States did not take the initiative. Instead the American delegation lent itself to a policy of protracted delay and encouraged the piling up of obstacles, including threats of an Arab revolt, designed to defeat UNSCOP's proposals and thereby open the way for continuing control by the British. It was hoped in some quarters that a modification of the Morrison-Grady plan, advanced in 1946 and at that time rejected by the United States government, might be accepted as a compromise between the majority and minority reports of UNSCOP. Under such a plan Britain would remain for five years more in Palestine, during which time the Western world might win its war—cold or atomic—against Russia.

The plan was a British plan. But playing the British game until the last moment were certain members of the State Department, some American military leaders, and the Combined Chiefs of Staff, a British-American leftover of World War II. Early in September it looked as if Secretary Marshall, and the President too, would be drawn into the scheme. This accounts for the fact that although the United States was committed in advance to the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth, its delegates gave no indication of where it stood until October 11, forty days after UNSCOP reported and sixteen days after the Ad Hoc Committee met.

In the interval there were well-authenticated reports that the President had been persuaded that defense interests required capitulation to Arab demands. These rumors were silenced for a time when the United States delegation came out on October 11 with a statement favoring the majority report. But that statement was not made until leaders of public opinion, including several important political figures, brought the matter personally to the attention of the President and received his assurance that partition would be supported.

The President kept his word. It was primarily his insistence, backed by vociferous public and press demands cutting across party lines, that prevented a gigantic double-cross in which Loy Henderson, director of the Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs, and his group in the State Department would have been accomplices. It must be kept in mind that although the Constitution intrusts foreign policies to the President, foreign affairs are actually conducted by the State Department. It is the State Department to which the U. N. delegation is responsible and from which it regularly receives its instructions.

In the delegation were warm advocates of partition and sincere friends of the Jewish cause, such as Mrs. Roosevelt and Ambassador Austin. When General Hill-dring, long familiar with the refugee problem, was added as a special adviser on the Palestine question, confidence was increased. But his appointment was offset by the addition of James Wadsworth, the American representative in Iraq, whose opposition to Zionist aims is intense and outspoken, and of a number of ill-informed, small-fry career diplomats-in-the-making. The sympathies of Herschel Johnson, United States representative on the Palestine committee, were in doubt. But he was known as an experienced official who would follow instructions closely.

SOON after the opening of the General Assembly Secretary Marshall, head of the delegation, became immersed in preparations for the meeting of Congress and the conference of Foreign Ministers. John Foster Dulles, on the Palestine question as on other matters the evil genius of the American delegation, was strongly of the opinion that the U. N. had no legal right to deal with the question—a view put forward by the Arab states and within one vote of being adopted by the Ad Hoc Committee as late as November 24.

Throughout the session the American delegation took its orders from Loy Henderson. Not until ten days before the actual vote was President Truman brought into the picture again and made aware of the disparity between his pledges and the department's instructions.

In the interval the delegation engaged in three levels of activity: (1) formal actions based on the pledges of the President, which committed the United States to support the majority plan; (2) a quiet process of attrition of the majority plan; (3) delaying tactics while decisions waited on instructions from the State Department. At the same time the British, in close alliance with the Arabs, were busily developing opposition to the partition plan, particularly among the Latin American delegations. Harold Beeley, the British Foreign Office expert, sat in with Subcommittee II, which dealt with the Arab proposals. Hadow, the British liaison man for Latin America, was unceasingly active. "Shadow Hadow," as he was called, wearing a black patch over one eye on alternate days, in the fashion of the classical pirate, worked until the very last minute to prevent a majority for partition.

What the State Department attitude was may be gauged from the following facts: On September 26 and again on October 16 Arthur Creech-Jones, the British Colonial Secretary, appeared before the Ad Hoc Committee and said that the British government intended to terminate the mandate at will, that it would accept no responsibility for implementing a decision not acceptable to both Arabs and Jews, and it would accept no decision that it did not believe to be just. Yet on October 31, when the United States, after holding up for one week the work of the subcommittee, produced its own proposal for implementation, it was based on the idea that the British would implement the partition plan.

On October 31 and November 13, 17, and 20 the representatives of the British government rejected every scheme of implementation involving even the most minor cooperation on the part of Britain. Not until November 22, when the subcommittee on implementation had been working for a month, did the United States offer its first public reproof to the British government and announce its intention of proceeding regardless of the British position. The whole U. N. was permitted to mark time and suffer snub after snub from the British.

ON OCTOBER 11, when the American delegation announced support of the majority plan, it indicated that it would ask for certain geographic changes, mentioning specifically only the transfer of Jaffa from the Jewish to the Arab state. On October 23 the subcommittee was named to work out the practical details of partition, including boundaries, the status of the city of Jerusalem, and economic union of the two states. The American delegation did not agree to final boundary changes until November 25, when the report of the subcommittee had already reached the Ad Hoc Committee, the very day of the vote. The representatives of the Jewish Agency for Palestine had themselves offered to give up Jaffa and had proposed eleven other boundary changes. In return for these changes, which would have added one million dunams to the Jewish state, they offered 2,300,000 dunams in the southern Negev to the Arab state. In this exchange the number of Arabs in the Jewish state would have been decreased about 22 per cent, and the Arab state would have had a net gain of some two million dunams.

The chief obstacle to the adoption of these proposals was the State Department. It accepted the Jaffa exchange, but made many other claims, the most important being a demand that 8,000,000 dunams in the Negev, including the port of Aquaba—the whole Negev had been granted to the Jewish state by UNSCOP—should be given to the Arab state. Most revealing was the fashion in which the demand was made. At no time was the issue raised in the working committee, the Ad Hoc Committee, or the General Assembly. It was discussed privately in the hope that the Jewish Agency could be persuaded to acquiesce on the assurance that only in this way could the two-thirds' majority be obtained. As if the members of the U. N. actually knew, understood, or cared about detailed boundary differentials!

The American delegation, acting under instruction from the State Department, was prepared to have Subcommittee I present a report to the Ad Hoc Committee, but the Americans reserved the right to reopen discussions on boundaries and on economic union. Had this happened, it would have invited other revisions and even possible defeat of the majority plan. Only the direct intervention of President Truman prevented it. On Wednesday, November 19, the President issued a directive that the American reservations were to be withdrawn. Actually, they were not withdrawn until November 25, and then only after renewed White House pressure. As a result of American demands the Jewish state lost some 2,000,000 dunams.

On the afternoon of November 24 I was informed that a new monkey wrench had been tossed in by the British, who had warned the State Department—and the name of Loy Henderson was mentioned specifically—that if it proceeded with the partition proposals it would be made to rue the day by Communist infiltration into Palestine and the alleged alliance among the Russians, the Irgun, and the Stern gang. "What is going to happen?" I asked my informant. "They are going to take a Gandhi-like attitude," he said; "they'll wait and see!"

The State Department did wait. Four days later, when Ambassador Parodi—for understandable reasons, which, however, do him and France no honor—proposed a twenty-four-hour adjournment to allow a new conciliation move, it was not the United States but the delegate of Poland, Dr. Lange, who challenged the proposal.

While the Arab states were thundering their threats of revolt and bloodshed unchallenged, the same Loy Henderson who was issuing instructions for the physical reduction of the Jewish state was also supervising the planning of a program involving hundreds of millions of dollars for irrigation and reclamation projects in the countries of the Middle East, to be financed by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development with the United States supplying engineers and materials.

THE Arab delegations have made many accusations about the strong-arm methods used by the United States to insure the votes necessary to carry the partition proposal. Let us examine the record. As far as I am aware the United States produced perhaps one important vote, the vote of the Philippines, and then only when it became a matter of face-saving; by November 29 this vote was no longer necessary to insure the two-thirds' majority. On Monday, November 24, one day before the vote in the Ad Hoc Committee on the majority plan, a highly placed official informed me that in the view of the State Department three more votes were needed. Yet on that same day the American delegation's staff was not aware that Haiti and Liberia had been instructed to vote "no" in the plenary session.

On Wednesday, November 26, the plenary session met; it was known that there had been seventeen abstentions in the Ad Hoc Committee on the previous day. If the vote of the Ad Hoc Committee were repeated in the Assembly, the partition proposal would be one vote shy, and Haiti's was the balancing vote. The session opened with the speeches of the Philippines, Paraguay, and Greece. Neither the Philippines nor Paraguay had been present during the vote in the Ad Hoc Committee. What three votes ought to have been more certain if the Americans were interested in assuring a two-thirds' majority? But Greece, the Philippines, and Paraguay announced that they would vote "no."

Mr. Dickerson, a member of the delegation staff, when asked by the Siamese delegate how he should vote, said it was a matter of indifference to the American delegation. The delegate of Siam voted "no" in the Ad Hoc Committee. By chance his credentials were withdrawn on November 26 and his vote could not be cast in the plenary session.

Last week Sir Zafrullah Khan, the Pakistan delegate, an ardent and able advocate of the Arab case, who left before the plenary vote, in a cable to a New York paper described the delegate of Haiti casting his vote for partition "with tears in his eyes." This was to show how American pressure had been exercised on small countries. The delegate of Haiti was never approached by the United States. In fact, the story of Haiti's vote illuminates the entire State Department attitude.

Early in the debate, the representative of Haiti indicated that his government favored partition. He received new instructions by cable over the week-end of November 22. An investigation by friends of Haiti disclosed that the reversal was based on anger at the cavalier fashion in which a Haitian mission had been treated by the United States government after three and a half months of vain effort to obtain a five-million-dollar loan from this country—a loan, incidentally, which, doubled in amount, Haiti is about to get from Perón! If Haiti hoped by withholding its vote to put pressure on the United States, its action was perfectly understandable. The Haitian government was persuaded to return to its initial position by liberal friends on moral grounds alone.

Liberia is another interesting case. Up to two o'clock Friday, November 28, the delegation of Liberia, representing a government which has a State Department adviser, was never approached by a representative of the United States. Its intention to cast a negative vote was changed through the efforts of friendly, unofficial Americans. If space allowed, several other equally significant instances could be cited.

By the evening of November 28 even the State Department could no longer stall in face of the Presidential directive. For perhaps the first time in the more than two months of deliberations the American delegation was instructed to hold the lines and to insure that nothing would prevent a vote on the report as the first business on the agenda of the plenary session. These directives were issued by the President from the White House and Secretary Marshall from London. This time they could not be ignored.

On Saturday afternoon, November 29, Herschel Johnson for the first time was permitted to tell the Arabs and the British that the Americans would stand for no more nonsense. And because he said it directly, firmly, mincing no words, the parliamentary maneuvers of the Arabs, British, and Colombians failed; a prepared resolution for simple adjournment was never offered.

When the vote of thirty-three to thirteen, with ten abstentions, was finally registered, the United States and the Soviet Union together had produced the first constructive act of the United Nations.

IT IS worth-while analyzing how this remarkable example of teamwork was achieved in a session distinguished by the most violent disagreements between the two powers on every other issue. It was not an accident. The Russians want the British out of the Middle East. The establishment of two independent states in Palestine was a means of accomplishing this purpose. But it must be said to the credit of the Russians that in working for this end they were the only big power to display firmness and morality. The Russians are still being accused of playing for an alliance with the Arabs; yet they alone among the major delegations dared to challenge the role, the record, and the participation of the Mufti and his Arab Higher Committee. And it was the Russians who at every point tried to prevent the attrition of the majority report and to secure for the Jews their just demands.

But in the last resort the victory was won by the committee known as Subcommittee I. It consisted of nine members, all of whom favored partition and none of whom were unfriendly either to the Soviet Union or the United States. It was the only U. N. committee in which the British were given no opportunity to run interference for the United States against the Soviet Union. And although there were two dominion members on the committee—Canada and South Africa—both, and particularly Lester Pearson of Canada, worked with the greatest good-will to get agreement.

The fact that this was a homogeneous committee was not the result of State Department design. On the contrary, the Americans tried to have France and Brazil added to it, although neither had then indicated its attitude on partition. Representatives of the United States approached the Polish chairman, Mr. Pruszyński, with the suggestion that the two countries be included. He declined to act on the ground that he had no authority. When a similar proposal was made to Dr. Evatt, he too refused to be budged. Together Guatemala, Uruguay, Venezuela, Poland, and Canada, during four weeks of delicate negotiations, worked day and night to keep the committee moving and to defeat the delaying tactics of the State Department. In the end it was these countries and the dominions which made possible the affirmative vote; and Dr. Evatt's extraordinary skill which enabled it to be taken within three days after the report was submitted.

It remained for the State Department to supply the final note of cynicism. In Subcommittee I it had been agreed unanimously that the Palestine commission should consist of Iceland, Norway, Poland, Guatemala, and Uruguay. Usually it is the custom to reward delegations for work accomplished. No delegates worked harder on the partition proposals than those of Guatemala, Uruguay, and Poland. The first two had served on UNSCOP and had been invaluable members of Subcommittee I. After six months of work they had become experts on a question requiring experts. Without the agreement of the subcommittee the State Department decided that the Palestine commission should be changed. The slate was unceremoniously scrapped, and five new members were chosen at the last moment, on November 29, with the Philippines included—obviously as a reward for voting "yes."

Last week Loy Henderson called a meeting of division heads, including Herschel Johnson. There Johnson was reprimanded by Henderson for having so successfully carried out the President's directive on Palestine!

Russia Speculates on Britain

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow, December 1

GREAT BRITAIN is the strongest country of Western Europe, and from the Russian point of view its future policy is therefore of capital importance. Also Britain is on the boundary between Europe and America, not only geographically but politically, economically, and culturally; in all these respects it is a "special case." In addition, it is the stronghold of "right-wing socialism, enemy number one of democracy," as the Russian papers say—a socialism which, according to the Literary Gazette, now an important political organ, "is safeguarding the interests of big business at home and acting as the ally of big business in America." In distinction from France and Italy, Britain has no large Communist Party. It only has its anti-Bevinites, like Mr. Zilliaceus and others, who were well received in Moscow and taken seriously. But Russians are convinced that there must be strong trends of thought among Englishmen basically hostile to America with its avowed anti-socialism and favorable to a rapprochement with Eastern Europe, particularly with Russia. Britain is thus something of a puzzle: while the Labor government, in the Russian view, has "betrayed socialism," the people have a greater liking for the Socialist way of life than most other nations. What surprises many Russians is that the Labor government should not have put these Socialist instincts of the British people to better uses.

One criticism often heard is that England is muddling along, relying on being spoon-fed by America, instead of making a great and imaginative effort. As regards foreign trade, greater freedom from American imports is needed, with more trade with the Empire and more with Eastern Europe and Russia. It is believed here that two schools of thought exist in the British government—Sir Stafford Cripps and Harold Wilson representing the "European" and Mr. Bevin the "American" school; it is also believed that Cripps and Wilson are extremely anxious (as Cripps recently told Mr. Zaru-bin) to see the trade talks succeed and that Bevin is not. Naturally, Bevin's influence is held largely responsible for the breakdown in August.

Great Britain, it is hoped, is becoming more readily reconciled than America to the new order of things in Eastern Europe. It is not, however, treated much more considerately than America in the Soviet press or in the highly polemical literature which, following in the footsteps of Simonov's play about American press lords, has found a fruitful subject in denouncing and ridiculing this or that group of Britons and Americans. In a recent number of the Literary Gazette the popular author Yuri Germann has a story about British naval officers in a northern Russian port during the war who solemnly ask the scandalized Russian officers to provide a brothel for British seamen. "In these matters," says the British spokesman, "we are not idealists like you but realists." (Incidentally, the story contains no mention of the famous convoys.) The Literary Gazette also printed a three-column attack by a Kirghiz poet on a British delegate to the United Nations who had suggested that Russia also has its colonial peoples: was a Malay or Papuan poet, this Mongol poet asked, ever honored by a British admiral on board a battleship as he was when he visited the Soviet navy? His conclusion is that there is no color bar or race discrimination in Russia.

In a hundred different ways self-confidence, pride of country, and faith in the superiority of Russia's cause in the great ideological struggle now in progress are being instilled into the Soviet people. The economic, and even the mental, confusion and lack of direction in Western Europe are constantly played up. And it all has an effect. For the ideological struggle Russia considers itself particularly well equipped, and its self-confidence has been heightened by the relatively good progress made this year, in both industry and agriculture. American capitalism, even armed with atom bombs, provides—so the argument runs—no valid solution to the troubles of hungry people. American credits can only be a palliative, of small economic value but of dangerous political consequences: one must expect duplications of the "Greek situation" in Austria, France, and elsewhere. Britain, it is felt, being sharply conscious of the "disgrace" of the Greek situation, will not wish to see it repeated, least of all in vital spots like France or Austria. It may yet "move a little to the east," and in doing so discourage the imposition on Europe of any Marshall Plan with grave political implications.

These, in a very general way, are some of the factors of the present world conflict as seen from Moscow. To say, as some British observers have done, that Russia is not interested in what its relations are to be with Britain is totally untrue, for Britain is still in a position to use its influence in lessening the existing tension. The Russians are convinced that even if America has a powerful "war party," Britain is profoundly anti-war, and they are by no means certain that Britain is irretrievably anchored to America. But until a change is visible, the abuse of England will be on a par with that of America.

As for the Belgrade Informbureau, it is described as a "warning" and a "precaution" against Gaullism and other American-sponsored movements.

When Bankers Disagree

MOUNTING imports of gold, I pointed out last week, have created a dilemma for the Treasury. Secretary Snyder wants to "sterilize" this gold, that is, prevent it from adding to a total of currency and credit already dangerously large. Instead of issuing new gold certificates against bullion, he would like to buy it with surplus Treasury cash. The result would be that Treasury bank deposits would be diminished to the same extent that those of the gold sellers were enhanced, leaving the total of gold deposits, the basis for credit creation, unchanged.

Unfortunately, this method of gold sterilization, while it closes one inflationary door, opens another, since it reduces funds for the retirement of government securities. In recent months reduction of the national debt has partially checked the forces making for credit inflation. However, to control the situation effectively, the Treasury needs to continue debt retirement and to neutralize the $2 billion to $3 billion in gold likely to be added to reserves in the next year. This could be done if the Federal Reserve banks offset gold purchases by reducing their security holdings to an equivalent extent. But such a move is ruled out by Mr. Snyder because it would tend to reduce prices of government bonds and to raise interest rates.

An alternative has been suggested by Chairman Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board, who asked Congress for authority to impose special-reserve requirements on the banks in addition to those now in force. These special reserves, which would not exceed 25 per cent of demand deposits or 10 per cent of time deposits, would take the form of cash or short-term government securities. In effect, the plan would freeze part of the banks' holdings of low-yielding government securities and prevent their sale to finance new loan demands. As a result lendable funds would be scarcer and commercial interest rates would tend to rise, while the cost of government borrowing would not be directly affected.

This ingenious scheme has been hotly attacked by many bankers, and although it seems to offer the Treasury a possible avenue of escape from its dilemma, Mr. Snyder himself will have nothing to do with it. He told the House Banking and Currency Committee that he believed the Eccles plan would not achieve its author's ends and would intensify the problem of debt management.

Bankers' criticisms have been more specific. The Federal Advisory Council, composed of leading bankers from all Federal Reserve districts, insists that the Eccles plan is a step toward "socialization of banking" in that it substitutes the edicts of a Washington board for the judgment of banking directors throughout the country. The council also regards the plan as impractical. A percentage increase in required reserves sufficient to restrain some banks, it points out, would have disastrous effects on others, forcing them to call sound loans and so handicap production. Finally, the council declares, the Treasury and Federal Reserve system already have ample powers to control credit inflation if they choose to use them.

At this point the bankers not only part company with Secretary Snyder but begin to argue among themselves. The most effective means of credit control available to the Federal Reserve system is intervention in the bond market. By buying government securities it can add to the total credit supply; by selling, it subtracts from it. In view of the system's enormous resources—its holdings of "governments" exceed $22 billion—its operations largely determine market prices. Recently, while permitting interest rates on short-term securities to rise somewhat, the Reserve banks have been buying longer-term issues with a view to keeping quotations above par and maintaining long-term interest rates at 2½ per cent. Mr. Snyder wants this policy continued; he is naturally anxious to prevent a rise in debt charges. Mr. Eccles agrees: he is worried lest a rise in interest rates unsettle the whole bond market, causing large-scale liquidation of securities and the weakening of both public and private credit. That is why he has proposed to check credit expansion by rather unorthodox means.

Most bankers, however, recoil automatically from the unfamiliar. They tend to favor an "open market" policy directed toward the lifting of interest rates but debate among themselves about how far and fast the movement should be permitted to go. J. Stewart Baker, chairman of the Bank of Manhattan Company, seems to approve the N. A. M.'s recent proposal that interest rates be allowed "to seek their own levels." The Federal Reserve system, he has declared, "should abandon all commitments—stated or implied—to hold yields on United States government securities at specific levels." On the other hand, Edward E. Brown, influential president of the First National Bank of Chicago, told the Senate Banking and Currency Committee: "Personally, I think the bond market must be supported." And Allan Sproul, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, while vehemently opposed to the Eccles plan, warned that "strong" use by the authorities of their existing powers would create severe deflationary pressure and might well lead to depression.

With so much disagreement among the experts, Congressmen who are pondering the President's request for curbs on credit inflation can hardly be blamed for a bewilderment calculated to inhibit any effective action. In the G. O. P. anti-inflation bill the only clause affecting credit is one raising the gold backing of currency in circulation from 25 to 40 per cent. This will have little immediate influence on the situation since present gold reserves actually stand at 48.7 per cent of the note issue. Nor is the forthcoming ¼ per cent rise in the rediscount rate likely to have more than a temporary psychological effect on credit expansion.

Personally, I believe that if banking opposition blocks the Eccles plan, the Federal Reserve system will be compelled to adopt an open-market program designed to lift interest rates gradually. Admittedly, that will prove a difficult, perhaps dangerous, operation, but some antidote to credit inflation is long overdue. If it is not administered very soon, kill-or-cure shock treatment may become necessary.

"DON QUIXOTE" AND THE NOVEL

BY PEDRO SALINAS

IF WE consider the word "original" from the point of view of its actual meaning, "something pertaining to the origin or beginning," the novel of Cervantes is revealed to be supremely original, for in it may be found the turning-point of the history of fiction; in it a new era in the evolution of the novel is initiated. The types of the novel antecedent to the "Quijote"—the "Amadis" and the novels of chivalry, the "Dianas" and pastoral fiction—represent but partial aspects of humanity: the former a heroic ideal which terminates in futile feats of derring-do, the latter a literary exaggeration of a sentimental situation. When, in "Lazarillo de Tormes" and the works of Alemán, Espinel, and Quevedo, Spain had the audacity to place the pícaro, the rogue, the underdog, in the very center of the novel, converting him from the minor character which he had been into the protagonist and the magnetic pole of the compassionate attention of the reader, a new region of humanity was conquered for fiction. But the picaresque novel is also restrictive: it excludes from its vision of the world all that does not fall within the concept of the rogue. Thus the novel, when it is compared with the vastness of human experience, remains limited and insufficient. Cervantes first produced the universally comprehensive novel, the novel with sufficient capacity to surround the equivocal and mysterious figure of the knight Quijote with a whole world of shepherds and townspeople, wenches and rogues, captives of the Moors, bachelors of the town. The "Quijote" is a work so affluent that one views it in its historical place with the amazement which the explorer who had never seen more than modest streams, rivers of minor order, must have felt on first encountering the Amazon, summa of rivers, archetype of affluence.

The Transcendental Novel

It is generally conceded that the novel must entertain. But "entertain" is a treacherous word, and only too easily assumes a connotation of vulgarity or triviality. In its original conception the novel entertains superficially, in a cinematic manner, as its torrent of adventurous deeds gives the reader the simple pleasure of imaginative transport. But today it is felt that inherent in every great novel is a symbolic meaning, a significance which transcends the deeds of its characters. It could be said that the characters, the actions, and the conflicts in a novel are like disjointed letters, which only acquire full value when, by joining with one another, they form a word, and thus change themselves from mere signs into a new meaningful reality.

When Stephen Spender speaks of the "journalistic novel," I believe he is alluding to the type of realism which is not transcendental, while in the novel which he calls "poetic" may be encountered a symbolic fiction which uses the realities of human existence for an ultra-realistic proposition. Before "Madame Bovary," "Moby Dick," "War and Peace," "Crime and Punishment," or "Ulysses," Cervantes achieved a novel in which, transpiercing the entertainment inherent in every work of fiction, the reader may perceive a spiritual illumination which indeed does not shine on the characters of the book but turns upon and illuminates the reader himself. Every great book, though it may treat a multitude of characters, in the last analysis always ends in one—the human being who reads it, who thus becomes its ultimate and final character, the authentic protagonist.

Cervantes, in achieving for the first time this all-inclusive, universal novel, abandons the fabulous geography and the indecisive cultures of earlier fiction, and presents one land and one people—Spain and the Spanish people. That dust of the Spanish roads which Flaubert sensed coming to him from between the lines of the "Quijote" is Spanish earth, crumbled, floating earth. The "Quijote" arrived at universality by the way of localization in profundity, a very different thing from the superficial localization of custom and the picturesque in the so-called local color of the romantics. In this Spanish earth lives a people, with all its manners and customs and virtues and characteristic defects. And the catholicity of the "Quijote" is also proved here, because Cervantes admits into his pages people of every social and moral condition, each one represented with his inherent mentality. We remember the merchants, who in their typically pragmatic spirit, having no portrait by which to prove the fact experimentally, declined to declare Dulcinea the most beautiful lady in the world; and on the other hand, the wife of Sancho, superb example of the Spanish peasant woman, who knows very well what's what and why and wants to keep it that way: to live assured of her destiny like the tree in its earth, without aspiring to vain grandeurs which belie her natural being and don't agree with her. In this novel hundreds of people elbow one another and perform by turns: the "Quijote" is a true democracy in which they have a right to live and to be heard, dukes and galley slaves, priests and knights and girls of the town. The novel of the sixteenth century pigeonholed in classes the rogue, the exquisite courtly shepherd, the lofty knight errant. But the "Quijote" is a work above classes, a work of all humanity, of people without discrimination.

The Human Quality

Every great novelist has his own intellectual and emotional vision of man, his own conception of human nature. Man is one thing for Dostoevski, another for Henry James, another for Proust. Behind every novel pulses the tortured question: "What is a human being, what is my neighbor, what am I?" For centuries it has been thought that two characters were counterpoised in the "Quijote," that Don Quijote and Sancho personified two antagonistic tendencies of human nature. If this had been so, would not the result have been monstrous—that two such diametrically different and contradictory characters should travel together through the world as inseparable companions, loving each other with profound affection, aiding each other with fraternal solicitude? In reality the "Quijote" does not have two principal characters, Don Quijote and Sancho. Its one true protagonist is a dual character, a double hero—Don Quijote-Sancho. The hyphen which I use as an orthographic sign actually means much more: it separates the two names as much as it unites them. It means that Cervantes conceived human nature as an organic integration of two separate and distinct elements, of two impulses, the quixotesque and the sanchesque. If it is conceded, in so far as the matter can be reasoned, that the one personifies our tendency toward the greater good, toward spiritual and disinterested values, and the other our tendency toward the lesser good, toward materialism and egotism, then what Cervantes hints in the separation of the characters is that we must submit to the existence of these two forces which are born with all of us, the ascendant and the descendant, and accustom ourselves to bear them, living together side by side, within us. But on the part of Cervantes this should not be taken for an attitude of neutrality, of acceptance of the fact that man never will be able to overcome his inferior appetites and will always have to resign himself to being burdened with Sancho's saddlebags. The character of the squire perhaps progresses more than any other in the novel. To serve Don Quijote, to live at his side, is for Sancho the highest education. The Sancho of the end of the novel is almost as beautiful as Quijote, because Quijote has changed him. Translated into the symbol of human nature, this can mean, then, that our life is not a mechanical condemnation to abide always with a constant quantity of truth and error, of good and evil, but that the best in us lives together with the worst and can judge it day by day and model it in its own likeness. Our existence is, if not effective progress in everything, at least possibility of progress, a capacity for improvement; thus Quijote, by the force of love and kindness, conquers more and more territory in the nature of Sancho.

Invitation to Liberty

The supreme virtue of this book lies in the fact that everything we see in it is suggested by Cervantes in such a subtle and delicate manner that there is no work less doctrinal, less sermon-like, less exacting. If melodrama displeases us it is because, from the first pages, the author authoritatively ordains that we believe everything Mr. X does is good and wholesome, and everything Mr. Y does is detestable and nefarious; the reader must swallow all the author cooks up for him. But Cervantes envelops his work in a climate of liberty. It is my opinion that the literary technique of liberty is humor, because humor, in illuminating with two lights, in offering two or more versions of the same reality, moves us to an act of election. Cervantes collocates his characters in the special atmosphere which A. Castro has called oscillating reality, "la realidad oscilante." In it Don Quijote can be "loco" or wise, the basin-helmet or the helmet-basin; the reader is invited to choose constantly according to his understanding. The essence of liberty consists in permitting man to elect, and even more, in permitting him, if he does not feel truly convinced, to abstain from electing. Cervantes always proposes; he never imposes. And because of this his readers and critics, wise and ignorant, have worn out centuries contending that the "Quijote" is this, that, or the contrary. It is because, in reading it, we exercise the great privilege of the human mind confronted with the spectacular drama of the world: to discern its distinct realities, to compare them, and finally to place over those of our preference the sign of our liberty, election.

Report on Eastern Europe

RUSSIA'S EUROPE. by Hal Lehrman.
D. Appleton-Century Company.
$3.75.

WHILE I was in Poland last summer, one of my American colleagues was a correspondent for a New York afternoon paper which expected him to give a more favorable picture of conditions there than had been provided by the rest of the American press. The reporter, being intellectually honest, found himself admitting that the situation was not so "simple" as he had been predisposed to believe. I never checked up on what he wrote, but when last seen he was in a close huddle with his conscience.

Hal Lehrman started out for Eastern Europe a year or so earlier with similar preconceptions, and he admits with disarming candor that he had outlined his book in his mind before he started gathering material for it. That is not always the best modus agendi, and the upshot was that a very different book eventually emerged. "Russia's Europe" is the story of the mental and emotional process by which Mr. Lehrman was converted from what he might now describe as a starry-eyed liberal into a political realist. He wants "simply to show the impact of Soviet policy and action on the average mind of an average liberal." That seems a fair statement of what he has done.

One is sometimes surprised at Mr. Lehrman's surprise at what he found. A little reading of Marx and Lenin and a good history of Eastern Europe might have prepared him for some of it. As it is, he appears to bear a grudge against the Russians for not having turned out to be nice bourgeois democrats. In all fairness to them, they never really pretended they were. He was disappointed to find Russian and non-Russian Communists alike tough, unscrupulous, opportunistic, and filled with suspicion and fear of Westerners.

All this is not to say that "Russia's Europe" is a poor book. It is, on the contrary, a very good reporting job on the major part of Russia's Europe and a little slice of ours, Greece and Turkey. Mr. Lehrman did a lot of zigzagging back and forth through the Balkans and pieced together the story of what happened there during the first two years after the liberation. He has enlivened it with a goodly amount of "color" and anecdotal material; so that it reads briskly. He devoted more time—and more space in the book—to Yugoslavia than to any other country, and since this is the "toughest" of all the so-called iron-curtain countries, his division of space tends to weight the book. This could be justified on the ground that Yugoslavia is the model of what the Communists would like to achieve elsewhere.

Unfortunately, the more interesting northern countries are passed by. Czechoslovakia is tossed off—and aside—in less than a dozen pages, while Poland and Finland are assumed to conform to the pattern of the Balkans. The assumption is wholly unwarranted with respect to Finland, and at least an oversimplification as regards Poland. I should like to have seen some discussion of the reasons why the Communists felt compelled to adopt quite different tactics in countries where they found a strong native movement of the democratic left and center. In discussing Greece and Turkey Mr. Lehrman argues that these are the groups the United States should support against the totalitarian tendencies of the left and right.

In Czechoslovakia the non-Communists have already started waging the fight of their lives against a Communist attempt to crack down on them. It seems to me that Mr. Lehrman—like the State Department, incidentally—makes a mistake in underestimating the importance of that resistance. In Poland the Communists have yet to deal effectively with the Socialists. In Finland they have not so far tried to crack down.

The part of "Russia's Europe" that deals with Britain's and America's Greece and Turkey is only slightly less critical than the rest of the book. Mr. Lehrman visited Greece first and last. In 1945 he saw Allied policy there as a "betrayal to the extreme right"; in 1946, against the background of what he had learned in the rest of the Balkans, he saw it as "betrayal to the extreme left, through support of a reactionary clique whose excesses were forcing a democratic people to move closer and closer to the Communists." Since Americans have better opportunities these days for being informed about unsavory conditions on the other side of the "iron curtain," they may be more shocked by the sections on Greece than by those on Yugoslavia.

So far as I know, this is the first time anyone has attempted to piece together the whole story of Southeastern Europe since the war. Mr. Lehrman does tell that story, and his book will be useful, at least as an interim history. Eventually, it may be hoped, someone with the background and sophistication of a Hugh Seton-Watson will give us a more definitive history.

History as Narrative

ORDEAL OF THE UNION. By Allan Nevins. Charles Scribner's Sons. Two Volumes. $10.

THE publication of these brilliant volumes by one of our outstanding historians is an event of great significance to the general public as well as to the profession itself. For over a decade Allan Nevins has been preaching in season and out the necessity of bringing the reading of history back into the home to satisfy a popular interest that made Bancroft, Prescott, and Parkman "best-sellers" a century ago. His own distinguished books, which include two Pulitzer Prize biographies, testify to his belief that history can be made enjoyable, that intelligently conceived and properly written it need not restrict itself to the learned monograph or yield to fictionalization and the substitution of the photograph for the printed page. To prove his point Mr. Nevins has now embarked in Macaulay-like fashion upon a detailed narrative of that perennial favorite in our national past, the era of the Civil War. The first two volumes, "Fruits of Manifest Destiny" and "A House Dividing," proceed at a leisurely pace from the end of the Mexican War in 1848 to the inauguration of Buchanan in 1857. A third, reaching the summer of 1861, is promised; beyond that the author wisely declines to commit himself.

Judged by almost any standard—scholarship, readability, comprehensiveness, or sheer daring—this is one of the supreme achievements in recent historical writing. No previous account of these stirring years, and there have been many, can match this one for breadth, insight, and impartiality; none can rival it for body and flavor. Not content with mastering a formidable array of specialized writings by other students, Mr. Nevins has gone back to original sources, some familiar, many unused, and has succeeded in giving the period a freshness that few would have thought possible. On countless topics his is now the best account in print. Yet throughout, the prodigious research remains unobtrusive; and the story unfolds pleasantly, at times even breathlessly. The work's unique value, however, rests upon its vast scope. No one, not even the fiery von Holst or the more candid Rhodes, has painted on so broad a convas; and this advantage is exploited to the utmost. Personalities come to life in these pages because they are fully sketched. Debates prove exciting when detailed arguments on both sides can be heard. Industrial and agricultural developments take on a new meaning under a searching analysis of the social and economic conditions that called them forth. The railroad race to the Mississippi, the plight of the free Negro, and the blunders at Aix-la-Chapelle assume an air of reality thanks to a generous allotment of space. Most important of all, the massive framework enables the author to avoid a fault common in most social history: a tendency to compress reformers and inventors, editors and artists, educators and capitalists into a catalogue of names. To be sure the very magnitude of this enterprise leads to errors of fact, and this reviewer has found his share; but the wonder is that these lapses are so insignificant and so few.

An emphasis on chronology, personalities, and politics may strike some as old-fashioned. But Mr. Nevins makes it clear that his is "primarily a narrative history," and he rightly insists that "only a careful narrative can lay bare the inner meaning of the crisis, as only an ordered story can do justice to the suspense, drama, and human passion of the era." Knowing full well that many readers today learn most of their history from biographies, the author has given abundant pen portraits of the major figures of the fifties. Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, whose stock has fallen recently, emerge with new laurels as the only men, perhaps, who could have made the sectional truce workable and permanent. Although placing on his title-page the dictum of John Richard Green that "political history, to be intelligible and just, must be based on social history in its largest sense," Mr. Nevins refuses to bow to current prejudices against political history and properly gives it a prominent place. After all, no country was more politically minded than mid-century America, and to omit or minimize that facet would be a serious distortion. Eighteen of the thirty-one chapters deal with President and Congress, the causes and consequences of such momentous legislation as the Compromise of 1850 and the Kansas-Nebraska Act, the break-up of the parties and election campaigns. Yet none can complain that non-political matters have been neglected, for entire chapters are devoted to national characteristics, popular culture, reform movements, foreign policy, industrial progress, agricultural advance, railroad building, and the immigrant invasion. Perhaps the most notable accomplishment of all is a trio analyzing slavery as an economic institution and a race problem.

At a time when men again talk of an "irrepressible conflict," when agitators at both extremes again try to destroy any middle ground in an attempt to win adherents to their banner, Mr. Nevins's volumes cannot fail to teach a lesson for today. The author does not believe that the Civil War was inevitable, but a reluctance to face realities and the failure of statesmanship tended to make it so.

On the critical question of slavery he blames both sections: the South for refusing to consider its peculiar institution as a dynamic and evolutionary system, leading by regular gradations to freedom; the North for declining to do anything of a practical nature to assist in racial adjustment on a new basis. Equally dangerous was the bankruptcy in national leadership. From 1849 to 1861 the White House was occupied by three singularly incompetent men. "Zachary Taylor was stubbornly wrong-headed; Franklin Pierce impulsively erratic; James Buchanan timidly fumbling." With the passing of Clay and Webster, the new chieftains—Douglas and Seward, Davis and Chase—were more intent on exacerbating than composing the sectional quarrel. Many of these conclusions are not new, but they are all well worth restating. There is also food for thought in the suggestion that many difficulties that followed the Kansas-Nebraska Act would have been avoided under a parliamentary form of government.

It is sincerely to be hoped that Mr. Nevins's crusade to restore history to its rightful heritage will be crowned with success and that these remarkable volumes will be widely read and deeply pondered. For those who hesitate to read so many pages on so few years I can give no better encouragement than Mr. Nevins himself gave some years ago in his "Gateway to History":

The idea that fifteen minutes a day, or ten times fifteen, of aimless, undirected reading among good books will make a man well-read is one of the most pernicious ever disseminated under high authority. The idea that much history is "fascinating" in the sense of offering easy entertainment for a casual hour is equally fatuous. But if approached with as careful preparation and precaution as any sensible man uses in approaching a symphony, a masterpiece of art, or the handling of bicycle or skis, and if a little persistent effort is applied to it, ere long it will offer one of the most interesting, varied, and profitable—and most truly fascinating—of all employments.

"Ordeal of the Union" will amply repay any effort expended in the reading of it.

Novelist's Notebooks

THE NOTEBOOKS OF HENRY JAMES. Edited by F. O. Matthiessen and Kenneth B. Murdock. Oxford University Press. $6.

REVIEWING Mr. Matthiessen's "The James Family" in these columns, I said that the Jameses were "specialists in intimate experience." This is no doubt true, but it must be confessed that Henry James's notebooks are intimate only in respect to the problems of his craft. The few pages of personal matter in them are as unrevealing as they are charming. They summarize his early travels; they record his feelings on his mother's death; they relate an occasional literary event such as a meeting with Du Maurier or Taine; and they abound in examples of his familiar habit of stock-taking and resolution: "I must let myself go!" All this, however, is put down in the aloof spirit of a letter to a distant friend. Nor is there—and this is even more disappointing—any very tangible discussion of themes, of general ideas, of the larger meanings of James's work.

What the notebooks do contain in fascinating abundance is the anecdotal materials out of which he made his tales and novels. In many cases the original idea is not only recorded by James but tirelessly analyzed with a view to bringing out its "values," as he called them. Thus the notebooks supplement—but certainly do not rival!—James's prefaces as documents on the literary intelligence in relation to its materials. One notes, among other things, how very many of his stories originated in tales related to him at the dinner table or by the fire-side. It was as if his ideas came to him thus sanctified by their origin in a social occasion. For James, one might say, anecdotes were little myths. "Saturday, January 12th, 1895. Note here the ghost story told me at Addington (evening of Thursday 10th), by the Archbishop of Canterbury. . . ." The Archbishop's ghost story became "The Turn of the Screw."

Religious Poems by Rilke

RILKE'S LIFE OF THE VIRGIN MARY. Translated by C. F. MacIntyre. University of California Press. $2.50.

THESE are beautiful religious poems, less mawkish, less selbstvoll, than the early works about God in "The Book of Hours"; around them, in his usual contented fashion, Mr. MacIntyre arches, purrs, rubs against your knee to be stroked when you are trying to read. No translator of Rilke, so far as I know, can be as exasperating, as obtrusive as MacIntyre; and none is as good as he is at his best. Reading his notes and commentary, with the exuberant irrelevancies and the occasional idiotic obtusenesses, one wonders how he could possibly have the taste, the sense, the insight, even to care about Rilke, let alone present him; yet, every so often, the presentation is there, simple, direct, felt, conveyed, and right. An earlier selection of fifty poems of Rilke's, likewise published by the University of California Press, offered proof of his quality as translator, and more, of his capacity to choose, most capably, those Rilke poems which no one would like to forget. Like the former book, this one is carefully and handsomely printed; like it, this one should also be on the shelves of every reader who cares at all about Rilke's best, and has sufficient German to study the original through the help of the translation.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Drama

JOSEPH
KRUTCH

TWO years ago when Tennessee Williams was being hailed as the best new playwright to appear in a decade I was among those who were inclined to wait and see, but "A Streetcar Named Desire" (Barrymore Theater) is amply sufficient to confound us doubters. In mood and manner it is, to be sure, strikingly like "The Glass Menagerie." Indeed, the theme and even the story might be said to be the same, since both dramas are concerned with the desperate, unsuccessful effort of a female character to hang on to some kind of shabby gentility. But the new work is sure and sustained where the former was uncertain and intermittent. Gone are all the distracting bits of ineffectual precisosity, all the pseudo-poetic phrases, and all those occasions when the author seemed about to lose his grip upon the very story itself. From the moment the curtain goes up until it descends after the last act everything is perfectly in key and completely effective. The extent of Mr. Williams's range is still to be demonstrated. He may or he may not have much to say, and it is quite possible that sickness and failure are the only themes he can treat. But there is no longer any doubt of his originality, or of his power within the limits of what he has undertaken. Since 1930 only three new talents which seemed to promise much have appeared in our theater, and of Mr. Williams one must say what one said of Odets and Saroyan. Only time can tell just how far a young man who begins like this may possibly go.

Considered merely in terms of the story it had to tell, "The Glass Menagerie" was bleak enough, but the story of the new play is both bleaker and more frankly pathological. Its central figure is a young school teacher, daughter of a decayed Southern family, who has lost her job because she is—technically and not in the loose popular sense of the term—a nymphomaniac, and who has come, as the play opens, to seek refuge with a married sister in New Orleans. At the beginning we know nothing of the past of this central character, and we have nothing except a few intriguing, unexplained incongruities in her behavior to suggest that she is anything more than the shabby, desperately refined, and respectable young woman she seems to be. We share her distraction at the discovery that her sister has complacently accepted a descent into the blowsy happiness of a misalliance with a coarse, violent husband of frankly proletarian habits; and then, as the action proceeds, the dreadful truth about the heroine emerges until, in the terrible but finely conceived final scene, she begins what she believes is a flirtation with the attendant who has come to conduct her to the insane asylum. That the play is not merely the ugly, distressing, and possibly unnecessary thing which any outline must suggest is due, I suppose, in part to its sincerity, even more to the fact that the whole seems to be contemplated with genuine compassion and not, as is the case with so much modern writing about the lower depths, merely with relish. It remains, as there is no point in trying to deny, morbid enough. The mood and the atmosphere are what really count, and both are almost unrelievedly morbid, even, or perhaps especially, in those moments when a kind of grotesque comedy emerges. Yet despite the sensational quality of the story neither the atmosphere nor the mood is ever merely sensational. The author's perceptions remain subtle and delicate, and he is amazingly aware of nuances even in situations where nuance might seem to be inevitably obliterated by violence. The final impression left is, surprisingly enough, not of sensationalism but of subtlety.

Comparing, as one inevitably does, this play with its predecessor, the difference in merit between the two seems to be almost entirely the result of the author's vastly increased mastery of a method which is neither that of simple realism nor of frank fantasy. Obviously Mr. Williams is a highly subjective playwright. His stories are not told primarily either for their own sakes or in order to propound a merely rational thesis, but chiefly because they enable him to communicate emotions which have a special, personal significance. Already one begins to take it for granted that his plays will be immediately recognizable by their familiar themes and a sensibility as unique as that of a lyric poet. Yet he never quite abandons dramatic objectivity as a method. To go one step farther in the direction of subjectivity would inevitably be to reach "expressionism" or some other form of non-representational art. But though there is in the plays as written a certain haunting dream-like or rather nightmarish quality, the break with reality is never quite made, and nothing happens which might not be an actual event. Even the almost dadaist suggestion of the title is given—and more meaningfully than in the case of "The Glass Menagerie"—a rational explanation.

Though the new play is superbly directed by Elia Kazan and beautifully performed both by Jessica Tandy and by the other principal actors, the fact that the author has achieved so firm a mastery of his own technique will forestall the tendency to raise again the question so persistently raised in connection with "The Glass Menagerie"—the question, that is to say, whether or not it was the acting and the direction which "made" the play. "A Streetcar Named Desire" could easily be ruined by inadequate production. Everything in it depends upon the ability of a director and his actors to realize a subtle intention. One may even go so far as to say that if it had been given a bad performance, the spectator might easily have been misled into supposing, not that the production was bad, but that there had been nothing to produce. But to say that is by no means to say that the play was "made" by the director or the actors. It was made in the first instance by Mr. Williams himself, a playwright who demands much but who gives even more.

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

IT IS to be hoped that the first show by the newly organized Pyramid group of artists—there are twenty-six of them—at the Riverside Museum (through December 14) will not be taken as a conclusive demonstration of what the latest generation looks like in paint. Where we might expect freshness and energy, a glimpse of the new, we find only the shabbiest and most non-descript expressionism and post-cubist abstract art. Where we would assume that the reason these artists are not shown on Fifty-seventh Street is that they are ahead of it, we find on the contrary that they are behind it. Aside from the ineptness and natural lacks of most of the exhibitors, what is most distressing is a general backwardness, an expressionist constriction that no amount of self-assertive violence can break through. The effect is one of a dun monotony.

I wish to complain specifically about the color—the muddy, the gray, the bleak, the garish, the pallid. Why do these painters, even when they use fresh pigment, insist on harmonies that convert it into mud? Why are they unable to achieve positive tones? Is it because they are timid, provincial, uncultured? They are all that, and more. Meanwhile the genuine painters of the youngest generation remain in their cold-water flats, uncompromised. There are almost none of them in this show.

Two or three of the Pyramid artists should be exempted from the full force of these strictures. The delicate, pictorial sculpture of Blanche Sherwood, the only sculptor of the group, stands up despite its derivativeness; like most of the best contemporary sculptors she has a draftsman's gift. Howard Mitcham's abstract "Tropical Submarine," markedly influenced by Jackson Pollock, is the best painting shown and the only one well painted in the full sense of the term. However, the fatty greens and browns of Mitcham's other canvas darken it down, despite the real feeling with which it is handled, to a great gaping hole in the wall. Lewin Alcock's work, too, should be spared a bit; sadly uneven as it is, it contains at least a promise.

THE case of the late Alfred Maurer, a show of whose work was given recently at the Bertha Schaefer Gallery—and is now running at the Baltimore Museum of Art—is not unlike Ryder's. Maurer, who died in 1931, was not only one of the most distinctive American painters of the twentieth century; he was also perhaps the only authentic cubist we have produced. After going through an illustrative variety of impressionism, and his own original version of German expressionism, he came late under the influence of Picasso's and Braque's cubism, which he digested in a more integral way than did other American followers of the style, such as Max Weber. Nevertheless, Maurer's assimilation of cubism was not quite complete, and his later cubist still-lives, while they demonstrate a vivid talent and a growing control of it, suffer from a failure to understand and convert into instinct that one great lesson of French painting since Cézanne—namely, that from now on three-dimensional experience must be described in or transposed into strict two-dimensional terms (here Matisse and Bonnard have as much to say as cubism). Maurer wanted to put more color and variety into middle cubism than Picasso and Braque had; but he did this only by picking out an object here and there in the picture, and modeling it conventionally and tinting it more brightly, with the result that it was thrown into a three-dimensional relief that clashed disturbingly with the logic of the rest of the canvas.

One has the feeling that Maurer would have eliminated such errors had he lived longer, and that he would have struck out beyond the School of Paris. His powers were large enough. In any case his art deserves more attention. Perhaps the Museum of Modern Art will provide the occasion for more lengthy consideration by giving Maurer a commemorative show.

COLUMBIA has issued a recording of Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata played by Serkin (Set 711; $4.60). It seems to me that the dramatic atmosphere of the first movement must be established immediately in the hushed opening, and that Serkin's swift, smooth, on-the-surface playing here and in other such passages hasn't the slightest implication of dramatic force. On the other hand the second movement is made stodgy by the unusually slow pace—instead of Beethoven's Andante con moto—that Serkin maintains throughout. The recorded sound is the best Columbia has achieved of the piano—not that it has the warmth and luster of RCA Victor's piano-recording, but that the treble is sufficiently clear and bright and strong in relation to the bass.

Treble which is not sufficiently clear and bright and strong—to the point of occasionally being inaudible—is heard in the recording of Chopin's Sonata Opus 35 played by Casadesu (Set 698; $4.60). And that is a pity because the performance is the kind I think correct—with suppleness and grace but without the distortion of phrase that most pianists and critics regard as correct Chopin style. More traditional in style—but done with taste—is Novaes's performance of the Ballade Opus 47, a piece I don't care much for, which comes off the record with the high notes sounding a mile back of the lower ones (72345-D; $1.25).

Faulty recording is heard in the sound of Levant's performances of pieces by Debussy (Set 710; $5.85), which is dull on a wide-range machine and muffled on one of limited range. An agreeable surprise, however, is the evidence in the playing of the care and consideration with which Levant treats the piano, and the increased competence with which he handles it. The playing still isn't always clear and precise—for example in "La Soirée dans Grenade"—but it isn't clumsy and brutal. And the greater care and control are evident also in his treatment of the music: there is in "Reflets dans l'eau" only a little of the old erratic tendency that messes up "La Soirée," and that shows itself occasionally in some of the other pieces (most of them early and lesser Debussy). So, on a single disc (72372-D; $1.25), Brahms's popular Waltz Opus 39 No. 15 and Schumann's "Träumerei" are without the erratic details in Brahms's treacly Intermezzo Opus 118 No. 2.

As a matter of fact Levant's playing of Debussy's "General Lavine—eccentric" is pianistically and musically superior to E. Robert Schmitz's in the RCA Victor recording of the second volume of Debussy's Preludes (Set 1138; $5.50). Of Schmitz's performances I would say what I said of the ones of the first volume: that they are unequivocal and insensitive, without shape or direction, in their treatment of the music, and clumsy and unprecise in their handling of the piano. The recorded sound is good; the surfaces poor.

I like neither the highly mannered playing that Rubinstein does in popular pieces by Schumann and Brahms (Set 1149; $4), nor what his performance as a rip-roaring virtuoso makes of Tchaikovsky's popular Piano Concerto No. 1 with the Minneapolis Symphony under Mitropoulos (Set 1159; $5); and it doesn't matter much what he does with Liszt's trashy Piano Concerto No. 1, which he plays with the Dallas Symphony under Dorati (Set 1144; $3). The recorded sound of all these is good; surfaces are poor.

On a single RCA Victor disc (11-9672; $1) are a good performance of Liszt's Etude in D flat, an excessively mannered one of Schumann's "Aufschwung," by Ania Dorfmann. The recorded sound is good.

As for the English Decca recording of Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, which I find one of his best works (ED Set 35; $5), Eileen Joyce's playing of the solo part is pianistically heavy-handed and stylistically distorted and sentimentalized. The sound of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Muench is richly reproduced; that of the piano is, as usual, heavy down below and weak on top.

A Public Allegiance

Dear Sirs: An article published in your special supplement on Palestine of October 4, headed Inside Arab Politics and written by J. L. Teller, mentioned me as one of the opponents of His Eminence the Grand Mufti of Palestine.

I wish to inform you that there is no substance whatsoever in the allegations made in your publication. It is quite untrue that I had any connection with any political party or with the UNSCOP, or that I am an opponent of His Eminence. On the contrary, the Grand Mufti is the sole recognized and respected leader of all Arabs in Palestine, and I pride myself on having been one of his numerous supporters and admirers for the last thirty years.

The whole article referred to above has no foundation in fact.

M. BARADEY ABBASSI

New York, November 25

Dear Sirs: The Honorable Judge, while expressing admiration for the Mufti, does not deny that he was a signatory to a memorandum submitted to UNSCOP in Geneva in defiance of the Mufti's Arab Higher Committee's boycott. Nor does he deny that he was decorated by King Abdullah of Transjordan, whose aspirations are known to conflict with those of the Mufti. It is customary, because of the Mufti's methods of combating political opponents, for the latter publicly to proclaim allegiance to him.

For this reason, too, I unfortunately cannot disclose the names of the Arab sources—and there were several of them—with whom I checked the information contained in my article.

Attention, Mr. Thomas!

Dear Sirs: Recently I came across a statement by an American citizen of considerable prominence which I feel should be brought to the attention of J. Parnell Thomas, chairman of the Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities. The statement represents the sort of dangerously radical sentiments which Mr. Thomas and his fellow committee members are so zealously endeavoring to eradicate in this country. It runs as follows:

You see my kind of loyalty was loyalty to one's country, not to its institutions or its officeholders. The country is the real thing, the substantial thing, the eternal thing; it is the thing to watch over, and care for, and be loyal to; institutions are extraneous, they are its mere clothing, and clothing can wear out, become ragged, cease to be comfortable, cease to protect the body from winter, disease, and death. To be loyal to rags, to shout for rags, to worship rags, to die for rags—that is a loyalty of unreason, it is purely animal; it belongs to monarchy, was invented by monarchy; let monarchy keep it. I was from Connecticut, whose constitution declares "that all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit; and that they have at all times an undeniable and indefeasible right to alter their form of government in such a manner as they may think expedient." Under that gospel the citizen who thinks he sees that the commonwealth's political clothes are worn out and yet holds his peace and does not agitate for a new suit is disloyal; he is a traitor. That he may be the only one who thinks he sees this decay does not excuse him; it is his duty to agitate anyway, and it is the duty of the others to vote him down if they do not see the matter as he does.

Unfortunately the author of this highly subversive and thoroughly un-American utterance is now beyond the reach of Mr. Thomas's committee, as he died in 1910. He was Samuel L. Clemens, alias Mark Twain, and the passage quoted appeared in "A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court."

Dangerous List

Dear Sirs: As a result of the current hysteria about left-wing groups it is becoming increasingly difficult for the hard-pressed liberal to determine with which organizations he may "safely" cooperate. To solve this problem, a formula is obviously desirable, and, as a result of laborious research, I offer this one:

Do not cooperate with any organization which has any of the fifty-five names listed below in its title:

Agency; Alliance; Appeal; Assembly; Associates; Association; Auxiliary; Board; Book Club; Book Shop; Branch; Brigade; Brotherhood; Bureau; Caucus; Center; Chamber; Chapter; Chest; Circle; Clinic; Club; Commission; Committee; Conference; Congress; Cooperation; Council; Department; Division; Drive; Forum; Federation; Foundation; Fellowship; Fraternity; Friends; Fund; Front; Group; Guild; Institute; League; Legion; Lodge; Mobilization; Movement; Office; Order; Organization; Round Table; Service; Society; Union; Workshop.

Objection to Mme Flagstad

Dear Sirs: We professional musicians who served our country in World War II protest against the coming Carnegie Hall recital of Kirsten Flagstad, who did not serve her country in its years of darkness.

We do not advocate suppression of the works of creative artists, but we do believe that pro-fascist interpretative performers should serve a period of non-performing penance for their sins against humanity and democracy. We hold this "Music Plan" enforceable against the Furtwänglers, Giesekings, Giglis, and Flagstads. How else can we show respect for those who suffered because of conscience in fascist countries?

It is of interest that on the same day that the press carried notices of the riot caused by the public appearance of Furtwängler in Vienna, Mme Flagstad's appearance in Chicago was greeted with enthusiasm.

The Musicians' Chapter of the American Veterans' Committee hereby records its continuing respect for anti-fascists and its continuing objection to any public appearance of Mme Flagstad.

Dear Sirs: I have just read the excellent article by Homer A. Jack, The New Chicago Fires, in your issue of November 22. It is an outstanding piece of work. I have only one minor comment to make. In the article the author refers to "legal talent headed by Leon M. Despres." There were three lawyers in the case—Mr. William Temple, Mr. M. J. Myer, and I. Since we were all equal, the announcements listed our names in alphabetical order. In that sense Mr. Jack was accurate in his statement. However, although I may have been primus, I was only primus inter pares.

The Shape of Things

THE REPUBLICANS' NEW ANTI-INFLATION bill is about as efficacious as a shinplaster for a broken leg. The only good reason we can see for Mr. Truman's signature on it is that it extends export and transport controls, due to expire February 29, and provides the President with power to limit the use of grain by distillers. Its central feature is the pernicious proposal for voluntary allocation agreements that figured in the original House bill. As we pointed out last week, such agreements are unlikely to gain their objectives, and their immunity from the anti-trust laws is a dangerous precedent. All in all, the bill well merits the scathing comment of Wayne Morse of Oregon, one of the three Republican Senators to vote against it. "If this is the only remedy we offer the country for inflation," he said, "that inflation will continue to grow higher until the people demand a different course of action."

✕

CERTAINLY, IF REPRESENTATIVE KNUTSON has his way, inflation's growth will be rapid. For while his colleagues have been cutting a leaf or two from the top of the plant, he has been preparing a heavy dose of fertilizer for its roots. This is the new $5,600,000,000 tax-reduction bill which he has just introduced, a measure so artfully loaded with appeal to small, medium, and big taxpayers alike that it is being hailed as "veto-proof." Last summer, Mr. Truman rejected a Republican tax bill on the ground that it was bad both in content and timing. The new bill appears to distribute its benefits more equitably by adding $100 to personal exemptions and by giving the middle and higher brackets smaller percentage cuts. But persons receiving larger incomes will, if married, be more than compensated by a provision allowing for equal division of income for tax purposes between husbands and wives. Such a change in the tax law would make little difference to those with incomes below $5,000 but would afford substantial savings to those with $10,000 to $100,000. Even a much better bill would be untimely at this moment, for it would be bound to give a strong stimulus to inflation. On the one hand, it would add directly to purchasing power in the hands of the public and so swell the demand for scarce goods; on the other, it would cut sharply into the Treasury's prospective surplus and so weaken one potent weapon for combating credit inflation—a steady retirement of the public debt.

THE SPLIT IN THE FRENCH FEDERATION OF Labor is much more complex than press dispatches have indicated. In part, it resulted from a widespread revolt among trade unionists against Communist direction of the recent strikes and the predominance of Communists in the leadership of the unions. In part, it represents a revival of old anarchist trends in the French labor movement. That the second factor is playing a role in the present crisis is shown by the refusal of several anarchist unions to join the Force Ouvrière in forming a new non-Communist coalition. This two-way division, however inevitable, may result in a serious fragmentation of labor forces at a time when reaction is showing increased energy. Coinciding with the news of the break, a Gaullist mass meeting at the Vélodrome d'Hiver launched a violent attack, both on the left and on the authority of the National Assembly. Less direct but equally significant is a subtle maneuver to wreck the Schuman government, initiated last Saturday in the Assembly by René Capitant, De Gaulle's aggressive parliamentary lieutenant. Thus, by several parallel routes, France moves toward new political crises. In coming weeks, these developments will be reported and analyzed by our European Editor, J. Alvarez del Vayo, who is now in Paris.

THIS WEEK, ILLINOIS IS CELEBRATING THE hundredth anniversary of a governor who looms larger today than when he died in 1902. Fortune, of all journals, has described John Peter Altgeld as "one of the great underground Americans," and a lonely truth-sayer "when most men believed that power brought wisdom." While he lived, storms broke around his head—in 1893, when he pardoned the anarchists imprisoned for complicity in the Haymarket bombing, and again in the famous Pullman strike of 1894, when he took the part of the workers and their leader, Debs, against the government and President Cleveland. almost universally as an anarchist and an unscrupulous demagogue. Apparently Altgeld was not much of a radical in theory. But by instinct and conviction he invariably sided with the weak and, in doing so, aroused the hatred of the strong and conventionally righteous. The Nation of that day joined in the general criticism, looking upon Altgeld as a man whose sympathies had led him into defiance of the courts and of orderly government. Today, his magnanimity and trust in the people, his contempt for repression as an instrument of democratic power, are qualities of which his country stands in urgent need. This journal, gladly reversing its ancient judgment, joins in honoring a man who sacrificed his career, his health, and his fortune to defend his own idea of human decency. *

BRITAIN'S HIGHEST COURT COULD HARDLY have granted the plea of a husband who asked to have his marriage annulled on the grounds that it had never been consummated because his wife refused to have children and insisted on the use of contraceptives. But the language and temper of the decision of the five Law Lords of the House of Lords, as set forth by Lord Jowitt, were such as to shiver the timbers of the Church of England and send a thrill of horror through the Catholic hierarchy. Lord Jowitt stated that the marriage law uses the word "consummate" as it is "understood in common parlance and in the light of social conditions known to exist." These social conditions, he went on to say, include the establishment in recent years of reputable birth-control clinics and their use by many young married couples. Moreover, he advised against too strict reliance on the wording of the Book of Prayer in regard to marriage and children. "It seems to me that the essence of the Christian view of marriage is that any child born into a family should be brought up and nurtured in the Christian faith. That is not the same thing as saying that a marriage is not consummated unless children are procreated, or that procreation is the principal end of marriage." It is not surprising that the Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Westminster, confronted with Lord Jowitt's civilized heresy, declined to comment.

THE NATION—AND HENRY H. COLLINS, JR.—had too good a scoop last week. The bill authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to use Commodity Credit Corporation funds to stimulate agriculture in non-European nations was introduced into Congress not, as Mr. Collins's article said, by Representative Jesse P. Wolcott in the House, but by the Administration floor leader, Senator Barkley, in the Senate. It was, however, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency instead of the Committee on Agriculture, and may yet emerge as a bipartisan measure. In any event, it sidesteps the FAO.

P.C.A.'s Quixotic Politics

IT IS not too late for Henry Wallace to undo a sad day's work by the Progressive Citizens of America. In casting the die for a third party last week, the P. C. A. seriously altered the political landscape of the country—and not for the better. Not only a whole series of polls but the results of last month's election showed clearly that the Republicans had lost a great deal of ground since their victory in 1946. If Wallace, following the prompting of P. C. A., runs as the Presidential candidate of a third party, the gains of the Democrats may well be wiped out. Close key states like New York, Illinois, and California may go to the Republicans without a struggle, in which case we can look forward to at least two years of rampant Taberism on Capitol Hill and, in the White House, four years of Taft or reasonable facsimile thereof. For the G. O. P., believing it can win with anybody, will do no fancy experimenting with pseudo-liberals or popular generals.

Before concluding that the two major parties were identical and that only Wallace could give the voters a genuine choice next fall, the P. C. A.'s strategists might have asked themselves why political sentiment seems to have shifted so markedly in the past six months. If they had, they would have sensed that, for all the weaknesses and mistakes of the Truman Administration—and we have not glossed them over—there is still a gulf between the two parties, taking them by and large, both in intention and in program. It is a far cry from the jungle economics of Republican Representative Knutson, who thinks the progressive income tax "conflicts with the American spirit of fair play," to the President's veto of the G. O. P.'s lopsided tax-reduction bill. No matter what dangers lurk in the application of the Marshall Plan, nobody can honestly ignore the difference—acknowledged, in fact, by Wallace himself—between the Administration's foreign-aid program and the vicious attacks of most Republican leaders on the projected "WPA for Europe." Nor do we see an identity between Republicans and Democrats on legislation dealing with inflation or labor.

With a record of having supported "Old Bob" La Follette in 1924, we are not ones to oppose a third ticket merely because it cannot win or because it will serve to elect the less desirable of the two major-party nominees. But it is impossible for us to welcome a third-party movement today or even to treat it as indulgently as the New York Herald Tribune. This good Republican organ coyly and understandably suggests that a third party which waits for ideal conditions waits for the millennium. The G. O. P. is obviously eager for this hazardous venture to get started.

The fact is that the P. C. A.'s decision could not possibly be worse timed. Perhaps we could afford to take a chance on electing Coolidge in 1924, but the world of 1948 presents a different picture. Connolly, of the American Labor Party, calmly writes off the results of the next election on the ground that "what is important is to form a basis so that in '52 we can elect a people's party." By 1952, the fate of the American economy may well have been sealed and the question of war or peace decided. It is all very well for Communists to entertain the hope that after the deluge their turn will come, but why should Henry Wallace invite either consequence?

It is precisely because of the abnormal importance of the 1948 election that the P. C. A., by its quixotic move, now finds itself cut off from every important labor group in the country. The C. I. O. high command turned thumbs down on the third-party idea months ago. The Railroad Brotherhoods would have no part of it in spite of A. F. Whitney's former bitterness against the President. The A. L. P. will almost certainly be split on the issue. And the P. C. A. itself has been severely jolted by the resignation of Frank Kingdon, Bartley Crum, A. F. Whitney, and J. Raymond Walsh—all officers of the organization and supporters of Wallace's political views. The attitude of labor is alone enough to make Wallace's campaign very different from La Follette's. Never before has a serious progressive group in this country even thought of launching a third party without major support from the trade unions. The result of the P. C. A.'s decision, if Henry Wallace agrees to run, can only be to confuse enough progressives to assure a Republican victory without establishing a mass base for a future third-party movement.

London to Washington

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE reasons for the breakdown at London have been set forth by the Foreign Ministers, and their versions vary exactly to the degree and in the form dictated by the diverse interests of their respective states. But when those interests are understood and discounted, a certain common denominator emerges from the conflicting explanations: in essence, it was the Marshall Plan that killed the Foreign Ministers' conference.

When the sessions in London began, The Nation made this comment on the outlook: "With the Marshall Plan still in the lap of the Congressional gods, the Foreign Ministers can do relatively little. For all of them must know that the future of Europe is being decided, not in London, but in Washington." In his report on the last day of the session, the New York Herald Tribune's correspondent, Walter Kerr, summed up the reasons for adjournment in these words:

It is generally understood here that progress at this time was impossible because of the major conflict involved in the Marshall Plan and Soviet hostility to it. All four powers hoped for political and economic unification of Germany, but the West wanted it only on terms that would aid the Marshall program, while the Soviet delegation wanted it only on terms that would wreck the Marshall program. For this reason, the ministers never really got down to business.

So it began and so it ended, though I think Mr. Kerr's account understates the differences that exist among the Western powers on the organization and control of Germany. But, by and large, those powers are counting on the operation of the Marshall Plan in Germany and in Western Europe to block Russian aims and end Communist aggression; while Moscow is determined to defeat this strategy by every possible method—diplomatic, propagandist, and political.

In such a context, how could the conference have accomplished anything but noisy contention? Molotov has charged that the United States never expected or intended it to succeed; Marshall insists that he went to London "with an open mind" but that the Russians converted the session into a forum for unscrupulous propaganda. I think both versions are patently true. The Secretary of State would have done better to be frank about his own expectations; certainly, America's plans for organizing Western Germany as a separate state, in fact if not in name, were freely discussed in advance of the conference. As for Russia, it has never attempted to conceal, except in detail, the rapid integration of the Soviet zone with its own political and economic structure, or its purpose to win German support by promising political unity and higher living standards. At London, the world was treated to the spectacle of Russia and America competing without apparent shame for the favor of their late enemies.

The talks broke down on the Soviet demand for reparations out of current production; but this was an occasion, not a cause. Any one of the previous disagreements—over Austria, or what nations should be accepted as participants in the peace conference, or whether a frontier commission should be set up, or what sort of German government should be established, or any of Molotov's declamations on Western imperialism and American plans to enslave Europe—might have provided an equally suitable issue; perhaps even more suitable, since Molotov had expressed a willingness to compromise on reparations. The talks broke down because they had degenerated into a slanging match, in which the advantage was held by the power that had most to gain from all-out attack. The delegates were taken aback when Marshall proposed adjournment; but from a strategic point of view, the General's move was correct. In a talking war, the Russians might win. They cannot win, Washington believes, in a war of dollars and food.

SO THE focus shifts to the massive plan of support for Europe comprehended in the bill for interim aid—reduced from $597,000,000 to $540,000,000 and passed on the last day of the special session of Congress—and the European Recovery Plan (ERP) sent to Congress for consideration when the regular session convenes on January 6. The hopes of Western Europe, which induced France and Britain to accept American leadership in London even to the point of rupture with Russia, must find their justification in an early and effective application of the plan. For if this program should dwindle to another measure of stop-gap aid, or if it is hedged about with self-serving qualifications, or if it is delayed and haggled over while European industries close down and hunger spreads, then we may be sure the prophecies of the Russians will take on new force and meaning.

What is the chance of quick action on ERP? Already, Mr. Taft, with his unfailing tact, has announced that Europe isn't really as badly off as the plan implies. "People don't completely collapse," he explained; "they go on living anyway." Already, Republican axes are being whetted to hack the Administration's estimates to a size consonant with Congressional ideas of spending in an election year. Already, we are warned, the idea of a four-year commitment is doomed to defeat; the Republicans want to save Europe on a year-to-year basis.

Even in its present state, the ERP contains many questionable provisions, as I. F. Stone shows in his article on page 696—provisions which will measurably limit the economic independence of participating states. If it is further distorted and watered down, the result may be as dangerous as no program at all. But to many Congressmen, it seems only natural that if the United States provides the money it must also be permitted to say how the money shall be spent: that is, how the industry and finances of a recipient country shall be organized, and what sort of government it shall have. We have made such control a condition of our increased financial support of the Bizone in Germany; taking over from Britain final say in matters of policy. We have done the same thing in Greece. And when the Marshall Plan was first discussed we made it clear to the governments of both France and Italy that their chance of qualifying for aid would be slim if they included Communists. Having established that ban, why should we not insist on other policies designed to protect our investment in recovery?

Since the Administration itself provided these precedents for interference and the setting up of political conditions, it will have a tough time persuading Congress that ERP is different, that Western Europe as a whole cannot be treated like Greece or the Ruhr. But this is what it must do. For if the majority in Congress adopts a Republican "Marshall Plan," the failure at London will be repeated in Washington, with political consequences throughout Europe too terrible to contemplate.

SURREALISM REBORN

ERP Goes to Congress

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 20

THE Marshall Plan, as sent to Congress by President Truman, has a magnitude which commands respect. Seventeen billion dollars "ain't hay," and no other nation in any other post-war period has proposed so magnanimous an effort at reconstruction. Unfortunately it is unlikely that the plan as finally approved will be adequate for its purpose—the recovery of Western Europe to the point where it can again support its present population through normal production and trade.

The key figure in the documents furnished Congress by the State Department is in the statement: Western Europe, in order to pay for its pre-war volume of imports, must export "perhaps 30 per cent more than pre-war in physical terms." This need for a 30 per cent increase in the volume of exports reflects the loss in the last war of the investments and colonial possessions from whose earnings Western Europe formerly paid for its net excess of imports over exports. These imports covered foodstuffs and raw materials.

In order to achieve so steep a rise in exports, Western Europe must modernize and expand its industrial facilities. It must vastly enlarge output and sharply reduce production costs. This requires capital, to feed its working people and to invest in new plant. But these requirements have been shaved too close in the plan as sent to Congress. Let us first look at the figures on food. The Paris proposals asked 40,000,000 metric tons of bread grains over four years; the plan offers only 23,000,000 tons. The Paris proposals asked 12,000,000 tons of fats and oils over four years; we propose to supply 2,000,000. To enlarge Western Europe's own output of food, Paris asked $1,200,000,000 in farm machinery; the President is prepared to make only half that amount available from the United States and Canada. The participating countries and Western Germany estimated that they needed a minimum of 600,000 tons of nitrogen; we offer 121,000 tons from the United States but believe 301,000 additional tons may be obtained elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere.

BEHIND these cuts, which endanger European recovery, lie a complex of private interests and habits we dare not disturb. Domestic soap and cosmetic firms must have their fats and oils; the fertilizer industry holds back on expanding nitrogen production. There is a boom market at home for farm machinery, and there is little disposition to enforce food savings. The threatening shadow of competing business interests is even more evident on the other side of the Marshall Plan program—the proposals for expanding Western Europe's capacity to produce and therefore to export. In steel, shipbuilding, factory construction, housing, and power the United States has lowered Europe's sights in deference to its own basic industries, which fear European competition.

The American steel industry dislikes increased production abroad as much as at home. The Paris proposals envisaged a $2,500,000,000 expansion in steel plant, requiring $400,000,000 in new equipment from the United States. The Marshall Plan cuts this to $192,000,000. The Paris proposals also asked scrap and semi-finished steel for fabrication in Europe. The Marshall Plan offers no scrap and very little semi-finished steel but suggests a sharp increase in the sale to Europe of American finished steel. The industrial strategy of these changes in the steel proposals is clear. Similar, if more complex, is our attitude on shipbuilding. The Administration seeks at one and the same time to cut down European steel requirements for shipbuilding and to discourage the production of too much competing tonnage in European yards by contributing 500 cargo ships from war surplus to carry Marshall Plan supplies. This proposal would also cut the dollar cost of the plan substantially, but it has already run into opposition from both capital and labor in the American maritime industry, which wants supplies carried in American bottoms.

In oil refining the motivations are similar but the pattern different. This is the one major industry in which the Marshall Plan has vastly increased the goals proposed at Paris. The Paris conferees asked a half-billion dollars' worth of oil-refining equipment for Western European oil companies. The Washington proposals suggest that the Marshall Plan include "allowances needed by United States companies within the participating countries" and raise the sights to one and a half billion. United States oil companies foresee a richly profitable market in Europe for cheap Middle Eastern oil and are anxious to control the refining as well as to supply the crude. In this connection one should note that the bill sent to Congress with the President's message would authorize dollar-for-dollar guaranties of American private oil investments under the plan up to a total of $850,000,000. The guaranties would be good for fourteen years, and both the oil companies and other American concerns holding blocked marks—which include the war profits of their German subsidiaries—can be expected to make good use of them. But this may also cut further into the dollars available for European recovery plans.

THE Paris proposals sought the restoration by 1952 of a standard of living in Western Europe slightly below that of 1938. "So rapid an improvement," says the State Department analysis accompanying the Marshall Plan message, "cannot be achieved." It certainly cannot be achieved on the basis of the Paris proposals as reduced and modified by the Marshall Plan. The United States suggestion is that Western Europe eat less and export more, but can we achieve political stability in a framework of still greater economic "austerity"? The State Department analysis admits that if Western Europe can attain the level of exports assumed by the American program, with imports no greater than those allowed for, "those countries will be subjected to the most severe strain that free countries can be expected to bear under the circumstances of the times." The department, with a wary eye on Congress, pleads that "assistance on a smaller scale" would prolong "the very situation that makes assistance necessary." The scale set by the President is already too small for safety, but Congress will almost certainly whittle it down. There will be a strong move to give primary emphasis to the rebuilding of Germany and to enlarging the scope and volume of the guaranties to private investors seeking bargains on the distress counters of Europe.

The most serious obstacle of all to Western European recovery lies in the tendency to "sell" the Marshall Plan here on an anti-Communist basis. For one has only to read through the supporting documents, with their bland assumptions about mounting deliveries to the west of Polish coal and Soviet timber, to see how essential is revival of east-west trade in Europe. But how is this trade to be revived in an atmosphere of increasing tension between the United States and Russia? The Marshall Plan, as sent to Congress assumes that in four years Western Europe will be able to buy twenty-five billion dollars' worth of essential goods from "non-participating countries outside the Western Hemisphere" and sell them twenty-two billion dollars' worth of goods. These huge totals depend largely on recovery in Eastern Europe. Can they be achieved in the course of an anti-Soviet crusade, which discourages good trade or other relations with the Soviet bloc? These are the crucial, perhaps fatal, contradictions of the Marshall Plan.

Radio Starts to Grow Up

BY CHARLES A. SIEPMANN

AN UNMARKED anniversary has lately passed, that of the broadcast (October 10, 1938) of "The Men from Mars," after which thousands of terrified Americans wept or prayed, sped frantically away in cars—where to didn't matter—or snatched a last meal from the icebox before they met their Maker. The anniversary seems worth recalling as we again witness, in the witch hunts of today, the susceptibility of modern man to mass hysteria.

Radio still feeds on the credulity and escapist impulses of a people troubled in spirit and confused in mind, but there have been signs in 1947 of a developing maturity. Radio has turned, on a few significant occasions, from fantasy to facts and played its mirror on the nature and occasion of our discontent. A new kind of radio is coming into being. Its originators call it the "radio documentary." If it is not to be still-born, it must be acclaimed and fostered by those who recognize its great potentialities.

Though largely dominated by men with a cash complex and a cynical contempt for ordinary listeners, radio has always mustered a few people who combined appreciation of its power with a sense of social responsibility and an awareness of the cultural crisis to which radio and other mass media have contributed. It is to two of these that we owe the radio documentary—Edward Murrow, until lately CBS vice-president in charge of public-service programs, who conceived it, and William Paley, chairman of CBS, who with a nicer conscience and a shrewder sense of salesmanship than his own account executives gave it the invaluable support of his authority. As a result of their collaboration a documentary unit, headed by Robert Heller, was created in CBS, given generous funds both for research and for production, ample time—no deadline for any broadcast was fixed—and unusual promotional facilities. Best of all, these documentary programs have gone on the air at hours convenient for people not plagued with insomnia. What have they attempted and what have they achieved?

The radio documentary is concerned, first, to give us facts about the unfinished business of democracy, to report on man's conscious or unconscious inhumanity to man. It is concerned, secondly, to show us our responsibility for the inhumanity in our society and to prompt us to action, though not to prescribe it. It observes scrupulously radio's proper function with respect to social problems, which is to give us facts without seeking to influence our decision on the facts. The documentary does not preach. It points. Its virtue and discretion lie in its choice of areas in which its fact-finding is carried on.

Successive programs have given us the facts in a wide range of problems. The first was "The Empty Noose." In this the war criminals of Nürnberg were arraigned before us. We heard the charges and the verdict. We were moved to indignation—by a dramatic record of the facts. But lest indignation provide an alibi for conscience, there followed a disturbing but salutary question: "We hanged these men. But did we hang the crimes that they committed?" The program ended with some brutal facts on our own treatment of Jews and Negroes who had returned, in uniform, from the service of their country. The audience did not like this last, but it listened.

The second, "The Eagle's Brood," dealt with juvenile delinquency—its causes and the medieval cruelty and ineffectiveness of our reform and prison system. The third, "A Long Life and a Happy One," dealt with public health and the unfinished business of the medical profession. The fourth, "Experiment in Living," explored new techniques for developing democratic leadership among the young. The fifth, "They Went Back," reviewed the war fronts two years after the war's end. The sixth, "Fear Begins at Forty," foreshortening time, precipitated our old age for us. It pictured the miseries of old people tossed on the junk heap of society, without work or funds.

These programs have cost money to produce. Beyond this, in order to make room for them, CBS has several times sacrificed advertising revenue by canceling sponsored programs. The results have revealed the readiness of audiences expecting entertainment to respond to the drama of real life. "The Empty Noose," for instance, was substituted, without prior warning, for an Ellery Queen "whodunit." All but a fraction of the listening mystery fans stayed with the documentary to the end. The same thing happened when "The Eagle's Brood" replaced "Information Please." Audiences, indeed, have been uniformly large, generally upward of five million. Correspondence afterward has run to thousands of letters.

BUT what is most interesting is that a precedent has been established. Through its documentary unit CBS is committed to a permanent if as yet modest contribution to public service. In addition, some of its affiliated stations have followed through with programs taking up, at the local level, where the original documentary left off. Listeners thus learn that "national" problems are only local problems writ large and can be solved by collective effort in the several communities. The problems of intolerance, crime, youth leadership, old age, and so on cease to be remote abstractions and are seen to be the consequences of our own personal default or apathy. In Chicago a CBS affiliate continued to discuss delinquency in a magnificent local series. In Minneapolis discrimination against Jews and Negroes in employment and housing was illustrated in the local context.

Runner up to CBS in this public service is ABC, which this year has given us four excellent programs on the teacher problem, two on slums, and in "Shame of the People" an indictment of the public's failure fully to exercise its rights or perform its duty at the polls. Recently, MBS has swung into line with two fine programs on the problem child in our public schools. NBC, oldest and richest of the networks, alone has failed thus far to come through with a documentary of distinction.

We can discern the promise of this new kind of radio in the reaction to these first experiments. A significant amount of the great volume of correspondence from listeners asks, "What can I do about it?" Conscience, or better, perhaps, decent neighborly feeling, has been stirred. "Men at some time are masters of their fate," and some radio listeners are rediscovering the fact. A few communities have formed councils to rid themselves of the abuses disclosed. The Department of Justice has asked CBS whether its own efforts to deal with juvenile delinquency might not usefully be synchronized with further efforts by radio.

Here, then, is a tentative blueprint for collaboration among government, radio, and listeners; here, in fact, is promise of that working partnership on which the success of our system of broadcasting depends.

However, it is promise only. We shall have solid social gain only when certain conditions have been met. We must have, for instance, more such programs—on CBS and on all networks. (For a start we might look for documentaries bringing to life the content of the report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, "To Secure These Rights.") The practice of following through with programs at the local level must be more widely adopted. And documentaries must be presented at fixed times and at fixed intervals, with adequate advance publicity. Radio audiences are creatures of habit, and the documentary habit won't be formed until these programs are scheduled as regularly, if not as frequently, as Jack Benny or Fred Allen.

These are all demands on radio. But there is a no less imperative demand on listeners. If the documentary is to flourish, audiences must be mustered whose size and articulate response are comparable to the money and effort that go into the execution of these programs. It has been proved that audiences for entertainment and fantasy are responsive also to reality. To increase that responsiveness is only in part radio's job. Teachers, community leaders, trade unions, and other influential elements in the listening public have also a moral obligation. Yet to the detriment of radio and of the public interest it remains largely unfulfilled. Much of the best in radio today goes down the drain, unheard and unappreciated by those who are often readiest with criticism.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Hazlitt's Laissez-Fairyland

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

A JUST verdict on Henry Hazlitt's new book, "Will Dollars Save the World?"* is given by the author himself in his first chapter. "It would be ungenerous and shortsighted," he writes, "to minimize the appalling physical destruction and the enormous economic and political problems that the last World War brought to Europe." The remainder of his ninety-five pages represent an attempt to prove that Europe's present plight has, in fact, very little to do with the war but is the result of failure by the various governments to give unrestricted private enterprise its head. "Ungenerous and shortsighted" certainly are the adjectives to apply to this attitude.

Hazlitt's major premise is that European recovery is being thwarted by socialist experiments, economic planning, and government restrictions that prevent the forces of supply and demand from resuming their beneficent direction of production. His minor premise is that unless Europe mends its ways and sweeps away all obstacles to a free-market economy, any outside aid in the form of loans or gifts will prove futile. This leads to the obvious conclusion that since the imposition of such reforms as a condition of aid is impossible, Europe must be left to stew in its collectivist juice. Or, as Hazlitt puts it, "If our loans are made without economic reforms in the borrowing countries, the funds will be dissipated without bringing any revival; but if we insist on reforms as a condition of our loans, the Communists will exploit the powerful issue of 'dollar imperialism' and 'economic subjugation.'"

If American loans are not the solution for Europe's troubles, what can be done? Although Hazlitt is inclined to wonder whether there is any way "to save nations that are bent on destroying themselves," he does devote two and a half pages to "positive recommendations." He advocates private charity, provided the recipients show they are deserving. In an "overriding emergency" he would approve government gifts of food to Europe if every loaf were stamped "kindness of Uncle Sam." But, he suggests, our most important contribution will be to "expose the fallacies of European statism and socialism by our contrary example." The way to attack the Communist ideology is "to defend capitalism without apology." No loans for Europe in short, but a little charity and a bellyful of propaganda about "the merits of our free-enterprise system."

I do not wish to convey the impression that Hazlitt is a callous man. He is not anxious to see Europeans suffer; he chastises them for their own good in the firm belief that they can regain their prosperity only by swallowing the free-market, free-enterprise pills he offers them. Hazlitt, you see, is a fundamentalist, who believes that economic truth was established once and for all in the early nineteenth century. He is a man with a vision of the perfect state, a laissez-fairyland, where government is a policeman whose only job is to keep the ring while every man pursues his profit competitively with every other man, where the sum of all self-interests somehow adds up to the greatest good of the greatest number.

* D. Appleton-Century Company. $1.50.

The presiding deity of this Utopia is not Mammon—in conditions of perfect competition profit tends to become more and more marginal—but the Goddess of Liberty. Nevertheless, free men for generations have been voting not for less and less restriction of the market but for more and more. So Hazlitt has little chance of establishing his Utopia unless he can make himself a dictator. That is a paradoxical and frustrating situation for an apostle of liberty, and it is not surprising that he is soured. Thwarted in his desire to build the perfect state, he is using his very considerable talents to tear down such constructive proposals as the European Recovery Plan.

Hazlitt is an able pamphleteer with a clear and vigorous style. He knows that one reason why economic writing is hard for the uninstructed reader is that the complexity of the material forces conscientious economists to refine and qualify their statements, often at tedious length. Hazlitt avoids this difficulty by ignoring the complexities and sticking to broad, unqualified generalizations. He makes a few simple points and drives them home by constant repetition. It's a technique well known to professional propagandists, and Hazlitt handles it with a skill that Molotov might envy.

Even so, in the competitive atmosphere of bookstores, Hazlitt's volume might not have attracted enough buyers to exert a strong influence on public opinion. To make sure of mass distribution, therefore, he arranged for its simultaneous publication by the Foundation for Economic Education of Irvington-on-Hudson, in the Sleepy Hollow country, an organization of which he is vice-president. This paper-covered edition is priced at 75 cents, with quantity orders obtainable at progressive discounts. Judging by the number that are now floating around—one of our readers reports he has received five copies from five different donors—it would seem that corporations and business men who support the foundation are buying them in carload lots for presentation to friends, customers, and employees. Consequently, there is no need for readers to rush for the book: sooner or later they will probably receive one as a gift and have $1.50 saved toward the cost of a CARE package.

AMONG the recipients, we can be sure, are all members of Congress, and echoes of Hazlitt's arguments are likely to be heard in forthcoming debates on ERP. It is worth while, therefore, to subject parts of his thesis to a somewhat detailed analysis. Of special interest is the program of "minimum reform" (his italics) which he insists European nations must adopt to insure recovery. It includes the following items (my comments in brackets):

1. A balanced budget: to be achieved by cutting military expenses, social-security costs, food subsidies, subsidies to nationalized industries, building, and so forth.

2. Elimination of exchange controls so that the value of currencies may be established in the free market. [Admittedly, this requires amendment of certain statutes of the International Monetary Fund, statutes insisted upon by the United States with a view to preventing competitive currency depreciation.]

3. Abolition of price controls on either domestic or imported goods, and an "end to other regulations that prevent or unbalance trade and production." [This presumably includes an end to consumer rationing, allocations of industrial raw materials, and so on.]

4. Lowering or removal of excessive foreign-trade barriers.

5. Reduction of excessive military establishments. [On this one point Hazlitt's views coincide with those of the "Keep Left" Labor group in Britain, but not, I suspect with those of the State and War departments. Britain and France are the only Western European nations with large military establishments, and drastic cuts would probably necessitate withdrawal of their occupation forces from Germany and Austria. Does Hazlitt think that would be a good thing?]

Hazlitt does not test this program by showing how it might work out under actual conditions in different countries. He prefers to talk about "Ruritania," a mythical land which, he says, is a composite portrait of them all. Personally, I distrust this device, for such pictures are apt to be blurred. I propose, therefore, to discuss Hazlitt's formula in terms of the country I know best—Britain.

Unlike "Ruritania," Britain has a large budget surplus, so we can pass directly to item 2—elimination of exchange controls. This step Hazlitt regards as especially important, for, he argues, overvalued currencies are a cause rather than an effect of unbalanced trade. Britain, he holds, is short of dollars only because it wants to import more from America than it can afford. The pound is stabilized at $4 while its real value in a free market is probably $3 or less. Consequently imports are encouraged, since prices of imported goods are artificially cheap, and exports discouraged, since they are too dear. If the pound were freed from exchange controls, imports would decline, exports expand, and Britain's international balance of payments attain equilibrium.

No one can dispute the economic logic of this proposition; the only thing wrong with it is that the price of balanced trade would be malnutrition, if not outright starvation, for many Britons. British imports are not inflated; their present volume, in fact, is about 70 per cent of pre-war, and for Britons imports mean not luxuries but basic foodstuffs and raw materials. Nor can it be said that British imports are too cheap. Actually, Britain's "terms of trade" are much less favorable than before the war; that is to say, average prices of its imports have risen more than average prices of its exports. Devaluation would increase this discrepancy, so that it would take more cases of whiskey or more Wedgwood tea sets to pay for a ton of wheat.

Further cuts in British imports, coupled with removal of price controls, rationing, and food subsidies—all necessary steps for the restoration of a free market—would mean of course a tremendous rise in prices. That, in Hazlitt's view, would be all to the good, for he believes that the proper way to create capital for recovery is to restrict consumption through inflation. This prescription ignores the human element, takes no account of the fact that, under such circumstances, Britain's almost unbroken post-war industrial peace would be dissolved in a welter of labor strife as wages vainly chased prices. Britons have submitted to very sharp restrictions of consumption so that their cities and industries may be rebuilt and export trade rapidly expanded; but they have done so by virtue of a social compact based on equality of sacrifice.

FEW Britons, I believe, are prepared to exchange that compact for Hazlitt's free market, in which the devil takes the hindmost. I am sure he could not persuade the British Tories to adopt his program. Were they to do so the electors would reject them even more forcibly than in 1945. Hazlitt always talks as if "socialism" and "planning" were imposed by a "state" over which the people have no control. But in Britain at least the voters have the last word, and they are no more likely to cast their ballots for dictatorship of the market than they are for dictatorship of the Communist Party.

The same thing is true of the American electorate, and I am ready to bet Hazlitt that he cannot sell a genuine free-market economy to any major American party or political leader. He probably knows this, for when he formulates his example-setting program for the United States he pulls his punches. He suggests, for instance, merely a reduction in tariffs. Come, come, Henry. Why not say what you surely believe—that tariffs are incompatible with the sovereignty of the market and must be wiped out completely. And why are you silent about the need for abolishing price supports and other government aids to agriculture, subsidies for shipping, aviation, housing, and silver, the "fair-trade" laws, and all such blotches on the escutcheon of our "free-market economy"? Is it because, were you really to speak your mind, the Tafts, Knutsons, and McCormicks would refuse to take you seriously? Or are you afraid of alarming the business men who sustain the National Foundation for Economic Education with tax-free donations?

Planning Without Headlines

BY MICHAEL J. DE SHERBININ

Geneva, December 11

WITH each day bringing new evidence of the widening breach between Eastern and Western Europe it is heartening to be able to report that East and West have been meeting during the last three months in a cooperative, business-like spirit in the conference rooms of the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) at the Palais des Nations here.

ECE is based on a historical fact—the economic interdependence of all European countries—and its work has continued quietly while the "western" Committee of European Economic Cooperation, which wrote the report for the Marshall Plan, has been in the headlines. It was created by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations last March to "initiate and participate in measures for facilitating concerted action for the economic reconstruction of Europe, for raising the level of European economic activity, and for maintaining and strengthening the economic relations of the European countries, both among themselves and with other countries of the world." It was given the power to make recommendations directly to member governments without going through the council.

The new organization is absorbing three groups which are only a little older than itself. The European Coal Organization, which has done an excellent job allocating United States, German, and Polish coal to European nations since the end of the war, continues its work as the Coal Committee of ECE, beginning January 1, 1948. The European Central Inland Transport Organization has become the ECE Transport Committee, concerned with international transportation problems. The third organization, the Emergency Economic Committee for Europe, was a more loosely organized predecessor of ECE.

At the head of the organization is the commission itself, composed of representatives of all U. N. nations. A number of committees, subcommittees, working parties, and the secretariat make up the body. The secretariat's chief job is to do the research needed by the various committees. Many excellent economists have joined the staff. The executive secretary is Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, a brilliant Swedish social scientist who resigned as his country's Minister of Trade to take this post.

All European nations concerned with the problems under discussion—except Spain—are asked to attend the ECE meetings. Five nations not members of the U. N.—Austria, Finland, Hungary, Italy, and Switzerland—took part in the recent discussions of the Industry and Materials Committee. The U. S. S. R. was represented at the two plenary sessions in May and July, but it has not sent delegates to meetings of committees and subcommittees. The Russians say that the problems considered are not common to their economy. United States delegates have been present at every meeting held here since the first one last May. Representatives of the German occupation zones attend from time to time.

Recently the Eastern countries have shown an encouraging interest and desire to cooperate. Poland, Hungary, Finland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia have sent key men from their economic-planning departments. They are looking for machinery or other supplies which can only be bought in Western Europe or America. Their choice in regard to help from America under the Marshall Plan was made for them by Russia last July, but they still have access to this U. N. meeting-ground to arrange increasing trade with Western Europe.

Emphasis within ECE has been on work, not on oratory. It regards itself as a technical body to promote economic recovery, not a political forum. All meetings except the plenary sessions have been closed to the press, and while the ECE has in consequence received scant publicity, the delegates have refrained from chauvinistic eloquence. ECE considers that its first task is to increase European production of certain key commodities whose lack now impedes revival. Committees are working to solve problems in steel, man-power, electric power, timber, and fertilizer, as well as coal and transport.

Considering the length of time it has been in business and the forces working against it, ECE is progressing well enough. The committees first met in September, October, or November. They examined the data prepared by the secretariat and then, in many cases, requested additional studies. For instance, the Fertilizer Subcommittee of the Industry and Materials Committee has asked for more complete data on the capacity and use of nitrogen-producing facilities in Europe. Myrdal himself gave a good appraisal of the work of ECE when he said recently: "At the minimum, these technical explorations will provide data to the governments on which they can make their own production and trade plans on a more firm basis. At the maximum, the objective of our work is the negotiation of production, trade, and financial arrangements among the countries concerned which will aid in the solution of particular commodity problems." There is no other forum in Europe today where government representatives of East and West meet to exchange economic information.

THE relationship of the Marshall Plan to the ECE is of course of primary importance. Last July, when the decision was made to form the Committee of European Economic Cooperation in Paris, there was considerable outcry because ECE had been by-passed. In Geneva Britain was generally thought to be the villain of the piece. However, a Russian statement of June 29 suggested that U. N. machinery should not be used for providing the United States with European economic data and that European countries should compute their needs from the United States individually. While Molotov, Bevin, and Bidault were conferring in Paris on the Marshall suggestion, the Moscow radio, as quoted by the London Times, announced: "The Soviet delegation does not, after all, insist that the U. N. Economic Commission [presumably meaning ECE] should be given the task of receiving and collating the estimates. It prefers that it should be done by special European committees in which Allied countries should be given first place." In view of this attitude, it is difficult to see how the economic requirements of the participating countries could have been effectively and quickly considered by ECE, of which Russia is a member.

The Paris committee did not consult ECE last summer, but its report indicates a desire to use the organization in connection with the Marshall Plan. It counts on imports from the East to meet certain Western needs and time and again leaves the door open to Eastern countries that may wish to cooperate, mentioning the ECE as the organ through which this cooperation might be effected. ECE, for its part, has formed committees which cover all the economic sore spots, from fertilizer to steel, discussed in the Marshall Plan report. This is encouraging to the Eastern countries, which see in it proof that ECE means business—business done in Geneva, not Paris—and will help ailing Eastern as well as Western economies.

The effectiveness of ECE will of course depend on the general feeling between the United States and the U. S. S. R. If political relations become even more strained, the Eastern countries may be expected to be less willing to work with the West, and the Western countries may feel compelled to act as a "Marshall Plan bloc." This would definitely limit ECE's hopes of bringing Europe together.

MERRY CHRISTMAS TO ALL!

Del Vayo—"Talk Success"

London, December 16

REVISITING London for the first time in more than a year, I am happy to report that Britain appears to be pulling out of its crisis. There are still six very hard months ahead. From now until summer the British people will be on the lowest rations in their history. In contrast with the almost overheated homes of the poorest Americans, English flats are perpetually cold and damp. Although prices of necessities—food and various "utility goods"—are held down and the goods severely rationed, uncontrolled prices are absurdly high: a pair of fleecelined boots cost £6, 10s—about $26; a shirt that New Yorkers would consider expensive at $8 sells for $15 in London; the few luxury foods and liquors found in the black market command prices no one can afford. Some rents are controlled; others are inordinately high. A student whom I visited lives in a single miserable room, its red carpet in rags; he pays more than I do for my three-room apartment in New York. Altogether the British are having a drab time of it, and one of the unhappy results is a marked hostility toward foreigners, particularly Americans.

But of this I am sure—England will come through, and faster than even its own leaders believe. Indeed, the people, especially the workers, have shown more stamina than their Labor government. It would be unjust to minimize the government's achievements at home, which stand in sharp contradiction with its reactionary foreign policy in Palestine and Greece and Spain. On the whole the Labor Party's domestic program deserves praise. What is lacking, however, is faith in the capacity of the working class; the government simply does not know how to talk to workers, or for that matter to the public in general. Several times I heard Prime Minister Attlee broadcast in tones as oppressive as a London sky. Most other official spokesmen are no less querulous and melancholy. Seldom does a spark of enthusiasm or optimism, let alone revolutionary ardor, enliven their statements to a country struggling to carry through a social revolution after its own fashion. The miracle is that in spite of uninspired leadership the British people have shaken off the mood of impending disaster and come to grips with their problems.

Journalists must often fill the gaps left by statesmen. The London News Chronicle is one paper that has recognized the average Englishman's need of an encouraging word. In a new column called Talk Success, which occupies a prominent position on page one, this liberal journal is doing a job the Daily Herald, official organ of the Labor Party, should have tackled long ago: here it publishes dispatches from roving correspondents on what the British workers are doing. A typical column tells the story of thirty-six-year-old Jack Lee of Swanley, Kent, who has overcome the nemesis of the farmer—days lost because of bad weather. Another describes a group of forty women who marched into the mill of Bullock, Thornhill and Sons at Macclesfield to help man the machines and speed up production. The heroine of a recent column was Mrs. Emily Jackson, fifty-two, mill worker, who volunteered a month ago to help organize a relief shift of housewives at her factory. Letters in support of the News Chronicle's campaign are pouring in from all parts of Britain. "Start talking success" has become the slogan of this dreary winter. There has been launched, in effect, a kind of British "Stakhanovite" movement that demonstrates what the workers are capable of accomplishing when they are encouraged to rely, not on the uncertain generosity of a Republican-dominated American Congress, but on a social ideal and their own efforts.

According to official figures, British miners dug 4,356,200 tons of salable coal last week, breaking the record of 4,313,000 tons established seven and a half years ago in the post-Dunkirk spurt of August, 1940. On the day the coal figures were published, London papers carried, as a kind of comic footnote, the statement by John L. Lewis before the Senate Commerce Committee in Washington that the "British Empire is being liquidated before our eyes" because its miners and mine owners have refused to adopt mechanization. At this moment Britain is preparing to resume coal exports on a fairly large scale and thus obtain hard currency with which to relieve its rigid rationing system. On the heels of the coal story came the announcement that steel production last month—at the rate of 14,174,000 tons annually—was the highest for any November in the country's history.

These concrete indications of economic revival may have—at least so the best Labor people are hoping—a salutary effect on the government's foreign policy. The other evening in the House of Commons I asked some Labor and Liberal M. P.'s who had supported the Spanish Republican cause how they could keep silent in the face of the political murders now taking place in Franco Spain; that morning the papers had reported the execution of a student named Julio Nava, carried out with all the refinements for which the Falange is noted. Their answer was that the people have been absorbed in their own problems. Perhaps now that Britain is beginning to see the green light of recovery, we may hope for a more vigorous, independent foreign policy in line with the campaign promises of the Labor Party. Harold Laski says that dissatisfaction with the government's stand on foreign affairs has brought the rebels in the party up to 40 per cent in the last eleven months. In any case the advocates of unconditional acceptance of Washington's anti-Russian strategy are steadily losing ground. Announcement of the Anglo-Soviet trade agreement provoked the most enthusiastic demonstration the House of Commons has witnessed this year. Even Anthony Eden, acting leader of the opposition, rose to congratulate the government.

Journal of the War Years

THE MAKING OF YESTERDAY:
THE DIARIES OF RAOUL DE
ROUSSY DE SALES, 1938-1942.
Reynal and Hitchcock. $4.50.

PERHAPS the dailies should adopt as their ideal old Ranke's formula: "as it actually happened." But even the dailies have to select—and how! No uncritical chronicle can be considered history. History is inevitably partial, relative, subjective. It is the light projected upon the confused mass of events by a doctrine or a personality. As such, it is worth exactly what the system or the man may be worth. I like works which attempt to explain; I enjoy even more the record of experience, when the recording instrument is sensitive.

Raoul de Roussy de Sales was an almost perfect instrument. A well-educated, aristocratic Frenchman, he was almost completely free from class and national prejudices. He lived for ten years in New York, as political correspondent for Paris-Soir and the Havas news agency. His was almost a diplomatic post: the Quai d'Orsay, directly or through the French ambassador, consulted him, and completely failed to heed his advice. His diary of the war years—1938 until his death in 1942—has the quality of Amiel's Journal: it reveals a questioning, anxious, despairing soul. Keen-sighted, disinterested, disenchanted, he does not seek to convince us (he thought his diary was unpublishable); he compels us to question ourselves. In comparison, most of the other war books are mere anodynes, meant to alleviate the malady of thought.

Admirably placed to know and to understand, he confesses he did neither. Nor did Hitler, Stalin, Churchill, or Roosevelt; as for Cordell Hull, he might have lived in another planet. Roussy de Sales is no infallible prophet. He failed, almost completely as the State Department, to gauge the force of the De Gaulle movement, which he considered as "purely episodic." But no contemporary drew an accurate forecast. Lippmann asserted that it would never be necessary to send an expeditionary force to Europe. Marshall staked his reputation as a military expert on the proposition that Hitler would annihilate the Soviet armies in a few weeks. Did not the early Christians—so we are told by Reinhold Niebuhr—believe in the imminence of the Second Coming?

Roussy de Sales admits at the end that his congenital pessimism blurred his vision. This pessimism may have been aggravated by the state of his health. The chief cause of it was that he belonged to a world in which he no longer had faith. So he was at heart a traitor to a class and a country that he could not quite renounce. He is right in calling himself a bad Frenchman. A Frenchman, because he still held, with Maurois and St. Exupéry, that all Frenchmen ought to be united, a bad Frenchman, because he utterly rejected Pétain, the symbol of legitimacy, the living flag. He flirted with the "rebels" and "dissenters," the Fighting French, without fully committing himself to their cause. In the same way he was still a member of the privileged classes, those profiteers whose last round-up had been on the Riviera; but he despised that alleged élite, and himself for not having more openly broken with it. His tragedy was not radically different from that of Stefan Zweig. Disease saved him from suicide, or from a survival embittered by self-contempt.

There are two thoughts that stand out with the utmost clarity from these deeply moving pages. The first is that since 1917 the bourgeois world has never relented in its crusade against communism. Chamberlain, Hoover, Lindbergh were in their secret hearts—a very open secret—at one with Hitler, Mussolini, Franco, the Pope, and the Kaiser (odd to find that forgotten ghost, William II, proclaiming so clearly the Truman Doctrine!). Men and nations—Republican Spain, Czechoslovakia, Blum, Roosevelt, Wallace—were distrusted or hated because their anti-communism was not pronounced enough. It was obvious to Roussy de Sales that what we condemned in communism was not the dictatorial methods which we condoned in Franco or Chiang Kai-shek. This crusade, he says, "brings to the surface the normal need of the ruling class for repression. Communism only means in many cases the efforts of the working class to ameliorate its lot."

The second outstanding point is Roussy de Sales's anti-nationalism. It focused slowly. For a long time he condemns roundly "France" and "the French" ("I belong to a fine nation of cowards"), "America" and "the Americans." He accepts the nationalistic hypothesis but despises the idols that others adore. His attitude is almost akin to the anti-theism of Vigny and Proudhon: "There is a God, but He is evil." At the end he recants. It is foolish to talk of France, Germany, America, or of the French, the Germans, the Americans. There are individuals with an essential humanity (the Common Man) and with unique idiosyncrasies. There are collective trends, convictions, interests, but these wholly ignore frontiers. The nations are the epitome and sublimation of everything that in an individual we would condemn as mean. By definition, a nation—any nation—is (a) selfish (myself, first and last!), (b) smug (God's own country, Holy Russia), (c) brutal (absolute independence, above the law, can be maintained only by the sword), (d) cowardly (bullying the weak, considerate of the strong: what an improvement there would be in our manners if we knew for certain that the Russians have started the mass production of atomic bombs! And how our "realists" despised our old friend France when they thought she was down and out!), (e) treacherous (diplomats "lie for their country"; military attachés forswear espionage and practice it; we boast that we kept on good terms with Vichy in order to undermine Vichy), (f) hypocritical (all nations profess the highest idealism and behave "realistically"), (g) confused to the point of stupidity, for no nation has a single mind. The Germans are a good people and a bad nation; but theirs is only an extreme instance. There is no such thing as a bad people or a good nation. The "guilty nation" is no myth, because the guilt is inherent in the very idea of nation.

Within and beside these two great themes there are innumerable remarks

In these pages that are profound, not because they are decisive, but because they are challenging. Certainly French and American civilizations, or ways of life, could have no more pitiless critic; neither could the bourgeois order, the Catholic church, Protestantism, even Christianity. Philosophy and science demand a constant revaluation of all values. Roussy de Sales is not the destroyer but the assayer. Any institution, any belief, that shrinks from the test is self-condemned. In the case of this ailing and fearless man, as in the case of Voltaire, the acid test is the manifestation of faith. God does not need our lies. The skeptic, the jouisseur, the profiteer do not waste their efforts challenging idols. Their one question is: "What is there in that racket for me?"

ALBERT GUERARD, SR.

Federico Lorca

THREE TRAGEDIES OF FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA. Translated by Richard L. O'Connell and James Graham-Luján. With an Introduction by Francisco García Lorca. New Directions. $3.75.

WHAT Lorca intended as a dramatic trilogy, "taking his time about it, and occasionally shooting off at a tangent, is now available, for the first time, to the English reader in translations by Messrs. O'Connell and Graham-Luján. In these three plays, "Blood Wedding," "Yerma," and "The House of Bernarda Alba," Lorca progressed, quite consciously, from the Corinthian, through the Ionic, to the Doric style, a happy progress incidentally for his translators, who are rather at a loss when dealing with lyric passages or interpolated songs and on much surer ground—though they are not smug about it, as their revisions of "Yerma" indicate—when it comes to handling direct colloquial prose.

To the present volume the poet's surviving brother has contributed an introduction emphasizing the effect of the poet's passion for the theater on his life and art. Don Francisco is loving, persuasive, and eloquent, also a little diffuse; one sees, reflected in his memoir, a good deal of the enthusiastic, exuberant, hard-working, and altogether charming intelligence that must have been Federico's; and one feels, if not altogether ungracious, at least a bit uneasy at being unwilling to accept, completely, the doctrine that Lorca stands or falls by these three plays rather than by the "Romancero Gitano."

Three ballads from the "Romancero Gitano" collection appear in a selection of some two dozen poems of Lorca's, translated by Stephen Spender and J. L. Gili, published in London by the Hogarth Press and with the New York imprint of Transatlantic Arts, and listed here at the very moderate price of $1.25. These translations represent a revised, improved, and enlarged version of a collection published by the same translators in England in 1938; the emphasis here is on the literary rather than the literal, and there seems to be more Spender and less Gili than in the earlier book. In addition to some of the early lyric poems, some songs from the plays are included—the reader can make interesting comparisons between these and the Graham-Luján renditions; and two of Lorca's major poems, the Ode to Walt Whitman and the Lament for the Death of Ignacio Sanchez Mejías, are presented in their entirety.

Canada, Past and Present

CANADA: A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL HISTORY. By Edgar McInnis. Rinehart and Company. $6.50.

THIS is the fourth good one-volume history of Canada to appear in the past five years, all of them by Canadians and all, contrary to previous custom, in American editions. Thus not only has the large amount of excellent basic research into Canadian development which was done between the wars been boiled down in synthesis, but it has been commanding American readers. The old imbalance in American concern about Canada and Latin America, by which the Panama Canal and Caribbean oil heavily outweighed the largest single economic affiliation of the United States, appears to be adjusting itself to aerial travel, atomic energy, natural resources, and Canada's role in American calculations about all three.

McInnis's history is an apt reflection of his general diagnosis of Canadian survival, that notable triumph over conflicting cultural traditions at home and that striking British and Canadian contradiction of American "manifest destiny": "It is this sound sense of the possible that has enabled Canada to surmount each successive crisis; and each one has uniformly been followed by a new period of progress in Canadian independence and Canadian unity, and by a fresh growth in economic strength and political stature." In fact, in his extreme care to introduce and to adjust emphasis among the French, British, and North American elements in Canadian possibilism, McInnis over-indulges in what should be an outworn convention of Canadian historical writing by giving almost 40 per cent of his space to the period before 1815. Once that admittedly difficult task is out of the way, however, he moves ahead with an easy mastery of existing knowledge and with the sense of proportion which might well have pervaded the whole book. Errors are almost non-existent. There is little or no novelty but, instead, consistently admirable consideration of the elements involved and, consequently, an enlightening introduction to the Canada of today. The prose is close-packed but lucid and fluent. There are almost a hundred excellently chosen illustrations of appropriately generous size. Liam Dunne's end-papers and maps are beautiful and communicative, but Mr. McInnis ought to have checked them, for the hatchings of that on page 4 are badly mixed up and the scales of miles on two others are, to put it mildly, whimsical.

J. B. BREBNER

McGuffey's Readers

MAKING THE AMERICAN MIND.

Richard D. Mosier. King's Crown Press. $3.

IN THESE days of the Freedom Train, the hunt for our heritage, the trailing of our traditions, Professor Mosier has a "natural" in surveying the social and moral ideas in the fabulous "McGuffey Readers." These collections of improving stories, excerpts from chauvinist speeches, uplift poems, and do-good essays were launched in the age of Jackson by the shadowy William Holmes McGuffey, about whom Dr. Mosier vouchsafes little information, referring us to an article in the "Encyclopaedia Britannica" which doesn't appear in my 1944 edition (want to bet, doctor?). From 1836 to 1920 seven publishing houses sold 122,000,000 copies of the books. For generations of little red schoolhouses the readers were basic texts. In 37 states, New England excepted, the series of readers carried on by an army of contributors set down a pattern of middle-class virtues which makes the American Mind what it is today, God help us all.

At least that's the way Dr. Mosier sees it. Of course he assumes that all the little dears, especially in the Midwest, where the readers had their biggest circulation, took their McGuffeys straight, an assumption which the history of the radical and progressive movements in the Valley of Democracy would seem partly to refute. On the other side of the fence the Robber Barons, from the Rockefellers and Drews to the elder statesmen of the N. A. M. today, were all reared on the Bible and McGuffey, and grew up singularly unaffected by either.

For some obscure reason the publishers of Dr. Mosier's book announce that "the work is presented substantially as submitted by the author, without the usual editorial attention of the Columbia University Press"—which is a pity, because this work could stand editing, to say nothing of proofreading.

The author starts interestingly enough with the presentation of the issues involved in the Hamilton-Jefferson debates, which continue to this day. His sympathies are with the Jeffersonians, but he charges the compilers of the "eclectic" readers with loading the dice for the Hamiltonians and quite conclusively proves it by countless quotations. Then he rambles repetitiously around in a morass of petty-bourgeois bilge, forever harping on the theme that because of their enormous circulation these readers were "the studied and articulate reflection" of a civilization dominated by "middle-class ideals." Undoubtedly, but to label that drab cross-section of our civilization with the all-inclusive "the American Mind" is quite another matter.

IT IS time and past time to add my own useless comments to all those which have been provoked by the recent relationships between Congress and Hollywood and by the Catholic Veterans' holy war against Chaplin. But I can say very little. I might manage an adequate salute to the Catholic Veterans and to a church which has forborne, with such unfathomable patience, to commend them to the rack; but this is made impossible by the postal laws. I am still less capable of adequately discussing the case of the ten men cited for contempt of Congress, and fired by their employers. For the nothing that it is worth, I cannot imagine how any self-respecting man could, under such circumstances, hold Congress otherwise than in contempt; such contempt naturally extends to include those who, with such eager and prissy abjectness, hastened to disown these men—thereby reducing the hopes of every honest man in Hollywood from a desperately achieved 2 per cent to sub-zero.

I believe that a democracy which cannot contain all its enemies, of whatever kind or virulence, is finished as a democracy. I believe that a vigorous and genuine enough democracy could do so. But I see no reason to believe that this democracy is vigorous or genuine enough by a good deal, or to hope that it can become so; nor am I thoroughly convinced that such a democracy can ever exist except in the most generous and sanguine imaginations. It seems to me that the mere conception of a vigorous and genuine democracy, to say nothing embarrassing about its successful practice, depends on a capacity for faith in human beings so strong that on its basis one can dare to assume that goodness and intelligence will generally prevail over stupidity and evil.

This is, I would presume, the bravest and noblest faith of which men, purely as such, are capable; but I cannot see that this faith is any longer available, in the face of all the monstrous evidence to the contrary, except to one particularly obstinate kind of religious enthusiast; and I am convinced that a religious enthusiast who is required, on pain of heresy, so recklessly to underrate the power of evil and stupidity in a singularly insecure, not to say insane, position. I think it would be possible to proceed on this assumption in any hope of sanity only among people who could share a minimum, however humble, of veneration for individual human beings, and of an ability to honor and trust each other's humanity, even in their fiercest differences. But it seems to me that virtually nobody, any more, chooses even to try to honor and trust even himself, or even his best potentialities. Failing that, it is of course impossible to deal honorably or trustworthily with others; and we have harrowing evidence what a peculiarly infernal mechanism democracy inevitably becomes when it is manipulated by and for people who no longer understand its meaning and purpose. The Stalinists are by no means the only enemies of this reverence for single people, and of the possibility of mutual trust, even among opponents; in that respect non-revolutionists of every kind and class have already depraved themselves, this nation, and "democratic civilization" beneath any likely prospect of cure. But among all these enemies the Stalinists are as ruthless as the worst of the others; are moved by the energy of idealism, of a kind, rather than the naive self-cannibalistic self-interest which is so ravenous here; and are the most intelligent, coherent, and vigorous, the best equipped in every essential way to turn all alternatives to their advantage, and to win. More elaborately than any others they have developed a science of contempt for present humanity, including themselves in their own scruples as individuals, in the name of future humanity, and a science for utilizing, and conquering, those who believe merely in each other, or merely in self-advantage.

Harmless therefore as these ten men seem to me as individuals—harmless and, some of them, a good deal better than that, and contemptible as those are who have fingered them out, or who have run from the opportunity to defend them and their own self-respect, it seems merely sensible to recognize Stalinists in general as particularly dangerous enemies and to settle as best one can the unhappy question whether or not one prefers, in the name of the brotherhood of man, to offer legal protection to a professional assassin in the practice of his vocation among the members of one's family. A secondary meditation might—or might not,—determine which members of the family are classifiable, not necessarily as human, or friends, but at least as enemies who can be lived with; and which of them can qualify even as watch dogs.

Yet the real crucial conflict is not between the Stalinists and the nominal democracies. It is between those who honor existence and so, necessarily, morality and those who honor either only in the hypothetical future, if at all. I have a few personal opinions as to who is who and how to know them apart; some Stalinists, I am sure, and even, believe it or not, a Congressman or two qualify more honorably than group-mad bigots can ever suspect as members rather than enemies of the human race. But to venture such opinions, of interest to few, of use to none, would be the more frivolous and impertinent for a reason somewhat more grave. Those whom I regard as friends and fellow-soldiers, many of them conscious and unimaginable millions of them never to become conscious, have already lost. And those whom I regard as enemies are already so securely in charge, throughout the governing of the world and throughout the so-called opposition groups, that one can care very little who fends off or dislodges whom, or which laws and principles, long insulted and injured, are at last officially put out of their misery—very little except in the tragicomic intelligence and in a small but acute personal way. I shall presumably die a so-called natural death if the civilization within which I live continues in anything roughly like its present form—unless, of course, I offend one of its idiotic machines. If it does not so continue, I assume that my death will be even less welcome and more terrible than the considerable talent of nature ordinarily provides. I doubt that it will continue. It has been rotting above ground, on its feet, legally classified as alive, for a long while already, and will destroy itself either by failure to shut out enough of its enemies, or by definitively violating its own nature in its primordial efforts to defend itself, or by shutting out, along with some of the more conspicuous of its enemies, all those who might conceivably preserve within it some last flicker of humanistic sanity. Whatever happens, I doubt that war will ever be joined on the only issue which sane men could whole-heartedly give themselves for.

AMONG the opera recordings that have been accumulating are three of complete works: a Russian recording of Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," issued here by Disc, which I will discuss next week, an Italian recording of Verdi's "La Traviata," issued here by Columbia (Set OP-25; 15 records), and Columbia's own recording of the Metropolitan Opera production of Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" (Set OP-26; 12 records).

The "Traviata" is conducted by Belletta with routine competence but no trace of the musicality that revealed itself in the exciting phrasing and style of Toscanini's broadcast performance last year. The soprano of Guerrini, the Violetta, is strident and tremolo-ridden most of the time; the baritone of Silveri, the Germont, is fair; the tenor of Infantino, the Alfredo, is best of all, but his mannered style shows least understanding of the music he is singing—an example being his jaunty delivery of Parigi, o cara. Chorus and orchestra are good; and the performance is well reproduced, though with the usual European heaviness of bass.

The "Hänsel und Gretel" is conducted quite inflexibly (most noticeably in the purely orchestral parts) by Max Rudolf. It is sung in English—and I definitely dislike the English words with the German music, both for sound and meaning. Nadine Conner's small, clear soprano is right for Gretel; Rise Stevens' big mezzo-soprano, her strong tremolo, and her bulky cultivated enunciation are too much for Hänsel; the other singing is acceptable. The performance is well reproduced.

Columbia's second Metropolitan Opera recording is not a complete "Tristan und Isolde" but the Love Duet from the second act sung by Traubel and Ralf with Fritz Busch conducting (Set X-286; $3.35). It is without the cuts—and the disturbing discontinuities—of the older RCA Victor recording; and I have the impression that we now get the duet complete from O sink bernieder to the catastrophe (but again with an all-is-well final concord substituted for the catastrophic discord). In addition both of Brangäne's passages are sung in the Columbia version, whereas the Victor gives the first one sung and only the orchestral accompaniment of the second.

And Fritz Busch paces and otherwise conducts the piece more effectively than Edwin MacArthur in the Victor. On the other hand the deterioration in Flagstad's voice, in the Victor recording, is slight in comparison with the deterioration in Traubel's, so that most of Flagstad's singing retains the lustrous beauty that Traubel's no longer has even when her voice is steady and clear, and much of the time Traubel's voice is strident and tremolo-ridden. Also Ralf's voice is fresher than Melchior's, but Melchior gets his phrases out with more continuity. And Flagstad sings the first of Brangäne's passages with the vocal opulence it calls for and that Herta Glaz doesn't have. I would therefore hate to have to choose between the two recordings; but if I did have to I suppose I would take the one that offered the complete piece and authoritatively conducted performance (which, incidentally, is well reproduced), resigning myself to the kind of singing one usually hears in the work—rather than the mere documentation of Flagstad's historic performance in a state of slight deterioration.

Among the RCA Victor offerings is a volume of Mozart arias sung by Eleanor Steber (Set 1157; $3). Though her voice is a little tremulous in Deb, vieni, non tardar from "Figaro" this doesn't prevent her from producing sustained phrases that make the performance a superb one. But Non so più cosa son from "Figaro" is spoiled by tremolo; and in the high florid passages of Martern aller Arten from "The Seraglio" (sung in English) the voice is at times a thin shriek. The orchestral accompaniments conducted by Morel are outstandingly fine; and the performances are well reproduced.

Beautiful singing by Jan Peerce and Leonard Warren is heard in the duets from Verdi's "La Forza del Destino" that occupy three sides of another volume (Set 1156; $3). There are good accompaniments conducted by Morel and Leinsdorf; and the performances are well reproduced. On the fourth side is a duet from Puccini's "La Bohème."

And on single records: The exciting beauty of voice and phrasing that Milanov is capable of are heard in D'amor sull' ali rose from Verdi's "Il Trovatore" and a cut Ritorna vincitori! from his "Aida," with accompaniments conducted by Weissmann (11-9839; $1). The portentous phrases of Erda's Warning from Wagner's "Das Rheingold" come out in rich contralto coloring as sung by Blanche Thebom with an orchestra under Weissmann (11-9795; $1) with an aria from "La Glauconda" on the reverse side. Robert Merrill's rich baritone is heard in Di Provenza from Verdi's "La Traviata" with an orchestra under Morel and in the Toreador Song from Bizet's "Carmen" with Robert Shaw's chorus and an orchestra under Leinsdorf (11-9794; $1). James Melton's tenor is heard in a beautifully phrased performance of the Flower Song from "Carmen" with an orchestra under Morel (10-1329; $.75), with an aria from "Marta" on the reverse side. Am stillen Herd and the Prize Song from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" are sung with Heldentenor sonority, rather than the lyrical style I would suppose to be more proper, by Svanholm with an orchestra under Weissmann (11-9791; $1). And Berglund's bass is richly sonorous in the Catalogue Aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," with an orchestra conducted by Blech, but his singing lacks the sharpness and humor of the music. All these are well reproduced.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Welcome to America

Dear Sirs: Your readers ought to be told of the plight of six young anti-fascists here, the first refugees from Spanish fascism to reach Oregon. They are young men between eighteen and twenty-five, and their arrival here, together with their subsequent predicament, has aroused enormous interest throughout the Northwest.

The steamer Arthur P. Fairfield, forty-one days out of Le Havre, reached Portland harbor on Columbus Day. As soon as the mooring lines were made fast, Pinkerton guards swarmed up the gangplank. They had had notice that six men who had fled from service in Franco's army were on board as stowaways.

The immigration service, after a secret shipboard meeting, ordered the six deported. Then powerful labor groups swung into action, with Don Wollam, agent of the Marine Cooks (C. I. O.), leading the way. S. P. Stevens of the Oregon A. F. of L. wired Senator Morse in Washington asking that political asylum be granted to the Spaniards, and Hank Curl, acting agent of the National Maritime Union of the Pacific, urged Attorney General Tom Clark to "get the Spanish boys off the Fairfield before it weighs anchor for the gallows."

As a result of these and other protests the Fairfield returned to Europe without the stowaways. They are now in a detention center in Seattle, awaiting the decision of the Attorney General on an appeal which a Portland attorney, Irvin Goodman, has filed in their behalf. The petition was signed by 114 Oregon attorneys. Other pleas have gone to Washington over the signatures of the Seattle and Portland C. I. O. State Councils; the National Association for the Protection of Foreign Born; Matt Meehan, executive board member of the Longshoremen's Union; Methodist Bishop McConnell; Dr. Francis T. Cooke, head of the Portland Council of Churches; and Rabbi Henry Berkowitz.

These are the external facts of a story which began in a Le Havre cafe last September, when the six men met for the first time and decided to stow away on the Fairfield. They had come from various backgrounds.

Luis, the only one of the six to have a passport—for Venezuela—had been a mechanic in Barcelona. "All I ask is security," he says to interviewers.

Emilio, twenty-three, a migratory farm laborer, served a term in a Franco prison after the collapse of the Loyalist armies, in which he fought at the age of fourteen.

Daniel, twenty-five, had been a clerk in Saragosa. "Why did I want to come to your country?" he said to me. "It is the dream of all Europeans. . . I hated the Franco regime with my whole heart." He was wearing a suit bought for him from the ship's stores by the Fairfield's engineer. "I hid on the poop deck for eight days before the ship sailed," he said. "We lived on chocolate stolen from the ship's stores." Daniel, like several of the others, walked over the frontier. None of the six had shoes when they came aboard, crew members testified.

Enrique, eighteen, had made 20 cents a day as a carpenter's apprentice in Madrid. "I, too, have been arrested," he said. "It was for stealing two heads of cabbage when my family had not eaten for two days. You have much food in America."

José, eighteen, from Valencia, had been a seaman on an intercoastal ship at a salary of 300 pesetas—about $20—a month. He had not belonged to a union because there are no longer any free unions in Spain, only Franco's syndicates. His handsome dark eyes flashed as he told me, "Never will I serve under the flag of General Franco. If Spain had a democratic government, you would not be troubled by us."

Manuel, twenty-five, had served in the navy. At the time of his escape he was being pressed into the Falange. "In that time which all of us remember," he said, "I fought with my brothers against Franco, in the mountains." His brothers were killed and he himself still carries a bullet in his leg.

Enrique and José were children when Madrid fell, but liberty is a word which, though long in disuse, has not lost meaning in Spain. From conversations with foreign sailors and from a leaflet picked up on the steps of the American consulate they had formed the same picture as the older ones—of a free world at the end of the westward ship lanes.

What the boys want, assuming they are not allowed to remain in the United States, is to go to Mexico or Venezuela. This would involve granting them transit visas to travel legally from Seattle to their destination. The decision is up to the American public, final court of appeal in any case involving human rights.
